N. B. When the case of lord Melville was sent to press, I intended to subjoin to it an Appendix of documents illustrative of the history of that prosecution; I was however induced to abandon this plan on finding that the trial itself would occupy a much larger portion of the present Volume than I had originally expected. The Reader is therefore requested to cancel in pages 550, 559, and 599, the references to the Appendix, and instead thereof, in p. 550, to refer to 3 Hansard's Parl. Debates, 1147; in p. 559 to 5 Hansard's Parl. Debates, Appendix, p. 1; and in p. 599 to 6 Hansard's Parl. Debates, Appendix, p. cxlii.

Mr. Godwin's "Cursory Strictures."

Note. In Vol. iii, p. 310, of this Continuation, the Cursory Strictures on Lord Chief Justice Eyre's Charge are attributed to the late Mr. Felix Vaughan; I have since learnt that this pamphlet was written by Mr. W. Godwin. It was from Mr. Vaughan's having written another at the same period that the mistake originated.

The Ninth Volume of this Series of State Trials is in the Press, and will be published in March; it will contain the Proceedings in Ireland in December 1806, under the Special Commission issued for the Trial of the Threshers; a full Report of the Proceedings in the Case of General Picton, from authentic MSS. &c. &c.

A. B. When the case of Lord Melville was sent to press, I intended to add to it an appendix of documents illustrative of the history of that prosecution; I was however induced to abandon this plan on finding that the trial itself would occupy a much larger portion of the present volume than I had originally expected. The matter is therefore requested to be cancelled in pages 550, 551, and 552, the references to the Appendix, and instead thereof, in p. 550, to refer to 3 Hansard's Parl. Debates, 1141; in p. 551 to 3 Hansard's Parl. Debates, Appendix, p. 1; and in p. 552 to 3 Hansard's Parl. Debates, Appendix, p. 1.

The case of Sir Francis Baring has been recently in part reported in 3 Hans. Adv. 717, and the report will doubtless be completed in the fourth volume of the same work. Note to the word "original," p. 457, l. 32. See the cases cited in Phil. Ex. 330, and Brewster & Sewell, 3 Hans. Adv. 200. To those in p. 448, add: See too Bellamy v. Hanson, 1 Cow. 43.

Mr. Godwin's "Curiosities of Literature."

Note. In Vol. II. p. 310, of this Collection, the Curious Sentences on Lord Chief Justice Eyre's Charge are attributed to the late Mr. John Vaughan; I have since learnt that this pamphlet was written by Mr. W. Godwin. It was from Mr. Vaughan's having written earlier at the same period that the mistake originated.

The Ninth Volume of the Series of State Trials is in the Press, and will be published in January; it will contain the Proceedings in Ireland in December 1806, under the Special Commission, and for the Trial of the Rebels; a full Report of the Proceedings in the Case of General Pakenham, from October 1806 to 1807.

honourable Spencer Perceval Attorney-general of our present sovereign lord the king who for our said lord the king in this behalf prosecuteth in his proper person cometh here into the court of our said lord the king before the king himself at Westminster on Monday next after the Octave of Saint Hilary in this same term, and for our said lord the king giveth the Court here to understand and be informed

1st Count.—That William Cobbett late of Westminster in the county of Middlesex gentleman being a malicious and ill disposed person and unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending to move and incite the liege subjects of our said lord the king to hatred and dislike of our said lord the king's administration of the government of this kingdom and to insinuate and cause it to be believed that the people of that part of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain and Ireland called Ireland were oppressed aggrieved and injured by our said lord the king's government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and to traduce defame and vilify the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom, and especially the right honourable Philip Earl of Hardwicke our said lord the king's lieutenant general and governor general of the said part of the said United Kingdom and the right honourable John Lord Redesdale our said lord the king's lord chancellor and keeper of the great seal and one of his most honourable privy council of and for the said part of the said United Kingdom on the fifth day of November in the forty-fourth year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the 3rd by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain and Ireland King Defender of the Faith at Westminster in the county of Middlesex unlawfully and maliciously did print and publish and cause and procure to be printed and published a certain scandalous and malicious libel in the form of a letter entitled Affairs of Ireland containing therein divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said part of the said United Kingdom and the people thereof and our said lord the king's government thereof and also of and concerning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke so being such lieutenant and governor as aforesaid and the said John Lord Redesdale so being such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid and also of and concerning Alexander Marsden esquire then and there being one of the under secretaries in the office of the chief secretary of the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke so being such lieutenant and governor as aforesaid (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say)

"Sir—'Equo ne credite Teucris' was the advice which in a dangerous moment Laocoon gave to the Trojans. It will be remembered that the equus against which that sagacious adviser cautioned his countrymen was a wooden one. His countrymen did not regard Laocoon. They received the wooden representative of wisdom. They approached it as if it possessed authority and power. Its wooden head towered above their houses. But though the machine itself was innoxious wood the credulous Trojans found its hollow head and exalted sides were nothing less than receptacles for greedy peculators and blood-thirsty assassins. The ingenious author of the story did not mean to confine the lesson which it inculcates to the tale of Troy alone. He meant to take advantage of that easy metaphorical expression which by the common assent of mankind has moulded itself into most languages and by which a certain species of head (which the moderns by various moral experiments have ascertained to be a non-conductor of ideas) has been denominated a wooden head. He meant to caution future nations not to put trust or confidence in the apparent innocence of any such wooden instrument and not to suffer themselves to be led to exalt it into consequence or to pay it any respect. He meant to tell that any people who submitted to be governed by a wooden head would not find their security in its supposed innoxiousness as its hollowness would soon be occupied by instruments of mischief. When I found sir this portion of the kingdom" (meaning the said part of the said United Kingdom) "overwhelmed by such consequences to our property as the rapacity of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "and his friends and such consequences to our lives as the pikes of Mr. Emmett and his friends have lately produced when I could trace all these evils as the inevitable issue from the head and body of such a government as that of lord Hardwicke" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "and I am told of his innoxiousness and his firmness I still reply the story of the wooden horse and I shall still notwithstanding the fate of Laocoon raise my voice to my countrymen and cry Equo ne credite Teucris. Not sir that I would be understood literally. I do not mean to assert that the head of my lord Hardwicke" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "is absolutely built of timber. My application like that of the original author of the tale is only metaphorical. Yet at the same time I cannot avoid suspecting that if the head of his excellency" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "were submitted to the analysis of any such investigator of nature as Lavoisier it would be found to contain a superabundant portion of particles of a very ligneous tendency. This sir is the lord Hardwicke of doctor Adington against whose government 'not a murmur of complaint has been heard'—while our property has been subject to the plunder of his clerks and our persons have been exposed to pikes of the rebels. Still however the innocence of lord Hardwicke" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "as to any intention of mischief is held forth But I reply in the words of Mr. Burke 'they who truly mean well must be fearful of acting ill Delusive good intention is no excuse for presumption' And I may add in my own words that the government of a harmless man is not therefore a harmless government" And in another part thereof, according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "Inquiry and research are the duty and resource of the ignorant and therefore I did inquire The result of no small attention bestowed in this pursuit was, that I discovered of our viceroy" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "that he was in rank an earl in manners a gentleman in morals a good father and a kind husband and that he had a good library in St. James's-square Here I should have been for ever stopped if I had not by accident met with one Mr. Lindsay a Scotch parson since become (and I am sure it must be by Divine Providence for it would be impossible to account for it by secondary causes) bishop of Killaloo in Ireland—From this Mr. Lindsay I further learned that my lord Hardwicke" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "was celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire" And in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "While I have been writing sir a map of the West Indies happened to hang before me My eyes wandered I know not why upon it and fixed upon one of those little islands which have been lately by the British troops redeemed from the capitulation of lord Cornwallis at Amiens Give me leave to suppose that in the course of a few years one of those little islands should become highly cultivated and that a considerable portion of British property became vested in its land and in its trade Suppose that by some unfortunate combination of events this little island should be deeply shaken by insurrection within and should be loudly menaced by invasion from without Suppose a powerful fleet of the enemies of the British name lay to windward ready filled with troops for landing while a desperate band of ruffians were secretly arming in its bosom ready to aid that landing of a foreign enemy Suppose in this distress a committee of West India proprietors whose money had been vested in this little island should apply to the doctor Addington for assistance and suppose he were to rise up and desire them to quit their apprehensions for that he had entrusted the care of their island to a very eminent sheepfeeder from Cambridgeshire who was to be assisted in all his counsels by a very able and strong built chancery pleader from Lincoln's-Inn Give me leave to ask you sir who know the city much better than I can pretend to do what would a sugar com-

2nd. Count.—And the said attorney-general of our said lord the king for our said lord the king further giveth the Court here to understand and be informed that the said William Cobbett so being such person as aforesaid and again unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending as aforesaid and also further unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending to traduce defame and vilify the honourable Charles Osborne then and there being one of the justices of our said lord the king assigned to hold the pleas in the court of our said lord the king before the king himself in Ireland aforesaid afterwards to wit on the tenth day of December in the forty-fourth year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king at Westminster in the county of Middlesex unlawfully and maliciously did print and publish and cause and procure to be printed and published a certain other scandalous and malicious libel in the form of a letter intituled Affairs of Ireland in some parts of which said last-mentioned libel were and are contained divers scandalous malicious and seditious matters and things of and concerning the said part of the said United Kingdom and the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and of and concerning the said Charles Osborne so being such justice as aforesaid and the said Alexander Marsden so being such under secretary as aforesaid (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) “What I have now to touch upon must be done with a delicate hand I will confine myself to a bare narrative of facts and will not presume to give any opinion As soon as the government had fully recovered its recollection a commission directed to five of the judges issued for the trial of those rebels who had been arrested for treason committed in the county and city of Dublin This commission having issued while the judges were on circuit was filled up (and very properly filled up) with the names of the five senior of those judges who were then on the circuits which were likely to terminate at the earliest period of time Such was the reason given by government for the particular selection of the judges named in that commission and it certainly was a good reason In some time after this commission had been sitting it became necessary to issue a new commission for the trial of rebels in the shires of Antrim and of Down In the appointment of this second commission the principle which directed the selection in the first was not adhered to On the contrary the junior judge of the twelve” (meaning the said Charles Osborne) “was very anxiously called out and placed in this new commission over the heads of a number of his seniors This however could not and ought not to have given offence to any of those senior judges because whatever opinion of them the government” (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said united kingdom) “may have manifested in such an appointment the opinion of the present government” (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said united kingdom) “upon such a subject (known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice) is too contemptible to have the slightest effect upon any of those learned judges in the public mind The circumstance therefore was not at first attended to There is published in this city a newspaper called the Dublin Journal It is in general conducted with good sense loyalty and regard to truth but in particular deviations it is known to be under the control and immediate direction of government” (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said united Kingdom) “In that paper of the 10th of October last a publication appeared which purported to be a charge given by the junior judge above alluded to to the grand jury of the county of Antrim In this place I beg now to declare that I am far from attempting to assert that the learned judge did pronounce any such charge and when I speak of this charge I request you will understand I mean only the newspaper publication abovementioned In the newspaper publication the learned judge is made to tell the grand jury that ‘through the well-timed efforts and strenuous exertions of a wise and energetic government &c. the progress of such crimes as lately disgraced this country had been effectually checked’ If the learned justice did make any such assertion (which I am far from supposing) with what amazement the grand jury must have received such a broadside poured upon the truth of the fact I cannot as I was not present know but I can very well imagine what the feelings of twenty-three well-informed gentlemen must have been Their respect and a thorough knowledge of their duty would necessarily keep them silent”—And in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) “But sir suggestion does not stop here Men ask how could (if the learned justice did make any such assertion) the learned justice be led to give credit to a position which contradicts the evidence of the senses of every man in the kingdom who was present at or knew any thing of the transaction? How could a learned judge be supposed to assert that which no man in the kingdom would assert unless he had some reasons of the same nature as those which prevailed on Mr. Marsden’s attorney-general on the trials for high treason to assert something of the same kind? Men sir couple the extraordinary selection of the learned justice” (meaning the said Charles Osborne) “from amongst his fellows with the extraordinary assertion attributed to him in a government newspaper and they ask if he made that assertion where did he get his information? Was he ever in Mr. Marsden's" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden's) "audience-room since the night of the 23rd of July? What passed there? What were the pre-disposing causes which induced government to select particularly that learned justice?" (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "Could government have foreseen (and if so by what faculty) that the learned justice would have given an instruction to the grand jury so very useful and so very grateful to the government? What night telescope could have been applied to the eye of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "which through the dark womb of things unborn could have enabled him to perceive through this little future star of praise springing from the creative lips of the learned justice? Here sir decorum towards you and towards the public induces me to be silent as to other and perhaps stronger observations But I may I believe add what men also say that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "in order to screen them from public disgrace we might then look for another but not less fatal end to our liberties and to our constitution than that which rebellion or invasion could produce And in truth they say that except as to momentary effects rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference if it can be supposed that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice"—And in other parts of which said last-mentioned libel were and are contained divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said John Lord Redesdale and the conduct of the said John lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid by way of antithesis and contrast between the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is insinuated that the said John Lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had adopted and pursued and the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is asserted that the late right honourable Lloyd, Lord Kenyon now deceased would have adopted and pursued (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say): "Instead of calling him" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "to the high station which he so ably filled had it pleased his majesty to bless the western neighbours of Cambricus" (meaning the people of the said part of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland) "who certainly owe the honest and warm-hearted principality" (meaning the principality of Wales) "no ill will with lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "for their chancellor I can very well conceive what lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd lord Kenyon) "in such a situation would have done and also what he would not have done From a rare modesty of nature or from a rare precision of self knowledge lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection on his arrival in a country with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which and with their persons manners and individual characters and connexions he must have been utterly unacquainted In such a country torn with domestic sedition and treason threatened with foreign invasion and acting since the union under an untried constitution if doctor Addington had required that lord Kenyon should direct a Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "'in all his councils' lord Kenyon would as soon at the desire of lord St. Vincent have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles Particularly the integrity of lord Kenyon would have shrunk from such an undertaking if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the country should upon any account be consulted" (meaning and insinuating thereby, and intending to cause it to be believed that he the said John lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had undertaken to direct the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke in all his councils as such lieutenant and governor as aforesaid in the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom with a condition that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the said part of the said United Kingdom should be consulted as to the government thereof) "His pride would have spurned at the undertaking if he were told that to the Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip, earl of Hardwicke) "and himself in the cares of government a clerk in the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers without political habits political information or honourable connexion were to be joined as assessors and to be the only assessors And lord Kenyon's pride and integrity would have both joined in preventing him from being himself the instrument of introducing such men into a cabinet of government" (meaning and insinuating thereby and intending to cause it to be believed that the said John Lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had been the instrument of introducing a clerk into the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers without political habits political information or honourable connexion into the cabinet of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "If any one man could be found of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country had in the moment of his conviction and sentence uttered the following apostrophe— 'That viper! whom my father nourished! Therefore &c.

After the information had been gone through, the Attorney-general addressed the Court and Jury as follows :

My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury;—As I am upon all occasions very much disinclined to take up the valuable time of the Court, I sincerely lament, that, on the present occasion, I have been obliged to lengthen this record, by inserting in it so many passages; for I am persuaded, that nothing is more conducive to justice, than that it should be confined within as narrow a compass as possible. But, gentlemen, it appeared to me impossible, that you, who are to pass your verdict of guilty, or not guilty, on the defendant in the case before you; or that the Court who, if you find him guilty, will hereafter have to apportion his punishment, should be able to form any correct opinion of the true character of the libels, of their real malignity, of the mischievous intention of the author of them, and of the low means by which he endeavoured to effect his purpose, without my laying before you such samples and passages, as would enable you to perceive, that I was not prosecuting a man for an inadvertent or an hasty expression, nor for the fair exercise of his profession as a public writer, who, in the hurry of the moment, had trespassed a little beyond the line of decency and propriety; but, on the contrary, that it was directed against one, who, in a cool, systematic and deliberate manner, had endeavoured to degrade and vilify the whole administration of his majesty's government in Ireland. It is not so much a libel upon my lord Hardwicke, it is not so much a libel upon my lord Redesdale, it is not so much a libel upon Mr. Justice Osborne or Mr. Secretary Marsden, merely for the purpose of traducing and vilifying those characters; but those characters are traduced and vilified, for the purpose of bringing the whole government of Ireland into contempt, and exposing it to the scorn and execration of the people of that country.

When I show to you, gentlemen, as I shortly shall do, that this is the real aim and bent of the whole of these libels, I trust it will not be imputed to me, that I am trespassing, in any degree, upon the liberty of the press, or upon that fair and free discussion of the conduct of public men and measures, which is the distinguished privilege of every Englishman, which has been abundantly enjoyed since I have had the honour to occupy the situation I hold, and of which Mr. Cobbett, I think, will not be the first man to complain of the violation.—You will also consider, gentlemen, not only the libellous language made use of, but the critical moment at which that language was used: at a moment when the minds of the people of Ireland were in a feverish and distempered state, and liable to be driven to a paroxysm of madness by the slightest impulse. And the taking advantage of a moment so perilous, tends powerfully to establish, that the most base and destructive motive actuated the mind of the defendant. Had the libel not been of that sweeping nature as to involve the whole political government of Ireland; had it simply been directed against the noble earl at the head of that government; or against the other dignified characters who are the object of the defendant's slander; those dignified characters would, in all probability, have treated it with silent disdain. But they considered, that they had been made the medium of aspersions, which, if not animadverted upon, might be attended with consequences dangerous to the happiness of a large and valuable portion of his majesty's subjects, and dangerous to the very existence of the British government in that part of the United Kingdom.

Gentlemen, you must be well aware, that the character of every government depends greatly upon the estimation in which those are held by whom it is conducted—both those who plan the measures, and those in an inferior situation, by whom such measures are carried into execution; and if there is any one thing more than another, that can recommend a government to the love and affection of the people, it is the purity and integrity of the administration of justice, and of those who deal it out for the protection of their lives and their property. Yet, gentlemen, you will find, that in all these important particulars, the government of Ireland is attacked. My lord Hardwicke, as the head of that government is treated as a person wholly incapable of performing the public functions of his office, and represented as “a very eminent feeder of sheep in Cambridgeshire.” My lord Redesdale, who is placed so high in the councils of the state, is denominated “a very able and strong-built chancery pleader from Lincoln's-Inn.” Mr. Secretary Marsden is described as “a corrupt, unprincipled, rapacious plunderer, preying upon the property of the state.” And Mr. Justice Osborne is held forth as, “the most corrupt instrument of a debased and degraded government, lending himself as a screen to conceal them from the disgrace their actions would naturally bring upon them.”

Gentlemen, the first passage in the libel to which I shall draw your attention forms part of a letter on the affairs of Ireland, signed by the name of Juverna, and was published in

"Cobbett's Political Register," of the 5th of November last. The author takes occasion, by the well known fable of the Trojan horse, to typify the whole Irish government. My lord Hardwicke is described under the appellation of the "wooden representative of wisdom;" thereby comparing his excellency to the wooden horse recorded in the history of the siege of Troy. But, perhaps, it will be best to read the several passages to you, and make my comments upon them as I proceed.—The first passage begins thus: "Equo ne credite Teucris, was the advice which, in a dangerous moment, Laocoon gave to the Trojans. It will be remembered that the equus, against which that sagacious adviser cautioned his countrymen, was a WOODEN one. His countrymen did not regard Laocoon. They received the wooden representative of wisdom. They approached it as if it possessed authority and power. Its wooden head towered above their houses. But though the machine itself was innoxious wood, the credulous Trojans found its hollow head and exalted sides were nothing less than receptacles for greedy speculators and blood-thirsty assassins. The ingenious author of the story did not mean to confine the lesson, which it inculcates to the tale of Troy alone. He meant to take advantage of that easy metaphorical expression, which, by the common assent of mankind has moulded itself into most languages, and by which a certain species of head (which the moderns, by various moral experiments, have ascertained to be a non-conductor of ideas) has been denominated a wooden head. He meant to caution future nations not to put trust or confidence in the apparent innocence of any such wooden instrument; and not to suffer themselves to be led to exalt it into consequence, or to pay it any respect. He meant to tell them that any people, who submitted to be governed by a wooden head, would not find their security in its supposed innoxiousness, as its hollowness would soon be occupied by instruments of mischief." Now, gentlemen, is this or is it not intended to apply to my lord Hardwicke? The next passage begins thus: "When I found, sir, this portion of the kingdom overwhelmed by such consequences to our property as the rapacity of Mr. Marsden and his friends, and such consequences to our lives as the pikes of Mr. Emmet and his friends have lately produced: When I could trace all these evils as the inevitable issue from the head and body of such a government as that of lord Hardwicke, and I am told of his innocuousness and his firmness. I still reply the story of the wooden horse, and I shall still, notwithstanding the fate of Laocoon, raise my voice to my countrymen and cry, Equo ne credite Teucris." Is it possible, gentlemen, that the passages I have read to you can bear any other interpretation than that which I have put upon them? He then proceeds in a style of flippancy, that he does not mean to state literally, that the head of his excellency was absolutely built of timber. But I will give you the gentleman's own words: "not, sir, that I would be understood literally. I do not mean to assert that the head of my lord Hardwicke is absolutely built of timber. My application, like that of the original author of the tale, is only metaphorical. Yet, at the same time, I cannot avoid suspecting that if the head of his excellency were submitted to the analysis of any such investigator of nature as Lavoisier, it would be found to contain a superabundant portion of particles of a very ligneous tendency." Now, gentlemen, is there any thing in all this that can be called a fair and liberal description of the conduct of a public character? He then goes on to say, "this sir, is the lord Harwicke of doctor Addington, against whose government 'not a murmur of complaint has been heard'—while our property has been subject to the plunder of his clerks, and our persons have been exposed to the pikes of the rebels. Still, however, the innocence of lord Hardwicke, as to any intention of mischief, is held forth. But, I reply in the words of Mr. Burke: 'they who truly mean well must be fearful of acting ill. Delusive good intention is no excuse for presumption.' And I may add in my own words, that the government of a harmless man is not, therefore, a harmless government." Gentlemen, I have already adverted to the indecency and flippancy of many expressions made use of in this libel. If this libeller had been hurried away with the temptation of saying a flippant thing, I should not have thought it a subject of criminal prosecution. But, in the case before you, it is criminal, as indicating the spirit with which it was written, and as being descriptive of the mind of the man at the time he was making them. I would not, however, be understood to say, that even in the warmth of discussion upon public men and public measures, decency of language ought not to be preserved, and that any deviation therefrom is not punishable. What I mean in this case is, that I should have thought it beneath the dignity of these high characters to have taken notice of any personal abuse, if that personal abuse had not been connected with a systematic attack upon the whole of the Irish government. I do not mean to say, that the describing such a man as Mr. Addington, by the epithet of doctor Addington is degrading to him, nor that I would advise that such an epithet should become the subject of a prosecution in a court of justice; but, surely, no one who has the least liberality of feeling, or the least sense of decency, could think it becoming to taunt such a gentleman as Mr. Addington: a gentleman who, the more he is known, the more his character will be admired. For my part, I feel no sympathy with those who think there is any wit in such titles. Mr. Addington is the son of a man who most ably and skilfully practised in a liberal profession; who, by his talents, became justly eminent in that profession; and whose son has raised himself by his great abilities to one of the highest offices in this country. I again say, that for any publication calling Mr. Addington "Doctor Addington," or for any flippancy of that nature, standing by itself, I should think it beneath the dignity of that right honourable gentleman, to make it the subject of a prosecution; but I also say, that when you see an epithet of this nature introduced, it does show the spirit with which the libel was published, and that it was a systematic attack upon the whole government of Ireland, by bringing into contempt and ridicule the persons placed by his majesty at the head of that government.

The next passage runs thus: "inquiry and research are the duty and the resource of the ignorant, and therefore I did inquire. The result of no small attention bestowed in this pursuit was, that I discovered of our viceroy, that he was in rank an earl: in manners a gentleman; in morals a good father and a kind husband; and that he had a good library in St. James's-square. Here I should have been for ever stopped, if I had not by accident, met with one Mr. Lindsay, a Scotch parson, since become (and I am sure it must be by Divine Providence, for it would be impossible to account for it by secondary causes) bishop of Killaloe in Ireland. From this Mr. Lindsay I further learned, that my lord Hardwicke was celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening a sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire." Now, gentlemen, I may be asked, if calling my lord Hardwicke the most distinguished character that can belong to a man—"in morals a good father and kind husband," having "a good library in St. James's-square, and being attached to agricultural pursuits,"—I may be asked, I say, whether I mean to consider all these good qualities as being a libel on my lord Hardwicke? Yes, gentlemen, I do—WITH THE TEXT BY WHICH THEY ARE ACCOMPANIED. Qualities like these ought to have made the libeller pause before he ventured to attack such a character. He tells you my lord Hardwicke has "a good library in St. James's-square," and that he is "celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening a sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire!" Gentlemen, you must close your eyes, you must shut your understandings, if you do not see that these amiable qualities are attributed to lord Hardwicke, with a slanderous, with an ill-natured meaning.—With respect to this fattener of sheep in Cambridgeshire, he goes on to say: "while I have been writing, sir, a map of the West Indies happened to hang before me. My eye wandered, I know not why, upon it, and fixed upon one of those little islands which have been lately, by the British troops, redeemed from the capitulation of lord Cornwallis at Amiens. Give me leave to suppose, that, in the course of a few years, one of those little islands should become highly cultivated, and that a considerable portion of British property became vested in its land and in its trade. Suppose that, by some unfortunate combination of events, this little island should be deeply shaken by insurrection within, and should be loudly menaced by invasion from without. Suppose a powerful fleet of the enemies of the British name lay to windward, ready filled with troops for landing, while a desperate band of ruffians were secretly arming in its bosom, ready to aid that landing of a foreign enemy." (Alluding certainly to the state of Ireland). "Suppose," he continues, "in this distress, a committee of West India proprietors, whose money had been vested in this little island, should apply to the doctor Addington for assistance: and suppose he were to rise up and desire them to quiet their apprehensions, for that he had entrusted the care of their island to a very eminent sheep-feeder from Cambridgeshire, who was to be assisted in all his councils by a very able and strong-built chancery pleader from Lincoln's Inn. Give me leave to ask you, sir, who know the city much better than I can pretend to do, what would a sugar committee, issuing from one of their coffee-houses, say to such an answer from a British minister? Why, sir, the walls of St. Stephen's, and the chambers in Downing-street, would be made to ring with their vociferous reproaches. And yet, sir, to this situation is that portion of the United Kingdom reduced; on the strength and vigour of which, at this moment, not only its own safety, but, as I have, in my former letter stated, the safety of the British empire, and, consequently, I may assume the safety of Europe does entirely depend. Against the truth of the description I have given of its rulers, I may challenge the most daring supporter of the present government to produce me one single act in the lives of either of those truly great characters of the doctor, which can entitle them to claim one particle of trust or confidence from the public, beyond the bounds and limits, within which I have encircled their exploits."

Now, gentlemen, will any man believe that there is any degree of candour in saying, that all that has been done by the British government for Ireland, is to send them a sheep-feeder from Cambridgeshire, and a strong-built chancery pleader from Lincoln's Inn, when I tell you that at the moment when the government of Ireland is so abominably libelled, that country is defended, externally and internally, by fleets and by armies, beyond what it ever has been in any former period of its history? Nay, gentlemen, I will go still farther. I will venture to assert, that Great Britain never was possessed of an army so well disciplined, so well appointed, so well regulated, and so well commanded as that now in Ireland. And yet this libeller represents, that all that has been done for the people of Ireland, is to send them a sheep-feeder from Cambridgeshire, and a strong-built chancery-pleader from Lincoln's Inn! Is not this telling the people of Ireland that they must expect nothing from their own government, and encouraging them to look to some other for protection?—He next goes on to say: On the chancery pleader, perhaps, I may have laid too great a stress—he is not of the first consequence—though, in a future letter, I may, perhaps, point out to you the mischiefs which the intermeddling of such a man in matters out of the course of his practice may occasion. But, with respect to lord Hardwicke, it may be replied, that my challenge is unfair, because it is impossible to justify his having been appointed to the government of Ireland by any instance of former political ability, as the acceptance of his present office was his first political essay. What! Is he one of the tribe of the Hobarts, Westmorelands, and Camdens? Is he one of that tribe, who have been sent over to us to be trained up here into politicians, as they train the surgeons apprentices in the hospitals, by setting them at first to bleed the pauper patients? Is this a time for a continuation of such wanton experiment? The gift of lord Hardwicke to us, at such a period, cannot be compared to any thing else than the prank of Falstaff upon prince Hal at the battle of Shrewsbury, when the knight handed over his Pistol to the prince. For indeed, sir, by the present to us of lord Hardwicke, that sentence has been proved to us in a bloody truth, which Falstaff said in a good-humoured jest—‘here’s what will sack a city.’” Now, who are the Hobarts, the Westmorelands, and the Camdens to whom this libeller alludes? I will tell you, gentlemen. They are great and deservedly illustrious characters who formerly occupied the highest situations in the government of Ireland. And thus you will perceive, that this is not only a libel upon the Irish government of the present day, but a libel upon former governments. With respect to my lord Hardwicke, I will venture to say, that there never was a nobleman who, by his wise administration of justice, and his amiable and conciliatory manners, effected more for the tranquillity and happiness of Ireland than that nobleman has done. Totally to prevent sudden ebullitions of discontent and disaffection, is, perhaps, beyond the reach of any talents; but, to crush rebellion in its birth, to stifle the monster as soon as it appeared, was the achievement of my lord Hardwicke. He put down insurrection, without offering violence to the constitution, by the mild but firm operation of the established law. The rebellious were punished, and the loyal were made secure, without infringing on the trial by jury, or on the general peace of the country; and the necessary and wholesome rigour of the law did not interrupt the tranquillity of the nation at large, which feels itself grateful and happy under the mild, the temperate, the firm, and the conciliatory government of the amiable nobleman, whose character is so scandalously aspersed in this abominable libel.

I shall now proceed to that part of the libel which relates to Mr. Justice Osborne, and which forms the second libel stated on the record. And here, gentlemen, you will see that there is an attempt, by means of a thin covering, to impute to that learned judge improper conduct, in the course of a charge which he delivered to the grand jury for the county of Antrim. The libeller wraps up his poison in the shape of a dry narrative of facts. He begins thus: “What I have now to touch upon must be done with a delicate hand. I will confine myself to a bare narrative of facts, and will not presume to give any opinion. As soon as the government had fully recovered its recollection, a commission, directed to five of the judges, issued for the trial of those rebels who had been arrested for treason committed in the county and city of Dublin. This commission, having issued while the judges were on circuit, was filled up (and very properly filled up) with the names of the five senior of those judges who were then on the circuits, which were likely to terminate at the earliest period of time. Such was the reason given by government for the particular selection of the judges named in that commission, and it certainly was a good reason. In some time after this commission had been sitting, it became necessary to issue a new commission for the trial of rebels in the shires of Antrim and of Down. In the appointment of this second commission, the principle which directed the selection in the first, was not adhered to. On the contrary, the junior judge of the twelve was very anxiously culled out, and placed in this new commission, over the heads of a number of his seniors. This, however, could not, and ought not to have given offence to any of those senior judges, because, whatever opinion of them the government may have manifested in such an appointment, the opinion of the present government upon such a subject (known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice) is too contemptible to have the slightest effect upon any of those learned judges in the public mind. The circumstance, therefore, was not at first attended to. There is published, in this city, a newspaper, called the Dublin Journal. It is, in general, conducted with good sense, loyalty, and a regard to truth; but, in particular deviations, it is known to be under the control and immediate direction of government. In that paper of the 20th of October last, a publication appeared, which purported to be a charge given by the junior judge above alluded to, to the grand jury of the county of

Antrim. In this place I beg now to declare, that I am far from attempting to assert, that the learned judge did pronounce any such charge; and when I speak of his charge, I request you will understand I mean only the newspaper publication above-mentioned. In the newspaper publication the learned judge is made to tell the grand jury, that ‘through the well-timed efforts and strenuous exertions of a ‘wise and ENERGETIC government, &c. the ‘progress of such crimes as lately disgraced ‘this country had been effectually checked.’ If the learned justice did make any such assertion (which I am far from supposing), with what amazement the grand jury must have received such a broadside, poured upon the truth of the fact, I cannot, as I was not present, know: but I can very well imagine what the feelings of twenty-three well-informed gentlemen must have been. Their respect, and a thorough knowledge of their duty would necessarily keep them silent. But though men remain silent under the proper awe and control of a court of justice, their language only becomes more strenuous when that restraint is taken off, and they meet together in private confidence.” The libeller then proceeds to say: “but, sir, suggestion does not stop here. Men ask, how could (if the learned justice did make any such assertion) the learned justice be led to give credit to a position which contradicts the evidence of the senses of every man in the kingdom, who was present at, or knew any thing of the transaction? How could a learned judge be supposed to assert that, which no man in the kingdom would assert, unless he had some reasons of the same nature as those which prevailed on Mr. Marsden’s attorney-general, on the trials for high treason, to assert something of the same kind? Men, sir, couple the extraordinary selection of the learned justice from amongst his fellows, with the extraordinary assertion attributed to him in a government newspaper, and they ask, if he made that assertion, where did he get his information? Was he ever in Mr. Marsden’s audience-room since the night of the 23rd of July? What passed there? What were the pre-disposing causes which induced government to select particularly that learned justice? Could government have foreseen (and if so, by what faculty) that the learned justice would have given an instruction to the grand jury, so very useful and so very grateful to the government? What night telescope could have been applied to the eye of Mr. Marsden, which, through the dark womb of things unborn, could have enabled him to perceive through this little future star of praise, springing from the creative lips of the learned justice? Here, sir, decorum towards you and towards the public induces me to be silent as to other, and, perhaps, stronger observations. But I may, I believe add, what men also say, that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr. Marsden, in order to screen them from public disgrace, we might then look for another, but not less fatal end to our liberties and to our constitution than that which rebellion or invasion could produce. And in truth, they say, that except as to momentary effects, rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference, if it can be supposed, that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice.” Thus, gentlemen, is Mr. Justice Osborne accused with having poured in a broadside upon the fact, meaning thereby, that that learned judge had been guilty of a falsehood. And then, with reference to Mr. Secretary Marsden, it proceeds to state, that rebellion and invasion were evils of less magnitude, than the ermined robe of his majesty being wrapped round a man, whose blood-stained hands had been washed in the very fountain of mercy. Now, gentlemen, is this or is it not, one of the most dangerous libels to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland, that could possibly have been published? And can there be expected any loyalty or any attachment in the people of that country, if such foul aspersions upon individual characters in the administration of justice be suffered to pass without the reprehension of the law?

The next point I come to, is, the libels upon my lord Redesdale. And here I cannot help saying, that it would have been an unpleasant part of my duty, had I been called on to prosecute for this alone. Not that there is not in this part of the publication, abundant matter for prosecution, but, personally, I should have found the task a very unpleasant one, on account of my known connexion with that noble lord. I shall, therefore, say of him less on that account; and less, I am inclined to believe, than any of my learned friends around me would have said of him, had it fallen to their lot to manage this prosecution. That noble lord is well known to all the bar in this country, and I leave it to that bar to feel for his character as it deserves to be regarded; but I am sure it will not be said, that because the chancellor of Ireland happens to be brother-in-law to the attorney-general of England, he is therefore to go unprotected. — Gentlemen, this is one of the most scandalous and abominable libels that ever came before an English jury. Is it possible that noble lord should have so far taken leave of his former character as to be guilty of the corruption with which he is here charged? The libel professes to draw a comparison between the late lord Kenyon and the present lord chancellor of Ireland, and under the artful pretext of showing us what my lord Kenyon would not have done, he pretty plainly insinuates what my lord Redesdale has done. The libeller introduces it in this way; “instead of calling him to the high station which he so ably filled, had it pleased his majesty to bless the western neighbours of Cambricus* (who certainly owe the honest and warm-hearted principality no ill will) with lord Kenyon for their chancellor; I can very well conceive what lord Kenyon, in such a situation, would have done, and also, what he would not have done. From a rare modesty of nature, or from a rare precision of self-knowledge, lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection, on his arrival in a country, with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which, and with their persons, manners, and individual characters and connexions, he must have been utterly unacquainted. In such a country, torn with domestic sedition and treason, threatened with foreign invasion, and acting, since the union, under an untried constitution, if doctor Ad-dington had required that lord Kenyon

* In a preceding letter of Juverna the name of the first lord Kenyon was introduced by the writer, and produced some observations under the signature of Cambricus which are given below. In the letter from which the extract in the text is taken, Juverna took occasion to insert some high commendations of lord chief justice Kenyon, and in the next number of Cobbett's Political Register the letter bearing the signature of lord Kenyon appeared.

TO THE EDITOR.

November 7th, 1803.

Sir;—Having seen in your paper, in a letter from Ireland, signed Juverna, an attack on the character of a man who will long live revered in the memories of such as value integrity and religious virtue, I must beg leave to remark upon it very shortly, that even were the attack for political incapacity just, it ill becomes any man, who has a sense of the value of uprightness and religious zeal in a judge, whose chief object was ever to make the religion which he cherished and professed the rule and guide of his decisions, and to impress it on his hearers with an eloquence, because it arose from the heart, more irresistible than can be credited by those who never heard or knew not how to feel the value of such a character. As pride is, perhaps, an essential in the character of a statesman, it may not be inexpedient to hint, that in the character alluded to, it was a quality which did not exist. The writer of the Pursuits of Literature, and Juverna may please themselves with their acumen, in finding blots in characters however luminous, though the former, most handsomely, and to his honour, in private testified his respect to the character he only named to lower in his publication. But to the point. In public, the late most respectable chief justice always professed himself not to be a political man. Wit was a gift he never claimed. He felt as much as any man, the force of it in others, should direct a Cambridgeshire Earl 'in ALL his councils,' lord Kenyon would as soon, at the desire of lord St. Vincent, have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles. Particularly, the integrity of lord Kenyon would have shrunk from such an undertaking, if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank, estate, or connexion in the country, should upon any account be consulted. His pride would have spurned at the undertaking, if he were told, that to the Cambridgeshire earl and himself, in the cares of government, a clerk in the secretary's office, and a couple of lawyers without political habits, political information or honourable connexion, were to be joined as assessors, and to be the only assessors. And lord Kenyon's pride and integrity would have both joined in preventing him from being, himself, the instrument of introducing such men into a and the tenacity of a memory nearly self-taught in classical and latin writers would occasionally from its fulness produce quotations, which, however uninformative critical wisdom may be disposed to consider them, were surely harmless, and, to those who have pleasure in witnessing the attainments of the human mind, undoubtedly were pleasing. As to politics, except in the instance of the Regency, to support the cause of his virtuous and beloved sovereign, he rarely ever meddled with them, conceiving the situation of judge to be one which claimed his first attention; the strict application of which, at last, destroyed a life, which the law generally acknowledged, and the public, finally, will find, a public calamity. I did not think I should have intruded so long, but the respect amounting to filial reverence which I delight in bearing to the memory of one, so deservedly claiming it, calls for this from me. Skilful and instructive as I acknowledge the writings of Juverna to be, I am sorry to have my respect much lessened for the author, from his unnecessary attack on a virtuous character, now unhappily no more. He should remember that at last without virtue the wisdom of the wise is vain.—I am your humble servant,

CAMBRICUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Gredington, December 12th, 1803.

Sir;—Having before troubled you under the signature of Cambricus, on account of the apparently wilful attack on my most honoured father's memory, I think it right to trouble you to insert this, to state my perfect satisfaction at the amends, which, for his own character's sake, and that of the public, I am happy to see a writer of such powers and zeal as Juverna has so handsomely made. On that point alone I will trouble you; and am glad to use the opportunity of signing myself your sincere admirer and humble servant,

KENYON.

cabinet of government. If any one man could be found, of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country, had, in the moment of his conviction and sentence, uttered the following apostrophe—
 ‘That viper! whom my father nourished!
 ‘He it was from whose lips I first imbibed
 ‘those principles and doctrines, which now
 ‘by their effects drag me to my grave; and ‘he it is who is now brought forward as my ‘prosecutor, and who by an unheard of exercise of the prerogative, has wantonly ‘lashed, with a speech to evidence, the dying
 ‘son of his former friend, when that dying
 ‘son had produced no evidence, had made no ‘defence, but, on the contrary, had acknowledged the charge, and had submitted to his ‘fate.’—Lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene, in which, although guilt was in one part to be punished, yet, in the whole drama, justice was confounded, humanity outraged, and loyalty insulted.”—Gentlemen, this passage alludes, as I shall presently show you, to Mr. Plunkett, the present solicitor-general of Ireland.* It charges my lord Redesdale with having improperly introduced that gentleman into the government of Ireland, and accuses the said solicitor-general with having made an improper speech on the trial of Mr. Emmet for high treason. As to the slander upon the solicitor-general of Ireland, that learned gentleman has not made it the subject of a criminal charge, but has commenced a civil prosecution against Mr. Cobbett,† thereby affording him an opportunity of justifying and proving the truth of what he has published. Gentlemen, the whole of this passage is a most gross libel upon my lord Redesdale, and not merely upon my lord Redesdale, but upon the whole Irish government. He says, that “lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene.” What scene? The scene of the trial of Mr. Emmet, that traitor who was the heart and fountain of that bloody rebellion. Yet he says, that lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene! Gentlemen, am I to be called upon to make any comments on a passage so infamous as this is?—He goes on to say; “of lord Kenyon, therefore (Cambricus must well know), it never could have been believed, that he himself would lead such a character forward, introduce him to the favour of a deceived sovereign, clothe him in robes, and load him with the emoluments of office. Lord Kenyon must have known that a noble duke for having toasted at a drunken club, in a common tavern, to a noisy rabble, ‘the sovereignty of the people,’ was struck by his majesty’s command out of the privy council, and deprived of all his offices both civil and military. If, therefore, any man were to be found, who, not at a drunken club, or to a brawling rabble, but in a grave and high assembly; not in the character of an inebriated toast-master, but in that of a sober constitutional lawyer, had insisted on the sovereignty of the people as a first principle of the English law; and had declared, that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament, to that of the ‘tellers of the nation ;’ and, that if a particular law were disagreeable to the people, however it might have been enacted with all royal and parliamentary solemnity, nevertheless, it was not binding, and the people by the general law were exempted from obedience to such a particular law, because the people were the supreme and ultimate judges of what was for their own benefit.—Lord Kenyon, if he had been chancellor in any kingdom in Europe, would have shrunk from recommending any such man to the favour of a monarch, while there yet remained a shadow of monarchy visible in the world.” Thereby intimating, that, knowing the character of that gentleman, my lord Redesdale had, nevertheless, recommended him to the favour of the sovereign, and to the situation he holds under the government of Ireland.

But, gentlemen, the libel does not stop here; it goes on to say: “it was said of lord Kenyon that he loved money. If so, he loved his own money only, and not the money of any other man. Lord Kenyon therefore, as chancellor, never would have made any rule or order by the effects of which, the secretary of a master of the rolls would be deprived of all fees, for the purpose of throwing all those fees into the hands of the secretary to the chancellor, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits.” Thereby imputing to lord Redesdale, that he loved the money of other men, and that he corruptly ordered the fees of the secretary of the master of the rolls to be given to his own secretary, the better to enable him to pay a pension to an unknown annuitant; when, in truth, lord Redesdale did not so much as appoint his own secretary, but continued the gentleman who filled that office under his predecessor, my lord Clare.—He goes on: “the professional pride and the inborn honour of lord Kenyon, would never have suffered him to enter into a combination to sap, by underhand means, the independence of his brethren the judges. He never would have suffered the great seal in his hands to be used for the purpose of garbling the bench, in order to gratify those who might be contented publicly to eulogise that government, which privately they must have despised.” Here, gentlemen, the mask is thrown aside—“Nor would he have employed any of his leisure in searching into offices for practices, by which he might harass the domestic arrangements of others, whose pride and whose integrity would not bend to his views; and thus double the vigour of his attack by practising on the hopes of some, and endeavouring to work upon the fears of others." Here, he directly charges lord Redesdale with employing his leisure in searching into offices for practices, by which he might harass the domestic arrangements of those whose pride and integrity would not bend to his views. And I ask you, gentlemen, whether crimes in a judge, more gross or more abominable than those thus attributed to my lord Redesdale, could possibly have an existence?—Gentlemen, such are the passages which I have selected for your consideration, from a mass of others equally libellous. I have taken them from the third and fourth letters of Juvena, though any one letter of the series would have shown you the libellous spirit with which they were written. I am not at all aware what sort of defence it is intended to be set up for Mr. Cobbett. Perhaps it may be said, that the defendant was only concerned in the publication, and not in the composition of this libel. But, gentlemen, Mr. Cobbett must either be the author, or the vehicle of the libel of another man, and he that makes public the libel of another man, is as guilty as if he were the writer of it himself. The inclination of my opinion is, that Mr. Cobbett is not the author; but this is no mitigation of his guilt. I have told you that I have selected the passages from two letters published at different periods; and I have been induced to do so, in order to convince you, that the publication was not a careless act, but that the crime was repeated with the utmost deliberation. Nay, gentlemen, I may go farther, and tell you, that the malice of Mr. Cobbett in these publications has been manifested in an uncommon degree; for since his attention has been called to this subject, and even down to Tuesday last, Mr. Cobbett, finding that the public curiosity was very much turned to these libels, and that it was a lucrative business, has suffered the sale of these very publications which are the subject of this prosecution, uninterruptedly to go on. I, therefore, apprehend, that no excuse can be found for Mr. Cobbett in this case; nor can he be called, with any propriety, the mere editor of these libels. If he is the author, every one will admit that he must be answerable for them in point of law. And if he is not the author, he is equally answerable, or rather more so, in point of morals, for being the publisher, under the particular circumstances of the case.

Gentlemen, Mr. Cobbett either is, or conceives himself to be, the ablest, best and most consummate politician, and the most pure and disinterested editor of a newspaper whom the world ever saw. He either is, or believes himself, beyond the ordinary rank of mankind, and that therefore, there should be considerable indulgence shown to a man of this description for thinking meanly of those who grovel so much below him: but the difficulty is in justifying him in holding forth others to contempt, because they are not equal to himself. Gentlemen, who is Mr. Cobbett? Is he a man of family in this country? Is he a man writing purely from motives of patriotism? Quis homo hic est? Quo patre natus? He seems to imagine himself a species of censor, who, elevated to the solemn seat of judgment, is to deal about his decisions for the instruction of mankind. He casts his eye downward, like the character represented by the poet of nature, from Dover cliff, and looks upon the inferior world below as pigmies beneath him. Perhaps, in the proud contemplation of his own abilities, he supposes he is not to submit to the laws and institutions adapted to the vulgar herd of society; but, gentlemen, whatever may be our inclination to forgive what comes from such a censor, I am afraid we must be content to consider him, in this court, as a common being, and to subject him to the usual restrictions which he will admit to be accommodated only to our inferior capacities.—Gentlemen, it is not easy to dive into another man's mind. But I will suppose a case, that these publications are the work of some person who imputes corrupt motives to government, because he himself was disappointed in a system of his own, and who libels government for corruption, when the absence of that corruption is the true cause of the complaint. Supposing, I say, this to be the case, what can be the excuse for such a man? What can be the excuse for slander originating in motives of this nature? I do not say that these publications do originate in such motives, because I cannot prove it. I wish I could; for, in that case, the prosecution certainly should not stop here.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Mr. Barry, from the Stamp-office, produced the affidavit filed in that office, with the names of Cox and Baylis, as the printers, No. 75, Great Queen-street; R. Bagshaw, the publisher, Bow-street, Covent-garden; and William Cobbett, 15, Duke-street, St. Catherine's, Westminster, as the sole proprietor of the Weekly Political Register.—Mr. Adam, for the defendant, took two objections to this part of the evidence; the one was, that the hand-writing of Mr. Cobbett was not proved, and the other that the place of his residence was not properly described, there being no such situation as appeared on the face of the affidavit. The proof was immediately given by the witness, who said he saw the affidavit signed, and the latter objection was over-ruled by his lordship, this being the description given of his residence by the defendant himself.

Mr. Henry Fallowfield was then called to produce the letters patent under which lord Hardwicke, and the other great officers were appointed, when the witness was stopped by the admission of the defendant of the offices being so held by the persons so named in the information.

Mr. Walter Prober, and Mr. James Elking- ton were examined by Mr. Dallas and Mr. Abbott, and gave testimony to the purchase of the Weekly Political Register, containing these libels, at Mr. Bagshaw's, in Bow-street, and at Mr. Budd's, another agent of the defendant, at the Crown and Mitre, Pall-mall.

Mr. Adam.—I hope, my lord, I shall be permitted to read parts from the whole correspondence, not only the letters on the affairs of Ireland, Nos. 3 and 4, quoted in the information, but the whole series of No. 1 to No. 5.

Lord Ellenborough.—You cannot read them unless they are virtually incorporated by some reference.

Mr. Lowten now read in evidence the several passages which will be found in the information.

Mr. Crowe sworn.—Examined by Mr. Erskine.

Whom do you understand by the Cambridgeshire earl?—Lord Hardwicke.

And whom by the chancery pleader?—Lord Redesdale.

And whom by the junior judge?—Mr. Justice Osborne.

And whom by the clerk in the secretary's office?—Mr. Marsden.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Adam.—My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury. I have an anxious duty to discharge; a duty which presses upon me the more heavily, from the circumstance of my not being accustomed, so much as some of my learned friends are, to business of this nature, and from my not having practised, of late years, so much at this bar as in other courts. And the anxiety I feel has, in no degree, been diminished by the manner in which the prosecution has been conducted, the way in which so many honourable characters have been introduced and spoken of, and, above all, by the character and situation of the person who has entrusted to me the care of his defence.

Gentlemen, I am sure I shall have your serious attention, when I state to you, that I stand here in behalf of a person, whom, though he is accused of a serious crime, I can describe to you, as a good father, an excellent husband, a virtuous subject of the king, and one who has uniformly, in all his conduct, public and private, in this country and abroad, endeavoured to uphold the true constitution of England, as by law established—a person who is ardently attached to the monarchical frame of this government, and who has repeatedly stepped forward, to the certain loss of his fortune and the risk of his life, to defend the interests of England abroad, and to support the true spirit of the British constitution, and the honour and interests of Britain, at home—a person who, for twelve long years of public life, has never, till the present moment, been once questioned for a libel on the government of any country whatever; has never, even by the worst of his enemies, been accused of being an advocate for misrule.

When, therefore, the defence of such a man is entrusted to me, I cannot but feel great anxiety. Nor, is that anxiety diminished, by the manner in which the Attorney-general thought proper to address you; nor by those peculiar circumstances of the case, which he stated to you with so much delicacy. Entertaining, as I do, a proper respect for the public characters adverted to in the information, it becomes me to discuss the allegations with freedom, and, at the same time, with temper and decorum. I should, however, ill discharge my duty, if I did not enter upon this defence with firmness. And I am sure his lordship will go along with me in saying, that we ought to treat the persons alluded to in the publications, not as private individuals, but as persons composing the government of Ireland. This is the real state of the question you have to try. It is not an information filed for the personal vindication of individuals, or for private retribution of justice, but is to justify public agents, in order to exonerate the Irish government from the charges made or implied in this publication.

Gentlemen, the question, then, for you to try is this, and to which you will apply your minds seriously, what was the intention? quo animo was this publication made? It has been stated to you, that this publication was sold so late as Tuesday last; and this was brought forward for the purpose of showing the disposition and intention of the person accused.—Gentlemen, the question of intention was, for a long time, excluded from the consideration of the jury; but since this jurisdiction has been acknowledged by a declaratory act, the law has been clearly understood. It took place in the 32nd of his majesty's reign, and is entitled, "An Act to remove Doubts respecting the Functions of Juries in Cases of Libel." This statute enacts and declares, that on every trial for this offence, the jury may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty, upon the whole matter, and shall not be required to find the defendant guilty, merely on proof of publication, but may enter into the sense which the matter alleged to be libellous may correctly bear. You are, therefore, gentlemen, now invested with complete jurisdiction. An investigation of the conduct of public characters is the great and essential privilege of Englishmen. It has been said by Mr. Hume, that this liberty arose with the Revolution, and that, "As our right is founded on this liberty, so will our liberties be lost with this right." The liberty of the press has ever been held as one of the first principles of the constitution; but the control which the Attorney-general is desirous of putting upon it, would go to extinguish that liberty for ever. The control which he wishes to fetter it with, is this. He says he is no enemy to a fair and free discussion of public characters, provided it be done with decency and decorum. Upon this point I am at issue with the Attorney-general. For, if the doctrine here laid down were to be admitted, there would be an end to all vigorous and manly writings. We should henceforward have no standard to appeal to; because, what might appear decent in the opinion of one Attorney-general, might appear ungentlemanlike and scurrilous in the opinion of another; and thus, the freedom of discussion relative to public men and public measures would depend, not upon a point of right, but upon the taste of the Attorney-general.—Gentlemen, these observations are material for your consideration; they are material on every account; both as applying to that invaluable privilege, the liberty of the press, and as applying, as I hope you will find they do apply, to the manly character of the gentleman, whose cause I am now pleading. And, I trust, after you have heard what I shall have to address to you, you will be of opinion that I have not entertained that hope in vain, but that, in your discernment and justice, I shall have that verdict for the defendant which will relieve him and his family from the distress which now hangs over them.

In the course of what I am about to say, I shall necessarily have to follow the example of the Attorney-general in repeating many of the passages which have been read to you already. This is a duty we all have to discharge here; and I am sure you will listen to them with the attention they deserve. There is not a doubt,—and I shall show it you,—that the production complained of was written after one of the most extraordinary and melancholy events that can possibly take place in any country. It originated and is founded upon the calamitous events, which took place in Dublin on the 23rd of July last. It is a description of that event, and was sent for publication to the person who is now under prosecution. Mr. Attorney-general says, that, whether Mr. Cobbett is the author, or whether he is merely the publisher, he is equally culpable. For my own part, I am fully convinced that Mr. Cobbett is not the author of this publication; but, whether he is or is not, you are to try it entirely by its own intrinsic merits. “But,” says Mr. Attorney-General, “you have had evidence, that a person bought the papers ‘in Pall Mall and in Bow-Street, down to the very day of the trial.’ This is very true, gentlemen, but you have had no evidence that Mr. Cobbett had any share in the publication of them. The witness merely stated, that the papers were sold by two persons; not that they were sold by Mr. Cobbett.—Mr. Attorney-General has thought proper to enter into a long panegyric on the political merits of the earl of Hardwicke. Now, I must say, that I conceive the Attorney-general has no right to give you his private opinion of the merits of the earl of Hardwicke, or of any servant of the crown, seeing that, from his official situation, I should stand on unequal grounds, if I were to state my opinion in opposition to the opinion of his majesty’s Attorney-general. You must, therefore, discard all such evidence from your minds, and solely decide upon the merits of the case, from the evidence which you have already heard, and from that which I shall presently call to the character and conduct of the present defendant.

And this circumstance now leads me, very shortly, to state for your consideration, a few facts and observations relative to the character of the person before you. My learned friend has, in a vein of irony, alluded to Mr. Cobbett’s “illustrious descent.” Gentlemen, Mr. Cobbett does not merit such allusions. Mr. Cobbett is no vain boaster; he does not boast and has never boasted, of his pretensions in that respect. Mr. Cobbett is a person who, for a long period of time, both in America and in this country, has discharged the duties of a public writer; a station, which is one of the most important in the community, and if a man conducts himself in it with talent and with integrity, and according to the strict principles of the constitution, is also one of the most respectable and most honourable. To prove to you, that Mr. Cobbett has not boasted of his high descent, I will quote you a passage from one of his publications printed in America, where, on account of the slanders that were heaped on him, because he stood forward in defence of his country, he was compelled, in some sort, to publish a sketch of his life, in which sketch he concludes the description of his birth and parentage with saying “if from ‘my ancestors I derive no honour, I derive no shame.’” He was, as he there states, the son of a farmer, and the grandson of a day-labourer. He had no education but what was acquired in the hours of relaxation from the toils of the field. He there says, and greatly to his honour, that he cannot remember the time when he did not earn his living. His father’s house he quitted at a very early age. He has been in many parts of the world; constantly acquiring information, constantly walking in the path of integrity and honour, and constantly a strenuous defender of his country, against all her enemies. In several branches of science, and those not the least difficult, he has shown himself capable of excelling, notwithstanding he has had no aid from others, and is self-taught even in the grammar of his native language—that language which he uses with a degree of acuteness, precision, and force, rarely to be met with in the writings of his contemporaries. Without any other guide than the purity and firmness of his own mind, he became, in a foreign country, and at a most critical juncture, the champion, almost the sole defender of the interests and honour of his country; and, this course of conduct he can be proved to have pursued during the whole of his political life.

Gentlemen, would not this species of character, which I could trace back to the hour when Mr. Cobbett left his father's house—

Lord Ellenborough.—I conclude you mean this only as evidence to general character. As such, I have no objection to your taking a free range.

Mr. Adam.—I will draw your attention, gentlemen, to another passage or two of the publication from which I have already quoted. Mr. Cobbett says: “to be descended from an illustrious family certainly reflects honour on any man, in spite of the sans-culotte principles of the present day. This is, however, an honour that I have no pretension to. All that I can boast of, in my birth, is, that I was born in Old England; the country whence came the men who explored and settled North America; the country of Penn, and of all those to whom this country is indebted. With respect to my ancestors, I shall go no farther back than my grandfather, and for this plain reason, that I never heard talk of any prior to him.—He was a day-labourer, and I have heard my father say, that he worked for one farmer from the day of his marriage to that of his death, upwards of forty years.” Now, gentlemen, was it proper to insinuate to you, that Mr. Cobbett is a person of excessive vanity, of disgusting ostentation on the topic of his birth. He describes his father as a farmer in moderate circumstances, and himself as one who was destined to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. And, you will observe well, gentlemen, that he never has, in any part of his voluminous productions, ever uttered one phrase, expressive of contempt for rank, dignity, or birth; but has, on the contrary, always been the champion of the privileged orders, and, of course, the strenuous opposer of every democratical institution.

I beg leave to trouble you, gentlemen, with one more quotation. “People,” says Mr. Cobbett, “may say what they please about the misery of the French peasantry, under the old form of government; I have conversed with thousands of those peasants, not one of whom did not regret the change. I have not room here to go into an inquiry into the causes that have led these people to become the passive instruments, the slaves, of a set of tyrants, such as the world never saw before; but, I venture to predict, that sooner or later, they will return to that form of government, under which they were happy, and under which only they ever can be so again.” I have read this passage, gentlemen, in order to satisfy you, that Mr. Cobbett is not only the friend of good government in this, but in every other country. Mr. Cobbett is no party writer, but he writes purely from a spirit and principle of his own. And if those whom he supports should think proper to take leave of their principles, they would soon find Mr. Cobbett take leave of them. You have before you a person writing on public affairs, without any control. Mr. Cobbett, gentlemen, has no control of purse hanging over him. Who ever may have been the author of the libel in question, Mr. Cobbett in publishing it has not suffered his general character to be injured by it. It is impossible to impute to Mr. Cobbett any deviation from those principles upon which he has uniformly acted.

Now, gentlemen, let us examine a little the publication before us. It consists of a series of letters written on the subject of the insurrection in Ireland of the 23rd of July last. The writer avows his object to be “the support of good government in Ireland, and the removal of the present administration.” Now, gentlemen, I humbly submit to you, that this is a fair and legitimate object. I have farther to submit to you, that this is not a question of judicial malversation. In those parts of the libel which relate to my lord Redesdale, there is no ground whatever for drawing that inuendo. You will see that there are two judicial characters introduced, my lord Redesdale and Mr. Justice Osborne. Throughout the whole publication you will not find any matter stated relating to the distribution of justice. The libel on Mr. Justice Osborne relates entirely to his political and not his judicial character. The whole applies to Mr. Justice Osborne as addressing a grand jury; and it is well known that addresses to grand juries have frequently been made the subject of public animadversion. There is a wonderful difference between calling in question the charge of a judge to a grand jury, and attacking him in the seat of justice. Gentlemen, the same observations apply generally to my lord Redesdale.—With respect to lord Hardwicke, it is almost unnecessary for me to tell you, that what is said of his lordship is entirely in his political character.

I shall now shortly call your attention to the different parts of the libel, but, before I do so, I am anxious to make one observation. You will perceive, that the object of this publication is a public one, that it has for its object the finding fault with the conduct of those who are at the head of the government in Ireland, that it has for its object the removal of that government, and that it expresses an anxious desire that that government should be placed in the hands of those who are able, by their abilities and their firmness, to put a period to the rebellion. In every part of the publication, the conduct of the rebels is held up to the severest reprobation; and when you consider, that the tenor of the publication agrees with the general conduct of the defendant for twelve long years both in this country and in America, I am sure, gentlemen, you will pause, before you consent to attribute to him the motives with which he is charged in the information.

Gentlemen, the first part of the libel is what relates to my lord Hardwicke. It represents the head of his excellency to be a wooden one, and intimates that he is an improper person to be at the head of the Irish government. Now, Mr. Attorney General tells us, that Ireland is better provided with fleets and with armies, than it ever was at any former period. It may be true, that Ireland has a larger army and more numerous fleets than at any former period, but I submit to you, that it is perfectly fair, in a free country like this, to descant on the fitness or unfitness of public men for the situations they hold. It merely says, "you have supplied us with fleets, you have supplied us with armies, but you have not supplied us with a proper person at the head of the government." If we look round to public characters we shall find that there has been no minister or member of parliament who has not, at times, been the object of public animadversion. But in these cases you are bound to prove the bad disposition with which the libel was written, you are bound to prove the malus animus of it. And if we read on, we shall find, in the second extract, that, so far from its deserving to be considered in the light which Mr. Attorney General has stated to you, there cannot be a higher description of any man, than the one here given to my lord Hardwicke. The writer says, "Inquiry and research are the duty and the resource of the ignorant, and therefore I did inquire. The result of no small attention bestowed in this pursuit was, that I discovered of our viceroy, that he was in rank an earl, in manners a gentleman, in morals a good father, and a kind husband." Here then, lord Hardwicke is held up as having all those good qualities which every one who has the happiness of being acquainted with his lordship are ready to allow him. He goes on to state, "that he had a good library in St. James's-square, and that he further learned from a Mr. Lindsay, that my lord Hardwicke was celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening a sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire." I submit to you, gentlemen, that if lord Hardwicke is merely held up as a feeder of sheep, in addition to all those private virtues, it is impossible for you to say, that the object of this publication is to destroy the government of Ireland. No, gentlemen; it was written with the impression, that Ireland possessing those numerous fleets and those immense armies, ought also to have a person of great political character at the head of her government; and that, as my lord Hardwicke was not a political character in his own country, he was, therefore, not a proper person to be sent over to Ireland. It means, that you ought to have sent over a man of a political mind, one who, by the powers of that mind, was capable of giving efficacy to all the operations of government. Gentlemen, is not this the plain intent and meaning of the passage? I, therefore, humbly submit to you, that, taken by itself, it can never be supposed to be a libel to the conviction of Mr. Cobbett.—The next passage begins thus: "Suppose that, by some unfortunate combination of events, this little island should be deeply shaken by insurrection within, and should be loudly menaced by invasion from without. Suppose a powerful fleet of the enemies of the British name lay to windward, filled with troops for landing, while a desperate band of ruffians were secretly arming in its bosom, ready to aid the landing of a foreign enemy:"—Now, gentlemen, I do conjure you to consider attentively this part of the subject. The writer is supposing Ireland to be deeply shaken by insurrection within and and loudly menaced by invasion from without:—He then holds them out as a desperate band of ruffians; when he contemplates the rebels, he brands them with the epithet of ruffians. The writer then goes on to say: "Suppose in this distress, a committee of West-India proprietors, whose money had been vested in this little island, should apply to doctor Addington for assistance: and suppose he were to rise up, and to desire them to quit their apprehensions, for that he had entrusted the care of their island to a very eminent sheep-feeder from Cambridgeshire, who was to be assisted in all his councils by a very able and strong built chancery pleader from Lincoln's Inn." Now, gentlemen, this certainly is ridicule, and ridicule I contend, is a weapon which may be fairly and honourably employed, especially when it is in the true spirit of English humour and for an object purely of a public nature. The bestowing of nick-names is a practice to which Englishmen are peculiarly addicted.—We have all heard of Carlo Khan with the India-house on his back, and of the colossus of the North represented with one foot on Berwick Bridge, and the other on the Orkneys. In the present instance, lord Hardwicke is again represented as a person devoted to agricultural pursuits—

Lord Ellenborough.—Do you maintain that a person has a right to ridicule his neighbour?

Mr. Adam.—This is an information for a public libel, and not for private ridicule.

Lord Ellenborough.—I suppose you have some authority. I do not wish to restrain your arguments, but it is a doctrine which never was and never can be maintained.

Mr. Adam, after going at length into the various passages commented upon by the attorney-general, and contending that they merely contained ridicule, and were written with the fair view of procuring the removal of what the author considered the inefficient servants of the crown, concluded his speech in the following words:—Gentlemen, I have now gone through the several parts of the publication. I know that in your justice and your wisdom you will deal uprightly with my client. In the course of my address to you, I took occasion to allude to the evidence which I should call in behalf of the defendant. I know that evidence can only be received as to general character. But, I trust, in the present case, it will be admissible, in order to rebut the charge of endeavouring to overthrow the government of Ireland. Gentlemen, I shall prove to you by lord Henry Stewart, who was acquainted with Mr. Cobbett in America, and by several gentlemen of the first respectability, who have known him ever since his return to this country, that the whole tenor of his life has been an adherence to the principles of good government, and to the cause of his country. Now, gentlemen, of what is Mr. Cobbett accused? Of sending a libel into the world, calculated to overturn the government of Ireland as by law established; and, consequently, the species of evidence I am about to produce, must have a considerable effect inasmuch as it will show that the defendant is incapable of the crime attributed to him. Gentlemen, I leave the cause in your hands, confident that the verdict of an upright jury of independent Englishmen, will acquit the defendant of the criminality imputed to him, and relieve him and his family from the distress which at present hangs over them.

EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENDANT.

Robert Liston, esq. sworn.—Examined by Mr. Richardson.

I believe, sir, you held the situation of British minister in America?—I did; from the year 1796 to 1800.

Were you personally acquainted with Mr. Cobbett the defendant?—I was.

Were you acquainted with his general character and conduct?—I was.

From your knowledge on that subject, what was his general character and conduct?—Eminently excellent.

What was his general character as to loyalty and attachment to the constitution?—That of a zealous defender of the principles of the constitution in all its branches.

Robert Liston, esq. cross-examined by the Attorney General.

Is Mr. Cobbett one of the last men you know who would publish a libel against the government under which he lived?—Do you mean with regard to America?

You think, then, that he might be induced to publish a libel against any other government than his own?—I cannot answer for that.

Is he not a man likely to libel a government he was not living under?—He might be induced to do it. Mr. Cobbett is a gentleman possessing an ardent mind, and he might be induced to libel a government under which he was not living, always excepting his own.

Lord Henry Stewart sworn.—Examined by Mr. Richardson.

I believe your lordship resided with Mr. Liston whilst he was British minister in America?—I did.

Were you acquainted with Mr. Cobbett there?—I knew him well.

Will your lordship have the goodness to state what you know of him?—He is a man the most devotedly attached to the king, the royal family, and to every branch of the constitution.

How long have you been acquainted with the defendant, Mr. Cobbett?—Ever since his return to this country, which was, I believe, in 1800.

During that time, what has been your opinion of him, with respect to his loyalty and attachment to the constitution?—I can speak of him much to the same effect as the last witness. I should consider him as a person of an attachment quite devoted to the king and constitution of this country.

You have been acquainted, my lord, with the defendant?—Ever since my return to this country in 1801.

Will your lordship state what you know of him?—I am perfectly satisfied, with the former witnesses, that he is decidedly attached both to the sovereign and the constitution of this country.

Have you been long acquainted with Mr. Cobbett?—Ever since June, 1802.

Are you generally acquainted with his character and conduct?—I know some particular instances of his conduct, which induce me to think that he is a zealous supporter of the monarchy and the constitution.

Have any recent instances occurred to support your opinion?—The particular instances I allude to, took place previous to July last.

John Reeves, esq. sworn.—Examined by Mr. Richardson.

Are you acquainted with the defendant, Mr. Cobbett?—I am.

Have you any particular reasons to be acquainted with his character?—I have. I see Mr. Cobbett very frequently. Generally two or three times a week. I conceive him to be a strong defender of the king and constitution, as by law established.

The evidence being closed on the part of the defendant,

The Attorney General rose in reply, and addressed the Court to the following effect; I hope, gentlemen, it will not be necessary for me to lengthen out the attention which you have already given to this important subject. I trust, however, I shall be permitted to say a few words in reply to some parts of the speech of my learned friend. No small portion of that speech was taken up with a description of Mr. Cobbett's general character. I have no business here with his general character or past life. I have no business to inquire whether, when living in America, he was a strenuous supporter of the interests of Great Britain. There is not one word of this information that charges him with a contrary line of conduct. The question is, whether this "ardent-minded man," as Mr. Liston described him, has not been induced to publish an abominable libel against the government of Ireland? Not a tittle of evidence has been brought by those respectable gentlemen who appeared to his character, to prove the contrary; and, notwithstanding his having formerly acted upon different principles, I am entitled to say, that if he wilfully and knowingly published the letters in question he is as gross a libeller as ever came into a court of justice.

I stated distinctly, that I was no enemy whatever to a fair discussion of public men and public measures. And if the character of the different governments of this country be considered, I am persuaded it will be found, that the principle of liberality has been extended full as much as at any former period. In saying this, I take no merit whatever to myself. In doing so I was persuaded I was following that line of conduct which was useful both to the government and the people. But, is it to be argued from this, because much has been tolerated, that therefore, a doctrine so monstrous as that which my learned friend has laid down should be acted upon; namely, that no attack upon government ought to be made the subject of criminal animadversion? I say, this is a monstrous proposition; and if it is once supported by the authority of a British jury and British lawyers, it will lead to the absolute destruction of the liberty of the press. Gentlemen, I certainly admit that this free discussion of public measures should be open and uncontrolled, and not subject to the taste of any attorney-general; but I submit to your consideration, whether these passages of ridicule in the publication in question are libellous or not? The mere circumstance of making any man ridiculous is a decided libel; and is it to be contended, that, because a man is exalted to a public situation, he is, therefore, to be libelled with impunity? If, as I said before, this libel consisted in calling Mr. Addington, "doctor Addington," my lord Hardwicke "a sheep feeder," or my lord Redesdale "a chancery pleader,"—I never should have thought of troubling you on such an occasion. But, when I see the whole administration of a country attacked, individually and personally, and their characters held up to the detestation of the public, I cannot help concluding, that there is an intention to do mischief to the government of that country, as well as to the lives of all those who live under that government. With respect to Mr. Justice Osborne, will any one pretend to say, that it was merely in his political character that he was attacked? What does he mean when he says, "I may, I believe add, what men also say; that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty, should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr. Marsden, in order to screen them from public disgrace, we might then look for another, but not less fatal end to our liberties, and to our constitution, than that which rebellion or invasion could produce." Is not this a dreadful charge indeed? The following passage is to the same effect. "Whatever the present government may have manifested, the opinion of that government is known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice." Is not this a direct charge, that the present government of Ireland were influenced by motives very different from those of general justice.—With respect to the comparison of the "wooden horse," and the flippancy of "the sheep-feeder from Cambridgeshire," no man alive can say that a character placed in such an exalted situation by his sovereign, ought to be made the sport of ridicule of this sort. We are told, that Mr. Cobbett is very fond of the monarchy; that is to say, he would strip the monarchy of all its officers. This is the way in which this "ardent minded man," this "moral politician" would support the government!—But, gentlemen, you must not stop here; for the author has not stopped here. He says, that "lord Kenyon, therefore, as chancellor, never would have made any rule or order by the effects of which, the secretary of the master of the rolls would be deprived of all fees, for the purpose of throwing all those fees into the hands of the secretary to the chancellor, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits." Meaning thereby, that lord Redesdale, as chancellor, has done all this.—My learned friend has passed over the last part of the libel, which insinuates, that lord Redesdale has "employed his leisure in searching into offices for practices, by which he might harass the domestic arrangement of others, whose pride and integrity would not bend to his views." And how does my learned friend leave this? Why, he says, that you do not know exactly what it means. I suppose, then, that the "spargere voces in vulgum ambiguas" is all gone by. But, notwithstanding what my learned friend tells you, I will venture to say, that it is impossible to ascribe to this passage any good meaning, and I trust that you gentlemen, will have the same sense of its atrocity as I have. What! because Mr. Cobbett has been twelve years before the public without a prosecution; because he has manifested in America and elsewhere a spirit of loyalty, is he to have a complete indemnity for the publication of such gross libels as those before you?—Gentlemen, I shall not trouble you with any farther observations. The merits of the case are now before you. If my lord tells you it is a libel, you may still judge of the facts. If you think conscientiously that it is not a libel, if you think that this is the way in which governments are to be treated, you will, of course, acquit the defendant.

SUMMING UP.

Lord Ellenborough.—Gentlemen of the Jury; The evidence on both sides, and the arguments of the counsel being now closed, it remains for us to discharge the respective duties which the laws of the country have cast upon us. I never doubted that an English jury had the right of judging in these cases, not only of the fact of publication, but also of the nature and construction of the thing published; and the noble person, whose place I so unworthily fill, entertained the same sentiments.* The act of parliament which has been alluded to, is merely declaratory, and, had it not passed, I should nevertheless have submitted the whole case to your consideration. On the three following points you have to exercise your judgment: first, the preliminary allegations and innuendos; next, the fact of publication; and thirdly, the quality and sense of the thing published. This is the matter at issue.

Upon the subject of libel, it may be as well for me to observe, before I enter upon the question, that, by the law of England, there is no impunity to any person publishing any thing that is injurious to the feelings and happiness of an individual, or prejudicial to the general interests of the state. Gentlemen, the law of England is a law of liberty, and, consistently with this liberty, we have not what is called an imprimatur; there is no such preliminary licence necessary. But, if a man publish a paper, he is exposed to the penal consequences, as he is in every other act, if it be illegal; and it is illegal, if it tends to the prejudice of any individual. Now, therefore, applying this doctrine to the publication before us, the question for your consideration is, whether this paper is such as would be injurious to the individuals, and whether it is calculated to be injurious to the particular interests of the country? It is no new doctrine, that if a publication be calculated to alienate the affections of the people, by bringing the government into disesteem, whether the expedient be by ridicule or obloquy, the person so conducting himself is exposed to the inflictions of the law. It is a crime. It has ever been considered as a crime; whether it be wrapped in one form or in another. The case of the King v. Tutchin,* decided in the time of lord chief justice Holt, has removed all ambiguity from this question; and, although at the period when that case was decided, great political contentions existed, the matter was not again brought before the judges of the Court by any application for a new trial.

Having said thus much on the general law of libels, let us apply it to the case before us. It has been proved to you, that Mr. Cobbett is the sole proprietor of the publication; that lord Hardwicke and the other characters mentioned hold the several offices in Ireland attributed to them; and that the publication was sold by Richard Bagshaw, in Bow-street, Covent Garden, both on the days of publication, and also so late down as Tuesday last. The reason of purchasing this second copy on Tuesday last, is to show you, that Mr. Cobbett persevered in the sale of the libels to the very last. Mr. Crowe has proved to you, that by the “Cambridgeshire earl” was meant lord Hardwicke, and that the appellation of “chancery pleader” was intended to designate lord Redesdale.

Gentlemen, the several innuendoes in the papers being thus proved, let us a little consider their quality and context. The first paper begins thus: “Equo ne credite Teucris, was the advice which, in a dangerous moment, Laocoon gave to the Trojans. It will be remembered that the equus against which that sagacious adviser cautioned his countrymen, was a wooden one. His countrymen did not regard Laocoon; they received the wooden representative of wisdom; they approached it as if it possessed authority and power. Its wooden head towered above their houses. But though the machine itself was of innoxious wood, the credulous Trojans found its hollow head and exalted sides, nothing less than receptacles for greedy peculators and blood-thirsty assassins. The ingenious author of the story did not mean to confine the lesson which it inculcates, to the tale of Troy alone; he meant to take advantage of the easy metaphorical expression, which, by the common assent of mankind, had moulded itself into most languages, and by which a certain species of heads (which the moderns have ascertained to be a non-conductor of ideas) has been denominated a wooden head. He meant to caution future nations, not to put trust or confidence in the apparent innocence of any such wooden instrument; and not to suffer themselves to be led to exalt it into consequence, or to pay it any respect.” Can there be any other meaning in this, than to impress the people of Ireland with a contemptible opinion of the abilities of lord Hardwicke? And, gentlemen, if that is the meaning and intention of the publication, it is a libel; for no man has a right to render the person or abilities of another ridiculous, not only in publications, but if the peace and welfare of individuals, or of society, be interrupted, or even exposed by types and figures, the act, by the law of England, is a libel. Then he goes on to say, "that any people who submitted to be governed by a wooden head, would not find their security in its supposed innoxiousness, as its hollowness would soon be occupied by instruments of mischief." Submitted! Is not this instigating the people of Ireland to rebellion? For, in what way, but by acts of open violence can they avoid "submitting" to the government which is set over them?—Then he goes on: "When I found, sir, this portion of the kingdom overwhelmed by such consequences to our property, as the rapacity of Mr. Marsden and his friends, and such consequences to our lives, as the pikes of Mr. Emmet and his friends, have lately produced; when I could trace all these evils as the inevitable issue from the head and body of such a government as that of lord Hardwicke, and I am told of his innocuousness and his firmness, I still reply the story of the wooden horse, and I shall still, notwithstanding the fate of Laocoon, raise my voice to my countrymen, and cry, Equo ne credite Teucris. Not, sir, that I would be understood literally. I do not mean to assert the head of my lord Hardwicke is absolutely built of timber. My application, like that of the original author of the tale, is only metaphorical. Yet, at the same time, I cannot avoid suspecting, that if the head of his excellency were submitted to the analysis of any such investigator of nature as Lavoisier, it would be found to contain a superabundant portion of particles of a very ligneous tendency. This, sir, is the lord Hardwicke of doctor Addington, against whose government 'not a murmur of complaint has been heard'—While our property has been subject to the plunder of his clerks, and our persons have been exposed to the pikes of the rebels." Now, the libels in this sentence are these: first, it is stated, of Mr. Marsden, that he is a rapacious man; then the author goes on to say, that he could trace all the evils which the pikes of Mr. Emmet and his friends have lately produced, as the inevitable issue from the head and body of such a government as that of lord Hardwicke. He admits this noble person to be celebrated for "understanding the modern method of fattening a sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire." Now, gentlemen, what does this mean? Does it not clearly mean to infer, that lord Hardwicke is ill-placed in his high situation, and that he is only fit for the common walks of life?—There is another part of the libel to which I wish to draw your attention. The author says, "What! Is he one of the tribe of the Hobarts, Westmorelands, and Camdens? Is he one of that tribe, who have been sent over to us to be trained up here into politicians, as they train the surgeons apprentices in the hospitals, by setting them first to bleed the pauper patients? Is this the time for a continuation of such experiments?" What does the whole of this mean? Is it not saying, that lord Hardwicke was sent over by his majesty to the people of Ireland, merely to be trained up into a politician, as they train surgeons apprentices in the hospitals, by setting them first to bleed the pauper patients? It is for you to say, whether such is not the obvious sense of this sentence.

There is one other part of the publication to which I am desirous of drawing your attention; it relates to the imputation on lord Redesdale: it says, that "the opinion of the present government is known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice." Amongst so many passages of this description, it is hardly necessary to call your attention to particular instances; one or two more I shall, however, briefly mention. "With what amazement," says he, "the grand jury must have received such a broadside, poured upon the truth of the fact, I cannot, as I was not present, know; but I can very well imagine what the feelings of 23 well-informed gentlemen must have been." Is it to be endured, that it should be said of any person, but, more especially of a person sitting in the capacity of a judge, that he had poured a broadside upon the truth of the fact? Then it goes on; "in truth, they say, that, except as to momentary effects, rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference, if it can be supposed, that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice." Is not this saying, that rebellion and invasion may be viewed with indifference? And is not the whole of the sentence connected with what was said before?—It then says, "It was said of lord Kenyon, that he loved money; if so, he loved his own money only, and not the money of any other man." Which is saying, as was observed to you before, that lord Redesdale is fond of the money of other men.—The last passage I shall call to your attention is this: "Lord Kenyon, therefore, as chancellor, never would have made any rule or order, by the effects of which, the secretary of a master of the rolls would be deprived of all fees, for the purpose of throwing all those fees into the hands of the secretary to the chancellor, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits." Contrasting lord Kenyon with lord Redesdale, this passage clearly imports, that lord Redesdale, as chancellor, did make a rule or order, by the effects of which, the secretary to the master of the rolls was deprived of all his fees, for the purpose of throwing those fees into the hands of the secretary to the chancellor, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits.

Gentlemen, such is the publication before you. It is to speak for itself in its plain sense. The question for you to consider, if it can be a question, is, whether these libels (when I call them libels I am anticipating your decision) are capable of any other construction than what has been put upon them? It has been stated of the defendant, that he is a self-taught politician. Gentlemen, no man can write without control. It is necessary he should know, that every man must be controlled by law. It has been observed, that it is the right of the British subject, to exhibit the folly or imbecility of the members of the government. But, gentlemen, we must confine ourselves within limits. If, in so doing, individual feelings are violated, there the line of interdiction begins, and the offence becomes the subject of penal visitation. Evidence to character has been produced on the part of the defendant. But the effect of character is, to render the charge doubtful. As to the fact of publication, in the present case there can be no doubt whatever. If you are of opinion that the publications are hurtful to the individuals or to the government, you will find the defendant guilty; if, on the contrary, you consider them neither destructive of the peace of the one or the other, you will acquit him of the charges under this information.

The jury, after a pause of about ten minutes, delivered their verdict—Guilty.

The defendant, who afterwards on the trial of the honourable Robert Johnson, for being the author of the letters which were the subject of this prosecution, appeared as a witness for the Crown, was never called upon to receive sentence, on this conviction.

of the affairs and government of Ireland at the time of the said trial of the said Robert Emmet which same false scandalous malicious and defamatory libel was and is in a certain part thereof as follows to wit "From a rare modesty of nature or from a rare precision of self-knowledge lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "would have acted with reserve and circumspection on his arrival in a country" (meaning the country of Ireland) "with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which and with their persons manners and individual characters and connexions he must have been utterly unacquainted In such a country torn by domestic sedition and treason threatened with foreign invasion and acting since the union under an untried constitution if doctor Addington had required that lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon deceased) "should direct a Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke so being lieutenant general and also governor general of that part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland as aforesaid) "in all his councils lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "would as soon at the desire of lord St. Vincent have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles Particularly the integrity of lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "would have shrunk from such an undertaking if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the country should upon any account be consulted His pride would have spurned at the undertaking if he were told that to the Cambridgeshire earl" (again meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke so being lieutenant-general and also governor-general of that part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland as aforesaid) "and himself in the cares of government" (meaning the government of Ireland) "a clerk in the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers" (meaning that the said William Conyngham was one of these lawyers) "without political habits political information or honourable connexion were to be joined as assessors and to be the only assessors And lord Kenyon's" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon's) "pride and integrity would have both joined in preventing him from being himself the instrument of introducing such men into a cabinet of government If any one man could be found" (meaning that the said William Conyngham was that man) "of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country" (meaning the said Robert Emmet) "had in the moment of his conviction and sentence" (meaning the aforesaid conviction of the said Robert Emmet of high treason and his said sentence thereupon) "uttered the following apostrophe—"That viper" (meaning the said William Conyngham) "whom my father nourished! He it was from whose lips I first imbibed those principles and doctrines which now by their effects drag me to my grave" (meaning that the said Robert Emmet had first imbibed principles and doctrines from the said William Conyngham which by their effects led him to commit high treason) "and he it is who is now brought forward as my prosecutor and who by an unheard of exercise of the prerogative has wantonly lashed with a speech to evidence" (meaning the observations upon the evidence given on the said trial of the said Robert Emmet so as aforesaid made by the said William Conyngham) "the dying son of his former friend when that dying son had produced no evidence had made no defence but on the contrary had acknowledged the charge and had submitted to his fate" (meaning thereby that the said William Conyngham had acted in the manner above described in the said libel) "Lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "would have turned with horror from such a scene in which although guilt was in one part to be punished yet in the whole drama justice was confounded humanity outraged and loyalty insulted Of lord Kenyon therefore (Cambricus must well know) it never could have been believed that he himself would lead such a character" (meaning the said William Conyngham) "forward introduce him" (meaning the said William Conyngham) "to the favour of a deceived sovereign clothe him" (meaning the said William Conyngham) "in robes and load him" (meaning the said William Conyngham) "with the emoluments of office" (meaning the said office of solicitor-general of our said lord the king of Ireland) "Lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "must have known that a noble duke for having toasted at a drunken club in a common tavern to a noisy rabble 'the sovereignty of the people' was struck by his majesty's command out of the privy council and deprived of all his offices both civil and military If therefore any man were to be found" (meaning that the said William Conyngham was that man) "who not at a drunken club or to a brawling rabble but in a grave and high assembly" (meaning the said Commons House of Parliament in Ireland) "not in the character of an inebriated toast-master but in that of a sober constitutional lawyer had insisted on the sovereignty of the people as a first principle of the English law and had declared that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament to that of the tellers of the nation and that if a particular law were disagreeable to the people however it might have been enacted with all royal and parliamentary solemnity nevertheless it was not binding and the people by the general law were exempted from obedience to such a particular law because the people were the supreme and ultimate judges of what was for their own benefit" (meaning that the said William Conyngham had delivered such opinions as are above set forth in the said libel in the Commons House of Parliament in Ireland) "Lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late lord Kenyon) "if he had been chancellor in any kingdom in Europe would have shrunk from recommending any such man to the favour of a monarch while there yet remained a shadow of monarchy visible in the world"

2d. scandal infamy and contempt on the tenth day of December in the said year of our lord one thousand eight hundred and three at Westminster aforesaid in the said county of Middlesex did falsely and maliciously publish a certain other false scandalous malicious and defamatory libel of and concerning the said William Conyngham and of and concerning his conduct as a barrister at law upon the said trial of the said Robert Emmet and of and concerning the opinion which it is asserted in the same libel the said late lord Kenyon would have entertained of the said William Conyngham and of his conduct at that trial which same false scandalous malicious and defamatory libel was and is in a certain part thereof as follows "If any one man could be found" (meaning that the said William Conyngham was that man) "of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly-offended laws of his country" (meaning the said Robert Emmet) "had in the moment of his conviction and sentence" (meaning the aforesaid conviction of the said Robert Emmet of high treason and his said sentence thereupon) "uttered the following apostrophe 'That viper!' (meaning the said William Conyngham) 'whom my father nourished! our said lord the king of Ireland) By reason of the publishing of which said several false scandalous malicious and defamatory libels the said William Conyngham is much injured in his credit and reputation and brought into great disgrace and contempt and is much prejudiced in his said profession of a barrister at law and has lost divers great gains and profits which he would otherwise have derived therefrom and has lost the esteem and respect of many of his friends and acquaintance to wit at Westminster aforesaid in the said county of Middlesex Whereupon the said William Conyngham saith he is injured, and has sustained damage to the value of ten thousand pounds And therefore he brings suit, &c.

After the declaration had been read,

The Hon. Thomas Erskine addressed the Court and Jury as follows:

My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury.—Independently of the panel annexed to the record, which enabled me to see that I was before the same jury who, the day before yesterday, tried the defendant for a libel on his majesty's government of Ireland, I could not help observing, from my familiarity with your features, that I was in that situation; a situation which the defendant could have prevented, had he thought proper, because being called upon to answer in an action for slander, it was in his power to have selected another jury, either by a particular application to the court, or by availing himself of his right to expunge from the panel the names of any persons whom he might dislike. But, gentlemen, I am not sure that he has not made a prudent choice, in having the same persons to try him a second time; because it affords him the opportunity of introducing himself to your attention by the character which has been given him with regard to his talents, his education, his morals, and his attachment to the constitution of the country. So far, therefore, am I from wishing you to forget that the defendant is not a low, obscure, contemptible, and uninteresting individual, I am rather desirous that you should contemplate him, as he has been described by his counsel, a gentleman of great talents, possessing the advantage of a powerful and energetic mode of expressing his sentiments in writing; one who well knows how to wield that useful weapon, the pen—that weapon so dangerous when not restrained by morality and by law; one who having raised himself from humble parentage by his intellectual endowments, ought to have recollected, that others who had done the same were as jealous as himself of their fair fame, reputation, and the esteem of the world.

Gentlemen, the defendant, Mr. Cobbett, is called upon to answer for part of the same libel which was laid before you the other day, at the instance of the crown; for, by the mode of libelling which Mr. Cobbett has adopted, he takes care to throw far and wide his slander, and has thereby rendered it necessary for an individual who has been grievously calumniated, to come forward in vindication of himself against an attack upon his character, through the medium of the magistracy, and the situation which he holds as solicitor general of that part of the United Kingdom, called Ireland. It is not for me to enter into the considerations which determined you in your former verdict; but I confess, it appeared extraordinary to me to hear it stated by the defendant's counsel, that the libel was dictated by a regard for his majesty's government and a zeal for the constitution of the country, when, at the same time, the author describes that part of the United Kingdom as brought into peril by sedition and rebellion, and shaken to its centre by intestine commotions, and, by way of curing that strife and discord, represents his sovereign whom he professes to love, but whom he cannot love if he is guilty of the libel before you, as employing his executive authority at this awful juncture, in selecting persons who, so far from having the capacity to govern a country, are not fit to be constables for the meanest parish.

Because a person in Lord Hardwicke's situation chooses to devote his leisure hours to agricultural pursuits, Mr. Cobbett represents him as a nobleman, "having a good library in St. James's-square, and celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening a sheep as well as any man in Cambridgeshire." He takes the same liberty with another noble lord with whom we are all well acquainted. I mean lord Redesdale; who is represented as "a very able and strong-built chancery pleader from Lincoln's-inn." Now, gentlemen, is it a disgrace to a man to be a feeder of sheep in Cambridgeshire, or a chancery pleader? Yet, in this strain of ridicule does Mr. Cobbett treat them, for the purpose of making the world believe, that they are unfit persons for the situations their sovereign has called them to fill. In this way he thinks fit to stab, and destroy, the characters of these noblemen, and to inflict such a wound, such a dastardly and malignant wound, that I should change my opinion of you, gentlemen,—and I should be sorry to do so, after so many years acquaintance with most of your countenances—if, after hearing what I shall have to address to you, you could suffer such a libeller to go out of this court unpunished.

Gentlemen, this is a civil action; I therefore trust that you will not suffer your minds to be distracted by those important considerations of the liberty of the press, which have so often agitated parliament and courts of justice. It would ill become me to say any thing against that sacred privilege; seeing that I consider it as almost the only honour of my humble life, that I took an active part in framing the statute for its protection, and assisted the eminent statesmen who brought that law into parliament which was referred to on the former trial, and so ably commented upon by my learned friend Mr. Adam. The reason of that law was this; it never was disputed, it never can or will be disputed, that a man is entitled to that tranquillity, happiness, and peace of mind, which is the result of an honourable reputation, provided his conduct in life entitles him to it; there is implanted in every man's bosom an invincible sensibility to the opinion of his fellow creatures, which nothing can destroy: it is the foundation of all patriotism, the sentiment which rears states from infancy to maturity, the principle that makes men struggle for distinction, and keeps them in the straight paths of their duty when called to the high offices of magistracy; the laws of society therefore protect mankind in this dearest of all human blessings; and, if any man writes of another that which is injurious to him in his trade, profession, or character, or which tends to expose him to penalties, or brings him into contempt, it is libellous, and the law deems it an object of penal animadversion. To use the language of lord chief justice Holt, "words tending to scandalize magistrates or persons in public trust are more injurious than when spoken against private men," and for this obvious reason, that magistrates are placed on a pinnacle to which the public attention is directed; they know that the public have a right to call on them for an account of their conduct; whereas private men are known only among the circle of their own families or immediate friends.

In the case before you, my client is attacked not only as a private individual, but as a magistrate also; it is, however, necessary, that in appealing for satisfaction, he should come into this court erect in his integrity, and conscious of his innocence.—If he is the man Mr. Cobbett has represented him, it was for the defendant to have justified the libel and to have proved it;—but this he has not so much as attempted to do.—Had he done so with success, I would rather die than hold communion with an abandoned, profligate wretch, such as my client is here represented to be.—It never can have been said, that it was other than a question of law what was a libel which brought a man into contempt; it is a question of fact whether it has been written, and the meaning and intention of the author is also a question of fact.—With respect to libels which have a tendency to bring the government into contempt, the question of law is mixed with fact, upon which the judge is to state general principles, leaving the jury to draw their own conclusions.—It was not lord Mansfield who first departed from this rule; it had been departed from by judges before his time for so long a series, that his lordship considered juries, the moment the publication was proved, without any jurisdiction to consider its tendency, but bound to return their verdict for the crown.—The consequence of this was, that libellers became popular.—They made use of the office of jury as a stalking horse to cover iniquity; and it thereby became easy to confound the most essential and substantial privileges of the people with the worst offences. To remedy this evil the libel bill was brought in. It was a great satisfaction to my mind, to hear so eminent a person as the noble lord now on the bench, declare to you the other day, that, independently of this law, its principle is the one which he should have adopted. In the present case, I must first prove that the defendant published the libel; but, I shall not expect that you will give damages, unless I also prove, that this libel is of the most malignant, injurious, and destructive nature: that it might lead in its probable consequences to the premature death of the unfortunate person, my client, and that at all events, it strikes most deeply at his honour.

Before the publication of this libel, Mr. Robert Emmet, the son of an eminent physician in Ireland, and brother to a barrister, had mixed himself abroad with seditious persons, who had filled his mind with an enthusiastic notion, that the interest and happiness of Ireland could only be effected by a separation from Great Britain. He directed all his views to the accomplishment of this purpose. He avowed his design; he gloried in it when the sword of justice was lifted up against him; and when he was asked by the judge, why judgment should not be passed upon him, he entered into a declaration of his principles, and avowed his determination to die in defence of them. Lord Norbury, before whom he was tried, fearful of allowing him to avail himself of his situation to foment rebellion, interrupted the unfortunate young man more than once. Highly as every one must approve the conduct of the noble lord, it is, nevertheless, to be lamented, that it should have become necessary to have interrupted him; for, gentlemen, what will you say, when I tell you, that, to the confusion of this libeller, this unfortunate young man, after he retired, made this declaration, "that such had been the mildness of the government of lord Hardwicke, of which the defendant has spoken with such contempt, because the father of the late minister was a doctor—such, I say, had been its mildness, that he was obliged to push on the catastrophe that took place, lest there should have been an end of rebellion, by the causes of it having ceased." Mr. Emmet after he had been prevented from doing any more mischief, so far from complaining that he had been insulted by my client, Mr. Plunkett, openly acknowledged, that it was the wisdom, the moderation, the forbearance, the prudence, and the virtue of the government of lord Hardwicke, that were dissolving rebellion, like enchantment, by working in secret on the minds of a noble-minded people—Mr. Emmet could not wait, for fear the people should be divested of their insane prejudices. They were indeed induced to return to their duty and their allegiance, in the same manner as the mist is dispersed at the rising of the sun, not from its heat, but the benignity of its beams. Lord Hardwicke, gentlemen, has governed Ireland in a most excellent manner. I have some reason to be acquainted with his private character, as he married one of my nearest relations. He has conducted himself in Ireland with such mildness, that a change in the minds of the people has already begun to take place.—It is not by long speeches that the ruler of a nation discovers his ability to govern; it is not by sesquipedalia verba, nor by high-sounding eloquence.—In Ireland particularly, from circumstances which have occurred, the people require to be restrained with a delicate hand—Mr. Burke once said, speaking of America, “you should send her the angel of peace, but you are sending her the destroying angel.” The high characters to whom I allude also appear to have adopted, with respect to Ireland, what the great lord Chatham so well recommended when speaking of America—

“Be to her faults a little blind,
Be to her virtues ever kind,
Let all her ways be unconfin’d,
And clap the padlock on the mind.”

By acting upon this principle, the government of Ireland was daily reconciling the affections of the people; so much so, that Mr. Emmet thought, if he deferred his scheme of insurrection, it would be difficult at a future day to bring them up to the pitch of disaffection which was necessary to its success. The attempt was accordingly made. The result it is unnecessary for me to state. Mr. Plunkett, the plaintiff, was employed to assist the attorney-general in the prosecution against Mr. Emmet; and the case was so clear, that the counsel who were engaged for that unhappy person did not call any witnesses to protect him. Lord Norbury was of opinion, that this did not prevent the counsel for the crown from making observations to the jury. My client was far from desiring to treat with contempt or insult a man who was about to suffer death.—I do say therefore, and Mr. Cobbett was at liberty to prove the contrary if he could have done so, that Mr. Plunkett availed himself of this useful opportunity to warn others from the fate of this wretched young man.—He told them that if they expected France to assist them in the forming of their republic, they would find themselves dreadfully deceived; that the time was not far off when they would see that their leader was actuated by nothing but ambition, by a desire to aggrandize his own family, and a total forgetfulness of every thing that had animated the mind of the great Washington. Was not this the duty of the counsel of the crown? This is what Mr. Plunkett did. This is what I should have done in a similar situation. He made such observations as were calculated to redeem the people of Ireland to a love of their country and of its government. It was not with a view to Mr. Emmet alone that he addressed the jury, but that the scaffold might not bleed in vain.

Gentlemen, I am by no means desirous of calling in question the high character which was given of Mr. Cobbett on a former day; but if he be the lover of his country which he has been described to you, he must show his attachment by obedience to its laws. The defendant has not merely thrown out the ambiguas voces, but, day after day, this lover of the king's government has been writing and sending forth his libels into that distracted country. It is no defence to say, that Mr. Cobbett is an admirer of the king and constitution, if he is constantly libelling the ministers of that king, and transgressing the laws of that constitution. It is nothing for a man to say, “I believe in the merits of my Saviour; I reverence my religion and my God,” if he is hourly in the practice of breaking the commandments.—The defendant does not fall into sin from the infirmities of his nature. The Saviour of man has said, “by their fruits ye shall know them,” and by the libels which I am about to read, you will be enabled to judge of Mr. Cobbett. Although, as I have shown to you, Mr. Emmet had not the least idea of complaining of harsh treatment on the part of my client towards him, the defendant has nevertheless thought proper to publish the following most scandalous libel: “If any one man could be found, of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country, had, in the moment of his conviction and sentence, uttered the following apostrophe:—‘That viper, whom my father nourished! He it was from whose principles and doctrines, which now, by their effects, drag me to my grave; and he it is who is now brought forward as my prosecutor, and who, by an unheard-of exercise of the prerogative, has wantonly lashed, with a speech to evidence, the dying son of his former friend, when that dying son had produced no evidence, had made no defence, but, on the contrary, acknowledged the charge, and submitted to his fate.’ Lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene, in which, although guilt was in one part to be punished, yet in the whole drama justice was confounded, humanity outraged, and loyalty insulted.” Now, gentlemen, what can be said of a man worse than this? Lord Coke, with all his great fame, never has outlived, and never will outlive, the memory of the manner in which he treated sir Walter Raleigh in a court of justice. So revolting was his conduct, that it stands like a blot upon his escutcheon. The conduct imputed to the plaintiff would have been brutal, even if Mr. Emmet had been a perfect stranger to him, instead of the “dying son of his former friend.” But the assertion is false, or Mr. Cobbett might have proved it to be true. Was Mr. Cobbett present when Mr.

Emmet made use of these words? And, if not, where had he his authority? Has he any right to insert, in his papers, what renders me the object of universal horror and detestation? No crime can be more detestable than that which the plaintiff is here charged with; that he had "instilled into the mind of this young man principles which, by their effects, dragged him to his grave; and that, by an unheard-of exercise of prerogative, he had wantonly lashed, with a speech to evidence, the dying son of his former friend, when that dying son had produced no evidence, had made no defence, but, on the contrary, had acknowledged his charge, and had submitted to his fate." He goes on to say, that "lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene, in which, although guilt was in one part to be punished, yet in the whole drama, justice was confounded, humanity outraged, and loyalty insulted." Gentlemen, is this true? Did Mr. Cobbett believe it to be true when he published it? But, notwithstanding this, he sells these libels to this very hour; he sells them in volumes, the more effectually to blast the character of this gentleman to future times.

But Mr. Adam tells you, that his client is a man of strong powers of mind; that he writes from a spirit and principle of his own; that he raised himself to his present respectable situation by unwearied industry; that he was the son of a farmer, and the grandson of a day-labourer; that he is self-taught in the grammar of his native language, and knows how to use it with acuteness and precision. All these qualifications I am ready to allow Mr. Cobbett, and in the exercise of these qualifications I give him the merit of having published this libel; which I will venture to say is one of the most clever, as well as one of the most wicked efforts of his genius.

Gentlemen, there is nothing so popular in England as a judge. The people of England love their laws, and love their judges. But what does this artful libeller do? Under the mask of praising lord Kenyon, and telling us what that noble lord would have done in such and such situations, he seizes the opportunity it affords him of sending forth against the plaintiff, Mr. Plunkett, one of the most abominable libels that ever was brought into a court of justice.

Gentlemen, upon the subject of damages, I contend, the injury the plaintiff has received is one of those which it is almost impossible to compensate by money. I beseech you to make the plaintiff's case your own, and by that standard appreciate what he ought to recover. A jury cannot "minister to a mind diseased," but it can, and I trust will, by an honest verdict, give ample reparation to the gentleman so basely injured, and thereby proclaim the justice of the British law.—The libel goes on to say: "Lord Kenyon must have known, that a noble duke, for having toasted at a drunken club, in a common tavern, to a noisy rabble, 'the sovereignty of the people,' was struck by his majesty's command out of the privy council, and deprived of all his offices both civil and military." Gentlemen, this is a libel upon the duke of Norfolk. This libeller is not satisfied with employing single ball, but cannister, grape-shot, old nails, every thing is brought into his battery, and hurled around, so as to do the utmost possible mischief. Here is a libel, too, upon the Whig club. What will my friend Adam say to this? Gentlemen, I assure you the Whig club is not a drunken club, nor are its members a noisy rabble. But, does not Mr. Cobbett know that the duke of Norfolk is not the only man that was struck out of the privy council? Does he not know, that the name of that great statesman, Mr. Fox, was struck out also? And does he not know, that the person who induced his majesty to make that erasure, has since endeavoured to persuade him to strike it in again?—He goes on to say: "if, therefore, any man were to be found who not at a drunken club, or to a brawling rabble, but in a grave and high assembly, not in the character of an inebriated toast-master, but in that of a sober constitutional lawyer, had insisted on the sovereignty of the people as a first principle of the English law, and had declared, that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament, to that of the 'tellers of the nation;' and that if a particular law were disagreeable to the people, however it might have been enacted with all royal and parliamentary solemnity, nevertheless it was not binding, and the people, by the general law, were exempted from obedience to such a particular law, because the people were the supreme and ultimate judges of what was for their own benefit. Lord Kenyon, if he had been chancellor in any kingdom in Europe, would have shrunk from recommending any such man to the favour of a monarch, while there yet remained a shadow of monarchy visible in the world." Here again this lover of the British constitution attacks that constitution in one of its three branches. We know, gentlemen, that every member of parliament has a right to deliver his free, unbiassed sentiments; and if the plaintiff in the execution of that right did exceed the bounds prescribed by the rules of that House, it would have been a libel on the then Speaker of the Irish House of Commons who now sits on the bench with his lordship, if he had not called him to order. Why will Mr. Cobbett meddle with matters of so high and important a nature?—Gentlemen, the questions for your consideration are simply these: is the defendant the proprietor? Did he persist in the publication? Is it a libel upon the plaintiff, and does it affect him in his character and reputation?—Gentlemen, if the libel be true, if the plaintiff be the abandoned miscreant here described, we ought to draw a curtain before him, and hide him from the world for ever. A thousand poignards are unsheathed to revenge the death of Emmet, and this inflammatory libel is calculated to direct them to the heart of the plaintiff. If he goes away from this court with small damages, I shall lament that I brought the business before you.—The people of Ireland are deeply interested in the verdict you shall deliver—I love and venerate the people of Ireland—I love those who are loyal, and I love those who are not loyal—because I believe they will shortly become so. I trust your verdict will have the effect of doing away all jealousies and prejudices between the two countries, by showing, that an Irish gentleman is not disfranchised by the union, but that, under the mild administration of the laws of England, he is entitled to, and will receive, the same measure of justice as in his own country.

Gentlemen, I shall not occupy any more of your attention, but shall conclude, with expressing a hope, that I have said nothing capable of widening the breach between Great Britain and Ireland in such disturbed and distracted times.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PLAINTIFF.

Mr. James Pole sworn.—Examined by Mr. Garrow.

Did you ever purchase any numbers of Cobbett's Political Register?—Yes. I did.

Where did you purchase them?—In Pall Mall, at a shop described as Cobbett's Political Register office.

Did you ever buy any other numbers at any other time?—Yes, on the 24th of May,

* In the report of this case 5 Esp. N. P. C. 136, it is stated that the witness "proved that he had purchased the paper called Cobbett's Political Register, and which contained the libel in question, at the office kept by the defendant for the sale of the paper, in Pall mall, soon after the publication of it, that being the place where those papers were sold; having proved the fact, he was further asked, whether he had since that time purchased any other paper of the same title at the same office? He answered, that he had purchased one of the same title and description, two days before at the same office.

"This evidence was objected to by the defendant's counsel: that this being a question of damages, the purchase of another paper at another time, could not be received in evidence in this action.

Lord Ellenborough said, he would admit it, to show, that the papers which purported to be weekly publications of public transactions, were sold deliberately, and vended in the regular course of public circulation: that the paper containing the libel was not published by mistake, but vended publicly, deliberately, and in regular transmission for public perusal; but that he should direct the jury not to take it into consideration in damages." See also 2 Selwyn's N. P. 988, 4th ed.

at Bagshaw's, in Bow-street, Covent-garden.

Had you any opportunity of knowing whether that work has a rapid sale?—Yes; a lady at the shop in Pall Mall told me—

Mr. Adam.—My lord, I object to that question.

Lord Ellenborough.—I do not think the question necessary. It is enough to prove that the work has been in a course of sale.

Mr. Garrow.—Did you find any difficulty in obtaining those numbers?—None at all.

Mr. Crowe sworn.—Examined by Mr. Garrow.

I believe you have got the patent under the great seal appointing Mr. Plunkett solicitor-general of Ireland?—I have. [Read by Mr. Lowten.]

I believe you have also a copy of Mr. Plunkett's return for the borough of Carlow?—Yes, I have. [Read by Mr. Lowten.]

Have you a copy of the conviction and judgment of Robert Emmet?—I have. [Here the copy was produced and read by Mr. Lowten.]

The Right Honourable W. Wickham sworn.—Examined by Mr. Garrow.

Were you in Ireland at the time of the trial of Robert Emmet?—I was.

Are you acquainted with Mr. Plunkett, the present solicitor of Ireland?—Yes.

Did he officiate as one of his majesty's counsel?—Yes; he was one of his majesty's counsel.

Was he confidentially advised with on all occasions on which the law officers of the crown are generally consulted?—Yes. Whenever it was necessary, which frequently occurred—almost daily.

Have you looked at the paper in question, called the libel?—I have not.

Cast your eye over the passage, page 808, beginning with "a couple of lawyers without political habits, political information, or honourable connexions." Do you understand those passages to apply to Mr. O'Grady the attorney-general, and Mr. Plunkett the solicitor-general?—Clearly of the attorney and solicitor-general.

The Right Honourable W. Wickham cross-examined by Mr. Adam.

They were the confidential counsel of the executive government at that time?—Yes; they certainly were.

Both Mr. O'Grady as well as Mr. Plunkett?—Yes, they were.

Both in the confidence of the executive government of Ireland?—Yes, both of them.

Mr. Barnard sworn.—Examined by Mr. Dampier.

Were you in Ireland at the time of Mr. Emmet's trial?—I was.

Did you see Mr. Plunkett at that trial?—Yes, I did.

Was he employed for the prosecution?—He was.

Did he make any observations to evidence, in the course of that trial?—He did.

Look at this number of Cobbett's Political Register, page 808, and read the passage beginning with the words "If any one man could be found of whom a young but unhappy victim of the laws"—Whom do you conceive to be meant by "a young but unhappy victim of the laws?" I should suppose Mr. Emmet.

Conceiving Mr. Emmet to be the person alluded to by the words "young and unhappy victim of the laws," whom should you suppose to be intended by the passages, "if any one man could be found," and "that viper whom my father nourished," &c.?—I do not know that Mr. Plunkett was nourished by Mr. Emmet's father.

But to whom do you suppose them to apply?—To Mr. Plunkett.

Did Mr. Emmet's counsel make no defence?—None.

Right Honourable John Foster sworn.—Examined by Mr. Nolan.

I believe you were Speaker of the Irish House of Parliament previous to the Union?—I was.

Do you remember Mr. Plunkett sitting as a member in that House?—I do.

Do you remember whether Mr. Plunkett ever delivered his opinions on the different subjects agitated in debate?—I do not think it proper to state whether or not he delivered his opinions—

Lord Ellenborough.—You are only asked to stated whether or not he gave any opinion on the subjects in debate.

Do you recollect whether he ever delivered his opinions on the different subjects agitated in debate?—He frequently took a part in the debates.

Have you read the libel?—I have.

Do you suppose Mr. Plunkett is the person intended in the libel?

Lord Ellenborough.—Mr. Nolan, read what particular part you mean.

Mr. Nolan.—Read the passage "if any one man could be found," &c. p. 809. Taking the whole context of this passage, whom do you conceive to be meant by it?—Taking the whole, I should certainly conceive Mr. Plunkett to be meant by it. Taking the last sentence, I should not.

The Right Hon. John Foster cross-examined by Mr. Adam.

Mr. Plunkett was a member of the Irish House of Commons previous to the union?—He was.

Did he speak on questions relative to the union between Great Britain and Ireland?—Yes; he did.

Do you recollect any of the expressions or arguments he made use of in the course of those debates?

Lord Ellenborough.—It would be a breach of his duty and his oath, to reveal the councils of the nation.

Mr. Adam.—What are your reasons for believing that Mr. Plunkett is not the person meant by the latter part of the passage?—I said, that, taking the whole context, I should suppose Mr. Plunkett to be the person meant; but, taking the sentence just read, I should not suppose it was him.

The evidence being closed on the part of the plaintiff, Mr. Lowten read the passages in the Political Register complained of in the declaration.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Adam.—My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury;—The task now devolves on me to occupy a portion of your attention. My learned friend, in his address to you, has made repeated allusions to the proceedings which took place on a former day. He tells you, that he observes the names of the same jurors on the panel, and that he sees the same faces in the box. Gentlemen, I am not, indeed, acquainted, like my learned friend, with your persons; but I know the uprightness of your minds; I know in general the upright character of an English jury; I know your powers of distinguishing between a civil action for the purpose of damages, and a criminal prosecution; I know, too, gentlemen, that you are capable of feeling the grand and leading distinction, that in an action for personal damages, the defendant is capable of justifying his conduct. My learned friend has endeavoured to inflame your minds by adverting to the present state of Ireland, and by repeated allusions to the trial on a former day, with which the present action has no connection whatever. With respect to that trial, you are bound to blot from your memories all recollection of it, to divest yourselves of all prejudices, and to try this action with free and unfettered minds, and to consider, as my lord Kenyon used to say, only what is within the four corners of the record. It is not a libel on my lord Hardwicke which you have now to try; it is not a libel upon my lord Redesdale; it is not a libel upon Mr. Justice Osborne, or Mr. Secretary Marsden; but it is, as I before informed you, a civil action for the purpose of damages. My learned friend, with that power of imagination which he possesses in so eminent a degree, has called up the departed spirits of Mr. Burke and the great earl of Chatham. He has reminded you of the lines made use of by that noble lord, when speaking of America;

"Be to her virtues ever kind,
Be to her faults a little blind,
And clap the padlock on the mind."

Gentlemen, I beg you will transpose these lines, and apply the two first to the defendant, Mr. Cobbett;

"Be to his virtues ever kind,
Be to his faults a little blind," and "clap the padlock on your minds," as to the inflammatory effects of those parts of my learned friend's speech, which have no connexion with the subject before you.

Gentlemen, in any thing I am about to say, I beg you will not suppose for one moment, that I am not an enemy to all professed libellers. I can honestly exclaim with the poet.

"Curs'd be the verse, how smooth soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one virtuous man my foe."

And if I express myself in any way that can be construed into a justification of what has been written and published, I entreat that you will not clothe my client with that blame, and that you will not, from any want of art or ability on my part, visit him therefore with an increase of damages.

There is another point which I think I have a right to complain of in my learned friend's address to you. He has spoken very highly of Mr. Cobbett as a public character, and has made use of the evidence produced on the former trial in favour of the defendant, in order to enhance the damages against him. This I am sure you will not suffer to enter into your consideration.—I hope I shall be able to convince you, that now, when the settled state of Ireland renders a repetition of those animadversions on the government, which have been so long suffered with impunity, unnecessary, it would be an act of severity, if the defendant, who is the last person who has fallen into the snare, should be visited with a vindictive verdict. With respect to the amount of damages (for some damages, I admit, you must give), I earnestly entreat you to consider, that Mr. Cobbett is a man virtuous in private life, that he is the father of a numerous family and the husband of an amiable wife, and that he is not a person who maintains himself by ribaldry in his writings, for those writings are uniformly characterised by an honest zeal in defence of the aristocracy of this country, as well as the other component parts of its government. He left his father's house when he was hardly eighteen years of age; since which time he has been the successful champion, and almost sole defender of the rights of this country, in America. At the moment I am speaking, he is several years under the age of forty, and consequently cannot be supposed to have obtained that independence which would not make the heavy damages which my learned friend wishes to wring from you—but which I am sure he will not wring from you—worse than the severest sentence ever inflicted on any person convicted of the grossest libel. If you were to measure them in the proportion according to which my learned friend calls upon you to measure them, you would doom him to an eternal imprisonment; you would doom him to that situation to which it never was meant, and never will be meant by an English jury, that any man should be subjected by the consequences of a civil action.

My learned friend says, that this action was brought, in order to show the falsehood of the libel. Gentlemen, I have the best authority for saying, that the defendant never entertained the idea of justifying this libel. It was impossible for him to justify it. For, in order to have satisfied your minds, we must have produced that testimony from which we are shut out by the established laws and usages of parliament. The Bill of Rights expressly says, that no words uttered in parliament shall be spoken any where but in parliament. When, therefore, you are considering that you are called upon to pronounce a verdict of damages high in their nature, and, if you should pronounce it, completely ruinous to Mr. Cobbett,—I humbly submit, gentlemen, that you will not throw out of that consideration the situation in which the defendant is thereby placed.

Gentlemen, there were other topics in the speech of my learned friend, of which I have a right to complain, but he knows I am not in the habit of complaining; I will therefore give over my complaints, and come to the other points upon which he has so eloquently descanted. He has called your attention to the Whig club, to his grace the duke of Norfolk, and to another great and illustrious character, Mr. Fox. Most undoubtedly, it is true, that that illustrious character was struck by his majesty's command, out of the list of privy counsellors. But, gentlemen, this is not all. My learned friend has stated another circumstance. He has told you at the same time that the present chancellor of the exchequer, who counselled and advised his majesty so to do, has since advised him to call that illustrious character to the cabinet, and thereby to strike his name in again. If Mr. Fox had thought proper to bring an action against Mr. Cobbett, or any other person, for so saying, I should have said to him, you are not injured by what has been done, but are even thought a proper person to form part of his majesty's government. Mutato nomine, the case applies to the plaintiff in the present action. Were you to give one-fourth, nay one-twentieth part of the sum at which the plaintiff has thought proper to lay his damages, it would produce the effect upon my client which I have already stated.

Gentlemen, this is a grave question. You have already pronounced a verdict which applies to the whole criminality of the case. Mr. Cobbett has been pronounced guilty, not only of the other parts of the publication, but of this very part also. And, if it be unfair to hold up a civil action to criminal punishment, I submit that it would be more especially so in the present case. I, therefore, have every reason to hope, on the part of the character of the defendant, on the part of the wife and children of the defendant, on the part of the fortune of the defendant that you will be lenient towards him, and that you will not, by excessive damages, doom him to perpetual imprisonment.

My learned friend has treated Mr. Cobbett as the author of this libel, which he represented to you as written with all the nerve and energy which characterizes that gentleman's publications. On the other hand, Mr. Attorney-general the other day, gave you to understand, that he had reasons for believing it was not written by Mr. Cobbett. Now, let us examine a little what the nature of this libel is; and, in what I am about to say, I shall state to you a plain unvarnished tale. I acknowledge the innuendoes to have been fully proved, and therefore what I have to discuss relates generally to the libel itself. It says, "from a rare modesty of nature, or from a rare precision of self-knowledge, lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection, on his arrival in a country, with the moral quality of the inhabitants of which, and with their persons, manners, and individual characters and connexions, he must have been utterly unacquainted. In such a country, torn with domestic sedition and treason, threatened with foreign invasion, and acting, since the union, under an untried constitution"—Now let us stop here for a moment and recollect, that in this sentence there is nothing that can be construed into a libel upon the constitution of Ireland, but directly the reverse. It goes on to say, "—if Doctor Addington had required that lord Kenyon should direct a Cambridgeshire earl 'in all his councils,' lord Kenyon would as soon, at the desire of lord St. Vincent, have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles." And then it comes to that part which is the ground work of the present action: "that viper! whom my father nourished! he it was from whose lips I first imbibed those principles and doctrines, which now by their effects drag me to my grave." Now, gentlemen, I entreat you to notice and consider the connexion which this passage has with the other parts of the libel, and, having done so, I am persuaded you will be of opinion with me, that it must have been used in a figurative manner. It then states, "Of lord Kenyon, therefore (Cambricus* must well know), it never could have been believed, that he himself would lead such a character forward, introduce him to the favour of a deceived sovereign, clothe him in the robes and load him with the emoluments of office. Lord Kenyon must have known, that a noble duke, for having toasted at a drunken club, in a common tavern, to a noisy rabble, "the sovereignty of the people," was struck by his majesty's command out of the privy council, and deprived of all his offices both civil and military. If, therefore, any man were to be found who not at a drunken club, or to a brawling rabble, but in a grave and high assembly, not in the character of an inebriated toast-master, but in that of a sober constitutional lawyer, had insisted on the sovereignty of the people, as a first principle of the English law, and had declared, that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament, to that of the "tellers of the nation; and that if a particular law were disagreeable to the people, however it might have been enacted with all royal and parliamentary solemnity, nevertheless it was not binding, and the people, by the general law, were exempted from obedience to such a particular law, because the people were the supreme and ultimate judges of what was for their own benefit. Lord Kenyon, if he had been chancellor in any kingdom of Europe, would have shrunk from recommending any such man to the favour of a monarch, while there yet remained a shadow of monarchy visible in the world." Now, gentlemen, this part of the question relates to a circumstance, the particulars of which, we have been prevented, by the established law of parliament, from diving into; nor do I wish to bring it forward in this place: but I have a right to state, that if any person should have printed, so far back as the year 1799, a speech importing to be a speech made by the plaintiff, Mr. Plunkett, and if it should appear that the passage I have just read to you is an exact copy of a passage in that speech, I submit, that this is a case extremely favourable to my client. My learned friend in the course of his speech has alluded to me. Let me also in my turn beg leave to allude to him. Suppose in a lecture room he had insisted on the sovereignty of the people as a first principle of the English law, and have declared, that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament, to that of the tellers of the nation; what species of moral offence would it have been to have said that he was an improper person to become the law officer of the crown? Where would have been the moral crime in publishing that my learned friend had made use of those expressions? And more; if it could be proved, that those expressions had been published and attributed to him in newspapers and in pamphlets from the year 1800 up to the present year 1804, and that he had never called upon any of those publishers for an explanation, what sort of damages, I ask, would you have given to my learned friend? Having said this, let me read to you the infamous libel attributed to Mr. Plunkett. It is stated in this book, purporting to be a collection of speeches on the union, that, in the Irish House of Commons, on the 22nd of June 1799, Mr. Plunkett made use of these words: "I, in the most express terms deny the competency of parliament to do this act," (meaning the act of legislative union between the two countries.) "I tell you, that if, circumstanced as you are, you pass this act, it will be a mere nullity, and that no man in Ireland will be bound to obey it. I make the assertion deliberately, I repeat it, and I call on any man who hears me to take down my words—

Mr. Erskine.—I submit to your lordship that this sort of evidence is perfectly inadmissible.

Lord Ellenborough.—Altogether so, and when I come to address the jury, I shall certainly take occasion to remind them that they must discharge it totally from their recollection.

Mr. Adam.—I feel a considerable degree of embarrassment at this interruption. I did not interrupt my learned friend when he was impressing your minds with the idea that Mr. Cobbett was the author of this libel.—Gentlemen, the point on which I was addressing you was this, that if such words have been attributed to Mr. Plunkett, I was submitting to you, that after five years of silent acquiescence on the part of Mr. Plunkett, after suffering the expressions here attributed to him to be sent to every corner of the kingdom in the form of newspapers and of pamphlets, it would be an extremely hard case to inflict severe damages upon Mr. Cobbett for the mere republication of them.

Lord Ellenborough.—I have no objection to your stating this as matter of supposition, but, in the shape of evidence, it cannot possibly be admitted.

Mr. Adam.—My lord, I was just about to state, that I did not mean to proceed farther into the detail of this subject. Gentlemen, I wish you to consider in what state this cause stands, and what the circumstances are which entitle my learned friend to demand such excessive damages. I have stated to you the situation of Mr. Cobbett and that of his family, and I trust I have done it with decorum. With regard to the plaintiff, Mr. Plunkett, you have it in evidence, that he was his majesty's solicitor-general in Ireland at the time of the publication, and you also have it in evidence, that he is still in the confidence of the Irish government; but you have no evidence, that any step whatever has been taken to remove him from the situation which he enjoys. Has he received any injury by the publication? Is he not still his majesty's solicitor-general? Is he not still in the high career to honours and emoluments? I ask then, as my learned friend has not produced one single circumstance to prove to you that Mr. Plunkett has been injured by the publication in question,—I ask, I say, whether, under all these circumstances, this is a case which calls for those excessive damages which my learned friend has entreated you to give?

Gentlemen, you have already passed a verdict of guilty upon the information for public criminality: you are now considering an action for private damages. Mr. Plunkett has received redress as to the former, and if you should find, as I suppose you will find, the defendant guilty (as no justification whatever has been attempted), he will have a farther opportunity of showing to the world, that Mr. Cobbett never attempted to justify the truth of it, that he did not wait to consult counsel, but took his immediate determination to enter no justification upon the record. Gentlemen, I submit that, under these circumstances, you must quit the box before you pronounce a verdict of damages. Let those damages be ever so low, that verdict will be sufficient to establish, that Mr. Plunkett has completely vindicated his character, and will show to the world, that what was alleged against him was untrue. I am persuaded that the plaintiff does not come here to take out of the pocket of Mr. Cobbett a sum, which would not enrich him, but make Mr. Cobbett poor indeed. Gentlemen, I shall not trouble you with any farther observations, but shall conclude with expressing my firm reliance, that you will not inflict a punishment beyond what the justice of the case requires.

SUMMING UP.

Lord Ellenborough.—Gentlemen; This is an action for reparation in damages for a civil injury done to Mr. Plunkett, the solicitor-general of Ireland, by the publication of a libel, with the contents of which you have been made fully acquainted. The defendant's counsel has admitted, that the preliminary proof has been adduced, and no justification appears on the record. The only question, therefore, for your consideration is, the quality of the libel, and the measure of damages you will give in the exercise of your sound discretion. You will lay out of your consideration the antecedent matter of the criminal trial, on which the defendant has been convicted. This is an action for the injury done to the fair fame of an individual, and to ascertain the damages to which he is entitled. That which gave the public a title to reparation, ought not, however to operate to the abridgment of the right of a particular individual who complains of a private injury. It will be for you to consider carefully the circumstances of the case and the malignity of the libel, and to say, what reparation in damages the plaintiff ought to receive. These damages are not to be reduced by the poverty of the defendant, if he is poor, nor increased by his wealth, if he is rich; but are to be admeasured by the size and magnitude of the injury done to the plaintiff. The only way of measuring the extent of the injury done to a man's fame is, by asking yourselves, what would make your mind and feelings an adequate compensation if such a libel as this were true? That it is not true is admitted. If it were true, it would have been open to the defendant to have justified it on the record.* If a man thinks proper to assert that which it is difficult to prove, or represent that which cannot be revealed, they are difficulties of his own creating, and the libel must go forth accredited or discredited, according to the circumstances. But, gentlemen, as to the first part of the libel, I take the principal gravamen of the injury to lie in that passage which commences with the words, "that viper whom my father nourished!" To this passage I am desirous of drawing your particular attention; and really, it seems hardly possible to depict a person in more odious colours than are here employed. I would ask, what could give more pain to a virtuous mind than to insinuate that he had acted like our common enemy, "the seducer 'ere the accuser of mankind?" that he had first seduced and afterwards destroyed whom he had first corrupted? that he had instilled into the mind of Mr. Emmet, the son of his friend, principles of disloyalty and rebellion, and had afterwards, not in the ordinary exercise of his duty, but "with a speech to evidence" wantonly lashed the man to whom he was under family obligations, and who was the pupil of his own sedition? It appears to me hardly possible to depict any one under more odious colours. It matters not whether the defendant be the author or only the publisher and adopter of another man's malignity. If he chuses to send it into the world, he is criminal and guilty, and is liable to all the consequences. Leaving the other parts of the libel out of the question, I shall shortly call your attention to that part which relates to the plaintiff. It says, "if any one man could be found of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country had, in the moment of his conviction and sentence, uttered the following apostrophe—"That viper whom my father nourished!"—Is it possible to state any thing more detestable, than that a person, who had been nourished by the father of a man who had rendered himself amenable to the infliction of the law, should insult and sting the son to death? "He it was from whose lips I first imbibed those principles and doctrines, which now by their effects drag me to my grave; and he it is who is now brought forward as my prosecutor, and who, by an unheard of exercise of the prerogative, has wantonly lashed with a speech to evidence the dying son of his former friend, when that dying son had produced no evidence, had made no defence; but, on the contrary, had acknowledged the charge, and had submitted to his fate.—Lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene, in which, although guilt was in one part to be punished, yet, in the whole drama, justice was confounded, humanity outraged, and loyalty insulted." Gentlemen, this is the part which particularly presses on my mind. As to the language which the plaintiff may be supposed to have held in the Irish House of Parliament, it might, if true, render him unfit for recommendation to his majesty—it might be improper. This, however, the defendant has not attempted to justify. But it is the other part of the libel, containing the most bitter and acrimonious observations that can possibly be made use of, to which I wish to confine your attention.—Consider what situation Mr. Plunkett is in. He holds an office at all times and in all countries of an invidious nature; that of a public prosecutor, whose denunciations may probably terminate in the death of the criminal. The libel states, "that such a scene was acted as lord Kenyon would have turned away from with horror; a scene, in which, although guilt was in one part to be punished, yet, in the whole drama, justice was confounded, humanity outraged and loyalty insulted. To say of a public officer of the crown, that he has acted in such a scene, is to imply that he is forgetful of every principle of justice, and is placing him in the lowest possible state of degradation. These, gentlemen, are the circumstances of this case. It is for you to say, without considering the capacity of the defendant as to his wealth or poverty, what reparation the plaintiff is entitled to receive from the justice of his country. Whatever you may determine upon, I have no doubt the amount will be such as ought to satisfy the party aggrieved; and, with these few observations, I leave the decision in the hands of those to whom, by the constitution, it is solely referred.

The Jury retired for about twenty minutes, and returned with a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 500*l.

ROBERT JOHNSON, one of the Judges of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, on an Indictment for composing, writing, publishing, and printing certain Libels on the Right Hon. PHILIP Earl of HARDWICKE, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; the Right Hon. JOHN Lord REDESDALE, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland; the Hon. #### PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS.

On Friday the 18th of January 1805, Mr. Justice Johnson was arrested at his house in the county of Dublin, under a warrant signed "ELLENBOROUGH," endorsed by J. BELL, a magistrate of the county of Dublin, and said to be so endorsed pursuant to the statute 44 Geo. 3, c. 92, it being the first attempt to carry the said act into execution. For the better understanding the arguments in this important case the statute is here inserted.

CAP. XCII.

An Act to render more easy the apprehending, and bringing to Trial, Offenders escaping from one Part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from one County to another.
[20th JULY, 1804.]

WHEREAS it frequently happens that persons, against whom warrants are granted by justices of peace for the several counties and places in Ireland, escape into other counties or places, out of the jurisdiction of the justices of peace granting such warrants; and it may also frequently happen, that persons having committed offences in some county or place in Ireland, may reside or be in some other county or place, out of the jurisdiction of the justice or justices of the county or place in which such offence was committed, whereby such offenders may or will easily avoid being punished for the offences wherewith they are charged; be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual, and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and four, in case any person against whom a warrant shall be issued by any justice or justices of the peace of any county, city, liberty, town, or place, within Ireland, shall escape, go into, reside, or be, in any other county, city, liberty, town, or place, out of the jurisdiction of the justice or justices granting such warrant as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace for the county, city, liberty, town, or place where such person shall escape, go into, reside, or be, and such justice or justices is and are hereby required upon proof being made upon oath of the hand-writing of the justice or justices granting such warrant, to endorse his or their name or names on such warrant which endorsement shall be a sufficient authority to the person or persons bringing such warrant, and to all other persons to whom such warrant was originally directed, to execute such warrant in the county, city, liberty, town, or place, where the same was endorsed, and to apprehend and carry such offender or offenders before the justice who endorsed such warrant, or before some other justice or justices of such other county, city, liberty, town, or place, where such warrant was endorsed; and in case the offence for which such offender shall be apprehended shall be bailable in law, and such offender shall be willing and ready to give bail for his or their appearance at the next assizes or general gaol delivery, or next general quarter sessions of the peace to be held in and for the county, city, liberty, town, or place, where the offence was committed, such justice or justices by whom such warrant was endorsed, or such other justice before whom any such offender or offenders shall be brought, shall and may proceed with such offender or offenders, and take bail for his or their appearance at the next assizes or general gaol delivery, or at the next general quarter sessions of the peace to be held in and for the county, city, liberty, town, or place, where such offence was committed, in the same manner as the justices of the peace of the proper county, city, liberty, town, or place, should or might have done in such proper county, city, liberty, town, or place; and the justice or justices so taking bail as aforesaid, shall deliver the recognizance, together with the examination or confession of such offender or offenders, and all other proceedings relating thereto, had before such justice, to the constable or other officer or officers, or person or persons so apprehending such offender or offenders as aforesaid, who are hereby required to receive the same, and to deliver over such recognizance, examination, or other proceedings, to the clerk of the crown or clerk of the peace of the county, city, liberty, town, or place, where such offender or offenders is or are required to appear by virtue of such recognizance; and such recognizance, examination, and confession respectively, shall be as good and effectual in law to all intents and purposes, and of the same force and validity, as if the same had been entered into, taken, or acknowledged, before a justice or justices of the peace in and for the proper county, city, liberty, town, or place, where the offence was committed, and the same proceedings shall be had thereon; and in case any constable, officer, or other person to whom such recognizance, examination, confession, or other proceedings shall be delivered as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to deliver over the same to the clerk of the crown or clerk of the peace of the county, city, liberty, town or place, where such offender is required to appear by virtue of such recognizance, such constable, officer, or other person, shall forfeit the sum of five pounds Irish currency, to be recovered against him by bill, civil bill, plaint, or information, in any of his majesty's courts of record in Ireland, by any person or persons who will prosecute or sue for the same, wherein no essoign, protection, or wager of law, shall be allowed, nor more than one imparlance; and in case the offence for which such offender or offenders shall be apprehended and taken in manner aforesaid, shall not be bailable in law, or such offender or offenders shall not give bail for his or their appearance at the next assizes or general gaol delivery, or next general quarter sessions of the peace to be held in and for the county, city, liberty, town, or place, where the offence was committed, to the satisfaction of the justice before whom such offender or offenders shall be brought, then and in such case the constable, officer, or other person so apprehending such offender or offenders, shall carry and convey such offender or offenders before one of his majesty's justices of peace of the proper county, city, liberty, town, or place, where such offence was committed, there to be dealt with according to law.

2. And be it farther enacted, that no action of trespass, false imprisonment, or indictment, or other action, shall be brought, sued, commenced, or prosecuted by any person or persons whatsoever, against the justice or justices who shall endorse such warrant, for or by reason of his or their endorsing such warrant: provided always, that such person or persons shall be at liberty to bring or prosecute his or their action or suit against the justice or justices who originally granted such warrant, in the same manner as such person or persons might have done in case this act had not been made.

3. And whereas it may frequently happen that felons and other malefactors, in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, may make their escape into that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, as also that felons and other malefactors in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, may make their escape into that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, whereby their offences often remained unpunished, there being no sufficient provision, by the laws now in force in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, for apprehending such offenders and transmitting them into that part of the United Kingdom in which their offences were committed: for remedy whereof be it farther enacted, that, from and after the first day of August one thousand eight hundred and four, if any person or persons against whom a warrant shall be issued by any of the judges of his majesty's Court of King's-bench, or any justice of Oyer and Terminer or gaol delivery, or any justice or justices of the peace or other person having authority to issue the same within Ireland, for any crime or offence against the laws in force in Ireland, shall escape, go into, reside, or be in any place in England or Scotland respectively, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county, stewartry, riding, division, city, liberty, town, or place, in England or Scotland respectively, whither or where such person or persons shall escape, go into, reside, or be, to endorse his name on such warrant, which warrant so endorsed shall be a sufficient authority to the person or persons bringing such warrant, and to all persons to whom such warrant was originally directed, and also to all constables or other peace officers of the county, stewartry, riding, division, city, liberty, town, or place, where such warrant shall be so endorsed, to execute the said warrant in the county, riding, division, city, liberty, town, or place, where it is so endorsed, by apprehending the person or persons against whom such warrant is granted, and to convey him, her, or them by the most direct way into Ireland, and before one of the justices of the peace of the county in Ireland, living near the place and in the county where he, she, or they shall arrive and land; which justice of the peace is hereby required to proceed with regard to such person or persons as if the said person or persons had been legally apprehended in the said county in Ireland.

4. And, for remedy of the like inconveniency by the escape into Ireland of persons guilty of crimes in England or Scotland respectively, be it farther enacted, that, from and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and four, if any person or persons against whom a warrant shall be issued by any of the judges of his majesty's Court of King's-bench, or of the courts of great sessions in Wales, or any justice of Oyer and Terminer or gaol delivery, or any justice or justices of the peace of any county, stewartry, riding, division, city, liberty, town, or place, within England, or Scotland respectively, or other person having authority to issue the same within England or Scotland respectively, for any crime or offence against the laws of England or Scotland respectively, shall escape, go into, reside, or be in any place of that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county or place in Ireland, whither or where such person or persons shall escape, go into, reside, or be, to endorse his name on such warrant, which warrant so endorsed shall be a sufficient authority to the person or persons bringing such warrant, and to all persons to whom such warrant was originally directed, and also to all sheriffs officers, constables, and other peace officers of the county or place in Ireland where such warrant shall be so endorsed, to execute the said warrant in the county or place in Ireland where it is so endorsed, by apprehending the person or persons against whom such warrant may be granted, and to convey him, her, or them, by the most direct way into England or Scotland respectively, and before one of the justices of peace of the county or stewartry, in England or Scotland respectively, living near the place and in the county where he, she, or they, shall arrive and land, which justice of peace is hereby authorized and required to proceed with regard to such person or persons as if such person or persons had been legally apprehended in the said county or stewartry of England or Scotland respectively.

5. And be it further enacted, that the expense of removing prisoners as aforesaid, to any place in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, shall be repaid to the person defraying the same by the treasurer of the county in England or Ireland respectively, or by the sheriff or steward depute or substitute of the county or stewartry in Scotland in which the crime was committed, the amount of such expence being previously ascertained by an account thereof verified upon oath before two of the justices of the peace of said county or stewartry, and allowed and signed by them; and such treasurer, sheriff, or steward depute, or substitute, shall be allowed such payments in their respective accounts.

6. And be it further enacted, that the treasurers of the several counties in Ireland, who have paid the amount of any such expences so ascertained as aforesaid, shall lay the said account, together with the allowance of the same so signed as aforesaid, before the grand juries of their respective counties, at the assizes holden for such counties next after such expences shall be paid, or at any subsequent assizes; and it shall be lawful for such grand juries, and they are hereby respectively required to present a sum equal to the amount of such expences, to be raised from the county at large, for the purpose of reimbursing such treasurers.

7. And whereas it frequently happens, that persons having stolen or otherwise feloniously taken away money, chattels, goods, or other effects, in one of the parts of the United Kingdom, carry the same into another part of the said United Kingdom, and there have the said money, chattels, goods, or other effects, in their possession or custody; and doubts may be entertained whether they could be indicted and tried in that part of the United Kingdom where such offenders have the said money, chattels, goods, and other effects, in their possession or custody, as the original offence was not committed in such part of the said United Kingdom; be it therefore further enacted and declared, that, from and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and four, if any person or persons having stolen or otherwise feloniously taken money, chattels, goods, or other effects, in any one of the parts of the said United Kingdom, shall afterwards have the same money, goods, chattels, or other effects, or any part thereof, in his, her, or their possession or custody, in any other part of the United Kingdom, it shall and may be lawful to indict, try, and punish such person or persons, for theft or larceny, in that part of the United Kingdom where he, she, or they shall so have such money, chattels, goods, or other effects, in his, her, or their possession or custody, as if the said money, chattels, goods, or other effects, had been stolen in that part of the United Kingdom.

8. And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons in any one of the parts of the United Kingdom shall hereafter receive or have any chattels, goods, or other effects stolen or otherwise feloniously taken in any other part of the United Kingdom, knowing the same to have been stolen or otherwise feloniously taken; every such person or persons shall be liable to be indicted, tried, and punished for such offence in that part of the United Kingdom where he, she, or they shall so receive or have the said chattels, goods, or other effects, in the same manner to all intents and purposes as if the said chattels, goods, or other effects, had been originally stolen or otherwise feloniously taken, in that part of the United Kingdom in which such person shall so receive or have such chattels, goods, or other effects respectively.

On the evening of the day on which Mr. Justice Johnson was arrested, a writ of Habeas Corpus, at common law, was sued out, returnable immediately before the Lord Chief Justice of the court of King's-bench of Ireland, who ordered the parties to attend, and the return to be made, on the next morning, Saturday the 19th, at twelve o'clock.

On Saturday, January 19th, the party was brought before the Lord Chief Justice, and the return made.

George the third, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, to Edward Medlicott greeting, we command you, that you have the body of the hon. Robert Johnson detained in your custody, as it is said, under safe and secure conduct, or by whatsoever other name, addition of name or surname, said Robert Johnson is called in the same, before the right hon. the chief justice of our court of Chief Place in Ireland, at his house in Merrion-square, Dublin, immediately on sight or receipt thereof—together with the day and cause of his the said Robert Johnson's being so taken and detained, to do and receive what shall then and there be considered concerning him, and have you then and there this writ, witness William Downes, esq. at the King's Courts, Dublin, the 28th day of November, in the 45th year of our reign.

Examined by WALTER BOURNE,
Deputy clerk of the Crown.

H. & R. CONWAY.

J. S. EMERSON.

In obedience to the annexed writ, I do hereby certify, that I am a magistrate and peace-officer of the county of Dublin, and that I apprehended and arrested and took into my custody, on the 18th day of January, 1805, at Milltown, in the said county, the hon. Robert Johnson, in the annexed writ named; and that my authority for so doing was, a warrant from the right hon. lord Ellenborough, lord chief justice of England, duly signed and sealed by him—and which warrant is in my possession, and is in the words and figures following: "England to wit.—Whereas, it is certified to me by one of the clerks in the Crown-office, that the hon. Robert Johnson, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, esq. one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland, stands indicted in his majesty's court of King's-bench, at Westminster, for certain misdemeanors, in composing, writing, publishing and printing, at Westminster aforesaid, certain scandalous and malicious libels, of and concerning his majesty's government of Ireland, the right hon. Philip Earl of Hardwicke, general and general-governor of Ireland; the right hon. John Lord Redesdale, his majesty's lord chancellor and keeper of the great seal, and one of his privy council of Ireland; and the hon. Charles Osborne, one of the justices assigned to hold pleas, before the king, himself, in Ireland, against the peace, &c.—to which indictment the said Robert Johnson hath not as yet appeared. These are therefore to will and require, and in his majesty's name, strictly to charge and command you and every of you on sight hereof to apprehend and take the body of the said Robert Johnson, and bring him before me or one other of the judges of his majesty's court of King's-bench, if taken in or near the city of London, or Westminster; if elsewhere, before some justice of the peace near to the place where he shall be herewith taken, to the end that he may become bound with sufficient sureties for his appearance in his majesty's court of King's-bench, at Westminster, and to plead within the first eight days of next term to the said indictment, and to try the same at the sitting of Nisi Prius, to be held after the same term in and for the county of Middlesex, and personally to appear in the same court on the return of the postea, in case he shall be convicted, and be further dealt with according to law, hereof fail not at your peril. Given under my hand and seal the 24th day of November, 1804. Ellenborough. (Seal.) To Edward Williams, gentleman, my tipstaff, and to all chief and petty constables, headboroughs, and tythingmen, and all others whom it may concern." And which warrant (the said Robert Johnson having at the time of the perfection thereof, and ever since resided at Milltown aforesaid in the said county) was, previous to the said arrest, duly endorsed with his name by John Bell, esq. a justice of the peace for the said county; and, after I had arrested the said Robert Johnson, under the said warrant, so endorsed as aforesaid, I brought him before the said John Bell, at Milltown aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, to be dealt with according to law—he, the said John Bell, having been present at the said arrest: and the said Robert Johnson then and there declined and refused to tender any bail, or to enter into recognizance, although requested so to do by the said John Bell, for the purposes stated in the warrant of the said lord chief justice; thereupon the said John Bell directed me to detain the said Robert Johnson in my custody; and, at the same time, handed to me a warrant, under the hand and seal of the said John Bell, now in my possession, and which is in the words and figures following:—“Whereas a warrant, issued under the hand and seal of the right honourable lord Ellenborough, lord chief justice of England, bearing date the 24th day of November, 1804, and directed to Edward Williams, gent. his lordship’s tipstaff, and to all chief and petty constables, headboroughs, and tythingmen, and all others whom it may concern, to apprehend and take the body of the hon. Robert Johnson, late of Westminster in the county of Middlesex;—and whereas, the said Robert Johnson, at the time of issuing of the said warrant, and ever since, hath resided in the county of Dublin, in Ireland, and for the purpose of authorizing the execution of said warrant, I, John Bell, esq. one of his majesty’s justices of the peace for said county, did duly endorse my name on the said warrant;—and whereas, the said warrant hath been executed, and the body of the said Robert Johnson hath been brought before me accordingly;—and whereas, the said Robert Johnson hath declined, and altogether refused, to give or offer any bail for the purposes specified in the said warrant of the said lord Ellenborough, or to enter into a recognizance in his own name, for such purpose, which, by the consent of the attorney-general I offered to accept. These are, therefore, to authorize and require you forthwith to convey the said Robert Johnson in the most direct way into England, and then to bring him before the next justice of the peace, near the place where he shall arrive or land; and for so doing, the aforesaid warrant of the said lord Ellenborough, and the endorsement of my name thereon, and these presents shall be to you and each of you a sufficient authority. 18th January, 1805. John Bell. (Seal.) To Edward Medlicott, esq. and his assistants.” And I did accordingly take and do still detain the said Robert Johnson in my custody under the several warrants and authorities aforesaid, in order to convey him by the most direct way into England; and I did accordingly for that purpose upon the day of his arrest, aforesaid, and immediately after it, bring him into the city of Dublin (being the most direct way from Milltown aforesaid to England) where the said several warrants were duly endorsed by Frederick Darley, esq. a justice of peace in and for the said city; and I was then about immediately to proceed to England with the body of the said Robert Johnson, there to bring him before the next justice of the peace near the place where he should arrive and land, when I was served with the annexed writ, by which I have been delayed from proceeding to England with the said Robert Johnson, under the several warrants and authorities aforesaid, and under the provisions and authority of an act passed in the 44th year of the reign of his present majesty, entitled, “An act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from one county to another.” And I do further certify, that I have the body of the said Robert Johnson on the day and at the place in the said annexed writ, as by the said writ I am commanded, so answers EDWARD MEDLICOTT.

The Chief Justice was assisted by six of the other judges. A seventh came on the last day of the argument. The counsel of Mr. Justice Johnson then required time to consider of the return, as it was of a very peculiar nature, no instance of a like kind having ever occurred before, and the return having been then instantly made. To this the Attorney-general refused to consent.

Mr. Justice Johnson then (though in a weak state from ill-health) stated the following circumstances of his case, to induce the Court to grant him time until the next day:—

He said, it was true, that he had so long ago as early in the last summer, heard it reported that it was the intention of the king’s administration in Ireland, to charge him in England with some misdemeanor, said to have been committed there in the publication of certain papers, which were said to be libellous. It was reported, that manuscripts had been procured in England from the publisher of the papers, which some persons, said to be acquainted with the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, would swear they believed to be of his hand-writing, and that, upon this evidence, such a charge was intended to be brought against him. He had heard the same report, grounded upon similar circumstances of evidence, circulated with equal confidence, as to other persons whose names were publicly mentioned by persons supposed to form a part of the administration. The circulation of these reports gave him no uneasiness, and indeed did not engage his attention. He did not perceive, from a perusal of the published papers imputed to him, that they contained any matter which could involve the writer in any moral censure; and as to the censure of the law, as the law of the land then stood, and as the eternal principles of justice he hoped would always preserve it, he was conscious that he could not be charged in a place where the same law did not enable him to defend himself; and if he should be charged where the law did enable him to defend himself, he was equally certain, from his own consciousness of the facts, that no such charge could succeed; he remained, therefore, perfectly indifferent to the bustle of these reports, and though in a very precarious state of health, he went the summer circuit. After his return, his illness having increased, he was obliged to put himself under the care of physicians, and for above four months previous to his arrest had been confined to his house, and under the necessity of having constant medical attendance. In the month of September, Mr. Justice Johnson had been informed by a friend (who had just heard it reported) that the prosecution talked of was of a much more serious nature than had been at first imagined; for that he had been told, that a bill had been brought into parliament, and had passed in the month of July last into a law, which by an ex-post facto construction would over-reach the fact (with which it pleased some people here to charge him) and under which it was intended to arrest him in Ireland, to have him carried in custody to England, and tried there; for the avowed purpose of depriving him of all means of defence, inasmuch as it was said that the act had, subsequently to the fact having been committed, erected a jurisdiction over his person to which he had not been before subject, and while it provided for the expense of his being transmitted into England, it provided no power by which he could summon one witness on his behalf from this country, where, as he certainly had resided at the time the fact laid to his charge was committed, his defence could alone arise. It was added, that this act had been brought into parliament by the brother-in-law * of the person in whose name, and at whose instance, Mr. Justice Johnson was to be prosecuted. This account of the act appeared so extraordinary, that it was laid before counsel for their consideration: they were of opinion, that although the act was framed in a manner so loose and inaccurate as to make the matter a question of construction; yet, that upon a fair interpretation of the law, it did not appear to include such a case as that laid before them, but had for its objects only those persons, who having committed offences while they resided in one part of the United Kingdom, had escaped, departed from it, or fled, in order to elude justice. This opinion, he said, was doubly satisfactory; not only relieving his own case from a very oppressive operation of law, but also relieving the persons above alluded to from the possibility of having it supposed that they had, in bringing the bill into parliament, a particular case, in the event of which they were interested, in view. Mr. Justice Johnson said, that soon after his illness increased so much, that he became utterly incapable of attending to any business, and continued in that state until about the beginning of December last, when he began, in some degree, to recover, and his physicians strongly recommended it to him to try (as soon as any increase of strength and a milder state of the weather would enable him to travel) the effect of the water at Bath. About this time, a friend of his having happened to call on him, the subject of his going to Bath was mentioned; and he said, he had apprehensions, that if he should go, some effort to arrest his person, while there, might be made under this charge of a supposed misdemeanor. His friend said, he could not conceive, from the character of lord Hardwicke, that he would permit such an advantage to be taken; and that he would himself either speak to lord Hardwicke, or convey Mr. Justice Johnson's wishes, and express his hopes that some assurance might be given that while his health compelled him to remain at Bath, he should be permitted to continue there unmolested. This was accordingly done, and Mr. Marsden was requested to apply to the lord-lieutenant on the subject. About the 10th or 11th of December, Mr. Marsden sent as an answer the following note:

"Objection will not be made to Mr. Justice Johnson going to England in the course of a month; he must be prepared to give bail then himself in 1,000*l.*; and two sureties in 500*l.* each. Adopting this course, it will not be considered necessary to put in force the warrant of the Chief Justice in England, under which Mr. Justice Johnson might be sent to England."

This note seemed to have conceded a favour of rather an extraordinary nature,—namely, that if Mr. Justice Johnson should, by causing bail to be put in, render any arrest of his person an act of false imprisonment; why then, indeed, he need not be under any apprehension of being arrested.

* "The two foremost persons upon the committee for bringing in that bill, were Mr. Perceval, the brother-in-law of Lord Redesdale, and Mr. Yorke, the brother of Lord Hardwicke." 2 Plowden's Hist. of Ireland 386.

However, as the terms of the note seemed to allow a month's time for the performance of this liberal condition, no immediate answer was returned. Mr. Marsden, however, on the 13th of December thought proper to send the following note.

" Dublin Castle, 13th Dec. 1804.

" Dear Sir ;

On receiving your note of the tenth instant, I expected to have learned whether Mr. Justice Johnson had determined to proceed to England, as was stated by you to be his wish to do. Finding that you had not been charged with any answer, I am desired to request that you will learn from Mr. Justice Johnson whether it be his intention to go to England within the time mentioned ;—for should this not be the case, or should he continue to decline charging you with any answer, such proceedings will be taken, under the warrant, for his apprehension, as may be directed.

" Your's very truly,
" A. MARSDEN."

" To ———— "

This peremptory demand and threat, so soon following the above liberal offer, became serious, particularly in the enfeebled state in which Mr. Justice Johnson said he then was, and the great severity of the weather ; and accordingly the two notes were laid before counsel to advise what should be done. They were of opinion, that, as by giving bail in the manner demanded, all question of the operation of the above-mentioned statute upon the case would be given up, that a copy, if possible, of the instrument or document, called in Mr. Marsden's notes a warrant, should be procured, in order that they might have a more accurate consideration of the case. For this purpose an application was made to the lord-lieutenant, which, for very obvious reasons, it was deemed prudent should be made through the chief secretary of state. Accordingly, on the 17th of December, the following note was written to sir Evan Nepean :

" Sir ;—In consequence of the state of my health, by which I have been confined for above two months, and of the recommendation of my physicians, to make use of the Bath waters as soon as I should be able to travel, a friend of mine was so good as to solicit his excellency the lord lieutenant for me, that he would be pleased to grant me permission to go to England ; and, at the same time (from some rumours I had heard, that it was the intention of his excellency to cause me to be prosecuted in England for some misdemeanor said to be committed by me there), I did request of the gentleman, who had undertaken the matter for me, to express my hope that his excellency's known mildness and humanity would afford me his protection during my stay at Bath, by an assurance, that no arrest of my person should take place there ; as from my feeble state of health, and necessary absence from friends and advice, I should be but ill able, in such a situation, to meet so deep a proof of his excellency's displeasure.

" In consequence of this solicitation, two notes were forwarded from Mr. Secretary Marsden ; though these notes do not contain any official form (as from the humble and private nature of my application they need not) yet, as the first conveys to me his excellency's indulgent permission to go to Bath ; coupled, however, with the conditions which he was pleased to annex, of my giving bail and also the precise measure of bail which the magistrate should take ; and, as the second states, that Mr. Secretary Marsden is desired to require an immediate answer to the first. I cannot have any doubt that these papers were intended to convey to me his excellency's commands. I deem it therefore proper, from the respect I feel, and the duty I owe to his excellency, to request that my answer may be laid before him by you, and that you will have the goodness to acquaint his excellency, that even if his excellency's permission to me to go to Bath were unshackled with any condition, it would not be in my power, in my present enfeebled state of health, to take immediate advantage of it at this season—and in the present state of the weather—nor until some favourable alteration, which my physicians hope for soon, shall take place ; and that you will also have the goodness to say that I am at this moment totally ignorant (except from vague and general conversation, and to no greater extent than I have already mentioned) of the precise nature of the fact with which I am charged, and of the precise nature of the instruments under which proceedings are threatened against me here—no such matter having ever come before me in the course of my experience. I therefore humbly hope, that his excellency will direct a copy or copies of such papers or documents, as he may deem proper, to be given to my solicitor, that I may have the benefit of legal advice in such a situation—assuring his excellency, that it is my intent to be directed by the opinion of impartial and skilful men, and to submit to whatever course they shall deem right. At present I have nothing to lay before counsel but vague rumour, from which it cannot be supposed they can form a proper opinion :—I do not mean, in making this request, to desire the possession of any secret of the crown, as the prosecutor.—

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,
“ ROBERT JOHNSON.”

“ Milltown, near Dublin,
17th Dec., 1804.

“ To sir Evan Nepean.”

On the twenty-first of December, sir Evan Nepean sent the following answer.

“ Dublin Castle, 21st Dec., 1804.

“ Sir ;—Your letter of the 17th instant has been delivered to me by your servant, and, in reply to it, I am to inform you, that the communications which have taken place between your friend and Mr. Marsden were altogether private ; and therefore, you are not to consider the notes of Mr. Marsden, which you very properly observe do not purport to be official, as conveying to you, in any respect, the lord lieutenant's pleasure. I have, however, no difficulty in saying, that if you are still disposed to go to England, I have no doubt his excellency, upon a proper application, will be very ready to comply with your wishes ; but as to his extending, in that event, a protection against arrest in England for misdemeanors supposed to have been committed by you there, it is, as you must very well know, altogether out of his excellency's power to afford you any such protection ;—however, the apprehension of such arrest, for a bailable offence, cannot, I should presume, constitute any objection to your going to England, according to your original intention, and the proposal of your friend to Mr. Marsden ; on the contrary, I should suppose you would feel it due to your situation to meet any charge which has been preferred against you, without any appearance of difficulty or delay.

“ With respect to the latter part of your letter, which expresses a hope that his excellency will direct that your solicitor may be furnished with copies of certain papers and documents to which you allude, I have only to observe, that no such papers or documents have been transmitted from England—and, therefore, I have thought it altogether unnecessary to submit your letter to the lord lieutenant's consideration.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

“ Mr. Justice Johnson.”

This answer was laid before counsel, who upon the latter part of the note, were of opinion, either that no such instrument as that called a warrant had ever been in existence, and that Mr. Marsden had made use of such an intimation merely to induce Mr. Justice Johnson to give bail, or that if any such instrument had been really transmitted, administration had been wisely advised not to make use of it, and had consequently determined to suppress it. No conception was entertained that any attempt had, or could have been made, “ to palter in a double sense.”

All idea, Mr. Justice Johnson said, was from this time given up by him and by his counsel, that any attempt would be made to carry any such warrant into execution in Ireland ; and accordingly he gave neither himself nor his counsel any farther trouble about the matter. He wrote the following letter to sir Evan Nepean :

“ Sir ;—I had the honour of receiving your letter of the 21st. I put you to this second trouble only to request you will be so good as to excuse me for having taken up your time with my first application, in consequence of a mistake which I perceive I had fallen into. Mr. Secretary Marsden's notes having been sent in answer to my application to my lord lieutenant for leave of absence, though I knew them to be so far private as not to contain official forms, yet I had not then the least doubt they conveyed to me his excellency's pleasure. I thought I had obtained his excellency's leave of absence, but coupled with certain conditions, which, if performed, it was stated in Mr. Marsden's note, it would ‘ not be considered necessary to put in force, in Ireland, the warrant of the chief justice in England, under which,’ it was alleged, ‘ Mr. Justice Johnson might be sent to England.’ As the note mentioned my going to England in the course of a month, I did not think it necessary to return an immediate answer, more particularly as the state of the weather and of my health precluded me from taking advantage of what I then conceived to be his excellency's permission. In two days after (13th Dec.) Mr. Secretary Marsden again wrote, that ‘ he was desirous to learn’ (I presumed by his excellency) ‘ whether it was my intention to go to England ; for should that not be the case, or should I decline to send an answer, such proceedings will be taken under the warrant for my apprehension, as may be directed.’ It was the intimation conveyed to me by these notes which led me to solicit for a copy of any instruments under which proceedings were threatened to be taken against me here in the hands of the Irish government. I am sure, sir, your good-nature will induce you to pardon the trouble I have given you, occasioned by these communications.—I am, sir, your humble servant,

“ 26th Dec., 1804. ROBERT JOHNSON.”

“ Sir Evan Nepean.”

Mr. Justice Johnson said, he then received the following Letter from the Lord Chancellor :

"Ardrinn, December 31st, 1804."

"Sir;—Sir Evan Nepean has sent me, by his excellency's direction, a copy of a letter which he received from you, dated the 26th instant, and informs me, that he had received his excellency's commands to acquaint me, that his excellency had no objection to granting you leave to go to England, if no objection should occur to me. As I understand that your health requires an immediate journey to Bath,* and the public service does not appear to me to make your remaining in Ireland necessary, I can have no objection; and I am therefore to signify to you, by his excellency's command, that you have his excellency's permission to go to England as soon as you think fit.

"I have the honour to be, sir,

"Your most humble servant,

"REDESDALE."

"The Hon. Mr. Justice Johnson."

Mr. Justice Johnson said, that about the 15th or 16th of January following however, he received an intimation (which had been transmitted by Mr. Marsden to a friend of Mr. Justice Johnson) that if he did not sign a paper, not only equivalent to giving bail, but also undertaking to plead and go to trial in England, in the term following (which began in a week), an arrest of his person must take place.

[The communication alluded to was as follows:]

"Dublin Castle, 14th Jan., 1805.

"Dear sir;—I send you a copy of a letter which I have received from Mr. White, the solicitor to the Treasury in England, and which contains what it is material should be communicated to Mr. Justice Johnson. I cannot do better than put it into your hands for the purpose; and I request you will favour me with Mr. Justice Johnson's determination thereupon with as little delay as possible.

"I am, dear sir,

"Your most faithful, humble servant,

"A. MARSDEN."

"The KING v. JOHNSON.

"Sir;—I have the honour of your letter of the 6th instant, which I have shown to Mr. Attorney-General, who directs me to say, that Mr. Justice Johnson should be immediately applied to, and it should be notified to him, that an indictment has been preferred against him in the court of King's-bench, and found by the grand jury for Middlesex; that a warrant for his apprehension is in Ireland; that it is much to be wished that the necessity of executing that warrant should be superseded, especially under the impression that bail could not be regularly taken upon it in Ireland; that as the object of the warrant is only to ensure an appearance and plea to the indictment, and an appearance on the postea if convicted, if Mr. Johnson will give an assurance (which to obviate all mistake should be in writing), that he will forthwith cause an appearance to be entered, and within the first eight days of the next term a plea to be put in; and that he will appear in the King's-bench on the return of the postea in case he should be convicted, the attorney-general thinks he will be justified in recommending and consenting that the unpleasant extremity of executing the warrant should not be resorted to; but if he should refuse to give such assurance, the attorney-general is of opinion that, however unpleasant it may be, the warrant, after having been endorsed by some justice of the peace for the county or place where Mr. Johnson is, must be executed, and the consequences, however painful, will be such as the law will impose, and which Mr. Justice Johnson's refusal to appear and plead voluntarily will disable the attorney-general from preventing.

"I am, sir,

"JOSEPH WHITE."

"No. 6, Lincoln's-Inn,

"9th Jan. 1805."

To this Mr. Justice Johnson said he answered, that his counsel had gone out of town during the vacation; that they were not returned, but being daily expected, the letter of Mr. White should, at the earliest opportunity, be laid before them, and an answer in conformity to their opinion should be immediately returned. On the 17th, however, at a late hour in the evening, two peace officers made their appearance at Mr. Justice Johnson's house, who being admitted, said they came to require Mr. Johnson immediately to sign a paper which they produced, or otherwise that their orders were to arrest him. They said, they came from the attorney-general. Mr. Justice Johnson conceiving that the answer which he had sent the day before had not been laid before the attorney-general, reduced it to writing, and requested of the officers, that they would lay it before the attorney-general. They accordingly went away to do so, Mr. Justice Johnson engaging to remain where he was until their return. The next morning they returned, with peremptory orders to execute the warrant, if the condition before-mentioned should not be instantly complied with. Mr. Justice Johnson said, that finding the paper was to bind him to appear in Westminster-hall, and to go to trial in so short a space of time, that any attempt to prepare or defend himself would be in vain, and that he had been by the letter of sir Evan Nepean lulled into a deceitful security, he declined (an opportunity even of advising with his counsel being refused to him) to sign the paper. Accordingly, the arrest was completed. A copy of the warrant was then demanded by Mr. Justice Johnson's attorney, for the purpose of suing out a Writ of Habeas Corpus. The copy was at first refused, but afterwards granted; and Mr. Emerson, the attorney, having taken it, was despatched for the writ. The officers were then asked what were their farther orders? They answered, that they must bring Mr. Justice Johnson to Dublin (his house is about two miles distance from Dublin); but, that there he might remain at any house he thought proper. They were asked, if they had any objection to his remaining at the house of Mr. William Johnson, in Harcourt-street? They assented directly. Accordingly, Mr. Justice Johnson said, he drove thither followed by the officers. On his arrival there, it occurred to Mr. Scriven, who had accompanied him, that the attorney-general could not have any reasonable objection to Mr. Justice Johnson returning to his own house for the night, as the writ would be immediately obtained (the chief justice then, in consequence of a previous intimation having been sent, remaining at home for the purpose of allowing it), and that he would himself go and ask the attorney-general. One of the officers said, that as the attorney-general was waiting for him to know the event, he must go, and that he would himself mention the request to the attorney-general, who, he made no doubt, would comply. The officer went, and did not return with an answer until the day was nearly elapsed. He then informed Mr. Justice Johnson, that as to his returning to his own house for that night, the attorney-general would not interfere;* and therefore he, the officer, could not permit it. Mr. Justice Johnson said, he replied, he was sorry for it, but would endeavour to accommodate himself for the night where he was. The officer, after a little pause, observed, he was sorry he could not permit even that, as his orders were that Mr. Justice Johnson must sail forthwith for England—and then turned to the constable who was to accompany his prisoner in the voyage, and gave him some directions. Thus, Mr. Justice Johnson said, that after an illness which had confined him nearly four months, suffering under an almost total deprivation of the use of his limbs on one side, and requiring constant assistance, he had been, under a pretence of being taken no farther than Dublin, led away from his own house, without having given the slightest intimation to his family of the cause of his departure—without having left any provision for the support of his house during his absence—without having prepared any money for his own expences—and he was even without being permitted to return, or to remain a sufficient time to procure a change of clothing, or friend to accompany him, or a servant to attend him, in this helpless situation, to be shipped on board in most severe and tempestuous weather, and accompanied by a constable, on his landing on the other side, to be sent from magistrate to magistrate, by "the most direct road" to London; and this attempt was made at the moment when his attorney was actually employed at the proper office preparing a writ of Habeas Corpus, and the chief justice remaining at home, by appointment, to allow it.

* "It is a debt due to candour to state the answer which was given by Mr. Attorney-general to this complaint of severity made by Judge Johnson. Mr. Attorney said, that as the act under which the arrest was made, enacted, that the prisoner should be carried "by the most direct way," he considered, that any delay in the transmission (even for one night, and in the prisoner's own house, and at his own earnest desire) would enable him to maintain an action for false imprisonment; and, therefore, the desire of Judge Johnson was not complied with."—Orig. Ed.

In this difficulty, he said, he sent privately to his coachman directions to bring the carriage to the door, and that he should, as soon as his master got in, without waiting for farther orders, drive directly to the lord chief justice. He then applied to the constable, and told him it was necessary, before they went on board, to call at a house in town, in order to leave some directions, and asked the constable to accompany him in the carriage. The constable having assented, they got into the carriage, and were immediately driven, without the privity of the constable, to the house of the lord chief justice, where Mr. Justice Johnson immediately got out, and threw himself upon his lordship's protection, who accordingly kept him, until the writ of Habeas Corpus was procured, sealed, and allowed.

These circumstances, which Mr. Justice Johnson said were not concluded until a late hour yesterday evening, together with the deceitful security into which he had, by sir Evan Nepean's letter, been lulled, would, he hoped, account sufficiently for his counsel being unprepared for an immediate argument.

The judges having permitted him to state so far, he said, he hoped they would indulge him for a few minutes, in stating publicly his reasons for his resistance, and for declining to meet at once the trial which was offered to him.

Mr. Justice Johnson then read the following reasons:

Because every contrivance has been made use of to obtain a trial in form, and to exclude a trial of the merits.

The proceeding by information is avoided, and that of indictment chosen, because a rule for an information could not be obtained without an affidavit of the falsehood of the charges published, which the prosecutors would not do, because they could not do so with safety.

The particular place is chosen, and the trial transferred to it, because an acquittal there will, in a pecuniary view, be a more severe punishment, from the enormous expense (if witnesses could be had at any expense), of defending, than any fine would probably amount to even if the indictment were submitted to.

Because no expense whatsoever can give the defendant any certainty of having any witness to attend, inasmuch as the prosecutor has purposely chosen a place for trial where the defendant cannot have compulsory process for the attendance of any witness, although a law has been passed for the purpose of bringing him thither.

Because the present is a case, of all others, where such a circumstance will produce the highest degree of oppression; inasmuch as the charge is attempted to be supported on evidence of similitude of hand-writing, of papers in the possession of the prosecutor himself, and of which the defendant can have no knowledge until the moment of trial, in a place beyond sea, and where there is perhaps not one person resident acquainted with his hand-writing; and even if he had, in such a case, a trial where his hand-writing was known, as such evidence is matter of belief and conjecture merely, his method must be, to summon as many persons into court as he could get to attend, who were acquainted with his hand-writing, in order, upon the view at the time, to be enabled to have those who could form a belief or opinion upon the fact—it being notorious, that there are many people who have seen a hand-writing, yet, upon a particular writing, which they had not seen before being produced, have not been able to form such a belief as the law requires.

Because it is notorious that the prosecutors have procured witnesses (most probably at the public expense, and without compulsory process), to go from Dublin (all residents there) to London, to give evidence there; and that the fact, as against the defendant, must be testified by them.

Because it is notorious, that all the above is contrivance to elude a fair trial, and not necessary to the attainment of justice; inasmuch as it is notorious, that the publication, which is the only fact arising in London, arose as much in Dublin—the paper having been sold, and being daily now selling in the shops in Dublin; which fact is as much a publication as the publication in London, and could equally be given in evidence on a trial against the supposed writer.

Because, by a trial in London, if the defendant should be convicted, he would be deprived of the full benefit of giving the truth of the facts, and other circumstances, in evidence, in mitigation of his sentence—the Court, in such last-mentioned case, determining as a jury, upon the credit they give to the witnesses, from knowledge of their character, and from knowledge of the defendant's himself, and from their own knowledge of facts which they may happen to have.

Because, even if the case were doubtful, the liberty of the subject should be preserved:—though the defendant does not apprehend it to be doubtful; because, in order to remand the defendant, the Court must determine, that in a case against a supposed writer of a libel, when he was at the time of the alleged writing and publication in Dublin and not elsewhere, and when the papers appeared to have been written in Dublin, and where the witnesses to prove the writing on the one side, and to disprove it on the other, are all residents in Dublin, and where the publication was in Dublin (as well as in London and elsewhere), and where all the facts happened previous to the passing of the act, the legislature had it in their contemplation, that such a case should be sent for trial to London, a place nearly 400 miles distance from Dublin, beyond the seas, beyond the jurisdiction of the code of laws within which the above facts happened, and to a place where no process can compel the attendance of a single witness resident in Dublin aforesaid; an intention so monstrous, that it never can be enforced, while the act, by any possibility, can admit of any other construction.

The argument then commenced by the counsel for Mr. Justice Johnson.

The attorney-general replied on Tuesday the 22nd.

A difference of opinion subsisting among the judges,* the matter was adjourned into the Court of King's-bench.

* It was reported that the division was as follows: there were eight judges assembled:—Three were of opinion that Mr. Justice Johnson should be remanded; three that he should be discharged; two declined to give any opinion.—Orig. Ed.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, DUBLIN.

SATURDAY, JANUARY, 26, 1805.

The King, against the hon. Robert Johnson.

The writ of Habeas Corpus and the return were read; as were also the following

AFFIDAVITS.

The King, } Robert Johnson,
v. } fourth justice of his
The Hon. Robert Johnson } majesty's Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, maketh oath and saith, that he hath lately seen a writing, signed Edward Medlicott, purporting to be a return to a writ of Habeas Corpus issued in this cause, on behalf of deponent—in which is set forth a writing, stated by the said Edward Medlicott, in his said return, to be the copy of a warrant from the right hon. lord Ellenborough, lord chief justice of England, &c.—in which copy, as set forth in said return, it is set forth, that it was certified to the said lord Ellenborough, by one of the clerks of the Crown-office, that the hon. Robert Johnson, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, esq., one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in Ireland, stands indicted in his majesty's court of King's-bench at Westminster, for certain misdemeanors, in composing, writing, publishing, and printing, at Westminster aforesaid, certain scandalous and malicious libels, of and concerning his majesty's government of Ireland; the right hon. Philip Earl of Hardwicke, his majesty's lieutenant-general, and general-governor of Ireland; the right hon. John Lord Redesdale, his majesty's lord chancellor, and keeper of the great seal, and one of his privy council of Ireland; and the hon. Charles Osborne, one of the justices assigned to hold pleas, before the king himself, in Ireland:—This deponent saith he hath heard and believes, that the indictment in the said paper mentioned, has been found upon the prosecution of persons employed or concerned in the administration of his majesty's government in Ireland, and upon the information of three persons, who are all, as deponent believes, attornies of one or more of the law courts in Dublin, and were sent, as deponent has heard and believes, from the city of Dublin to the city of London; deponent saith, that the papers with which deponent stands charged as the writer and publisher, and referred to by said writing, called in said return the warrant of the said lord Ellenborough, were first published in the city of London, as deponent has heard and believes, between the latter end of the month of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, and the commencement of January, one thousand eight hundred and four, and appear to bear date within that period, and relate principally to transactions which occurred in Ireland, in or about the twenty-third of July, one thousand eight hundred and three, and immediately subsequent thereto; and this deponent positively saith, that he never has been out of this part of the United Kingdom, but has constantly resided therein since the latter end of October, one thousand eight hundred and two, being one year before the commencement of said publication, and also a considerable time before the transactions concerning which they appear, as deponent believes, to have been written. This deponent saith, that any evidence which this deponent could procure, relative to this deponent's hand-writing, conduct, or character, do arise in the city of Dublin, and not elsewhere; and deponent saith, that he hath no means whereby he could be certain of or compel the attendance of witnesses in the city of London, necessary for his defence.

Mr. J. S. Emerson.

Mr. Macartney.—I have to move your lordships that the defendant may be discharged, on the ground that his arrest is illegal.

The offence with which he stands charged, is merely a misdemeanor, and the arrest is attempted to be justified, under the statute 44th of the king. That act received the royal assent on July 20th, 1804, and before I go into the act, the defendant is entitled to be discharged; or ex debito justitiæ, the offence is bailable.

Mr. Justice Day.—Will it not content you, that the attorney-general consents to bail?

Mr. Macartney.—I wish the Court not to misunderstand me. It is no part of my application that he should be bailed, though I make it part of my argument. The position was stated to your lordship, but was controverted by the attorney-general; and the gentleman who urged it, not expecting such an opposition, was not prepared with authority.

Mr. Justice Day.—The attorney-general's position was this, that a man standing indicted for an offence, and not appearing, was not bailable by an inferior officer.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—I do not think this point very material.

Mr. Macartney.—As this is a very great constitutional question, I wish to argue it in every point of view, in which I can. I refer to Wilkes's case,* which operated as much upon the public mind as any. He was charged with a libel of as serious a nature as the present, and was committed upon a warrant by two secretaries of state. He applied for a Habeas Corpus, which was granted by chief justice Pratt, whose opinion I shall state in his own words. It had been insisted, that a libel was a breach of the peace: He expressly lays it down that a libel is not a breach of the peace; he says, "it tends to a breach of the peace, and that is the utmost," and cited, 1 Lev. 139. "But," says his lordship, "that which only tends to the breach of the peace, cannot be a breach of the peace;" and, then he goes on to lay down the doctrine which I insist upon. He expressly says, that a libeller is not bound to find sureties of the peace, and that he could not find in any book a case where a libeller was bound to find sureties of the peace, excepting the case of the Seven Bishops; that three of the judges held that bail should be required, but that Powell, the only honest man of the four, dissented from the opinion of his brethren, and he was of opinion with him, that the case of the Seven Bishops was not law; that it was absurd to require bail in the case of a libel, and therefore Wilkes was discharged.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—Wilkes was discharged upon the ground of having privilege; and as to the last expressions, that it was absurd to require bail in the case of libel, if you advert to the former part of his opinion, you will see that he must be misreported. In another report, these words are not stated.† In the former part, he says, that though a libel is not a breach of the peace, yet it is a great misdemeanor, and requires bail, according to circumstances.

Mr. Macartney.—It was part of the argument of Wilkes's counsel, that he was entitled to be discharged, as having privilege of parliament, and I have accurately stated the words reported.

One of the highest authorities, lord Hale, 2 P. C. 127, lays it down, that regularly in all offences, either against the common law or acts of parliament, that are below felony, the

* 2. Wils. 150, 19 Howell's State Trials, 981.

† This variance in the two reports of lord chief justice Pratt's argument has been recently the subject of some discussion in the case of Butt v. sir Nathaniel Conant in the Common Pleas, Hil. Term, 1. Geo. 4th, Feb. 8th, 1820, not yet (June 1820) reported.

offender is bailable, unless he hath had judgment, or by some special act of parliament, bail is ousted.

The same doctrine is expressly holden, in Marriot's case, 1 Salk, 104. He was charged with as high an offence, short of felony, as well can be imagined; with forging the endorsement of an exchequer bill, which is a part of the public securities, and which should be protected by every magistrate.

The return in the present case is attempted to be justified by statute 44th Geo. 3rd. I contend that this case does not come within the statute; and what I have already said, tends to fortify the arguments which I shall use to show that it does not. That statute has various objects in view, and whether you consider it, on reading its title, or its preamble in the third or fourth sections (wherein, or in two of them at least, it recites the mischief meant to be remedied), or the enacting part of it, you will be of opinion, that this case does not come within it.

It is entitled, "An Act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial, offenders escaping," &c. &c. The preamble in the first section is, "that persons against whom warrants are granted escape, &c." The object, beyond all controversy, was, to bring offenders to justice, who escaped. Whether they resided or not in the place where they are arrested, is another consideration: but I rely, and shall urge it upon every clause, that the object was to bring offenders to justice, who shall have escaped.

The first section relates to this island merely, and is calculated to enable the magistracy of the country to follow offenders from the counties, where they had committed offences, into those where they should be found; and if the offence were capital, to transmit from thence to the county where they were to be tried; and if bailable, to bail upon the spot, if one of the minora crimina, and it is carefully guarded in this part, that a person charged with a lower degree of crime, should not be treated as a felon.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Your argument is, that there must be an escape?

Mr. Macartney.—I rely upon that; and through every section, it appears to have been the intention of the legislature.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Suppose it were accessorial felony, by procuring a murder in England, without leaving Ireland?

Mr. W. Johnson.—He could not be tried at all, as the law stands.

Mr. Justice Day.—There is an act of parliament as I apprehend, which regulates that. The judgment in one country may be used in the other, though the accessorial party could not be tried, but in Ireland.

Mr. W. Johnson.—Not even there, as I shall show.

Mr. Macartney.—I admit, that the first section is intended to reach offenders of every description within this island. It authorizes, that a felon may be pursued from the county where he committed the crime, to the county where he is found, and may be transmitted for trial; it embraces every crime, the greater and the lesser; it empowers the magistrate to pursue any offender, high or low, to any part of the island, and it is carefully guarded that nothing more shall be done than is essential to the public peace—that he who may be guilty of an assault shall not be punished as a felon; and through every stage of the fifth section, the liberty of the subject is protected. The endorsing magistrate, i. e. the magistrate of the county where the culprit is found, is enabled, upon affidavit that the warrant produced is the warrant of the magistrate whose name is signed to it, to endorse the warrant and thus legalize the arrest. If the offence be bailable, bail is to be taken, and a recognizance, which is to be transmitted together with the affidavit or confession, &c. to the proper county; and in case of forfeiture, the recognizance shall be recovered, &c.

In this case, it is remarkable that no such affidavit is made.

Mr. Justice Day.—Then the magistrate endorses it at his peril.

Mr. Macartney.—He may so; but by the act of parliament he should have an affidavit, that the warrant was actually the warrant of the magistrate who is stated to have issued it.

Mr. Justice Day.—Then you argue, that there is no evidence, that this is lord Ellenborough's warrant.

Mr. Macartney.—It may be a forgery, and it does not purport to be issued by the chief justice of England; it is signed, "Ellenborough," but it does not state where he is. If it were signed by Medlicott, it would have been signed by him as a justice of the county; and this warrant ought to state, by "Ellenborough, Lord Chief Justice of England"—if it be his warrant.

The third section relates to persons who shall have escaped from Ireland to Great Britain—[the learned counsel here stated the section], the date is material, because I argue that the act is prospective—not retrospective; and if you shall be of opinion, that this section warrants the transmission of an offender for one of the inferior order of crimes, committed in Ireland, to be arrested by a magistrate in England, and transmitted to Ireland for trial, you must decide that by a side wind, and not by express words, the English Habeas Corpus act of Car. 2 is ipso facto pro tanto repealed. I need not observe how much the English nation, and all writers upon its laws, pride and plume themselves upon the security which this famous statute has given to the people of England.

The sentiments of Mr. Justice Blackstone (3 Comm. 135) are more emphatical than any thing I can convey to the Court. After having enumerated the various Habeas Corpus laws, and the acts of parliament made in England, to preserve the liberty of the subject from the encroachment of the crown, he refers to a case which drew great public attention—Jenkes's case, who was committed by the king and council for a turbulent speech at Guildhall; he says, "new shifts and devices were made use of to prevent his enlargement by law"—"The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the famous Habeas Corpus act, 31 Car. 2, c. 2, which is frequently considered as another Magna Charta of the kingdom." He then goes on through the provisions of that statute—it is not necessary for me to mention more than that the isles of Jersey and Guernsey are brought within it, which were not before, and it contains these very remarkable words, "that no inhabitant of England" (and the case I put was that of an inhabitant), "shall be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, &c. on pain, that the party committing shall forfeit 500*l.* with treble costs, shall be disabled to bear any office of trust or profit, shall incur the penalties of præmunire, and shall be incapable of the king's pardon."

I can conceive no penalty more severe than this, which is inflicted by this second Magna Charta for a violation of the liberty of the subject. But if you construe the 44th, Geo. 3rd, so extensively as that a man found in England an inhabitant there, may be transmitted to Ireland, you repeal that act.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Then the only question is, how far the act of the 44th of the king goes—for so far it repeals the former.

Mr. Macartney.—I contend it meant to go no farther than the exceptions in the former statute, treason and felony. If a man committed treason in Ireland after the passing of that act, he might be taken up, though he had gone to reside in England, and he might be sent into Ireland;—treason and felony are the only exceptions in the act, and even with regard to this exception, in a case of the highest degree of criminality, it was a doubt in England whether a man, who had committed an offence of that nature could be transmitted—2 Ventr. 314, Lundy's case—Colonel Lundy stood charged with having been appointed governor of Londonderry, and intending to betray the city to James. He fled into Scotland, where he was apprehended and transmitted to London; the question was, whether he could be transmitted to Ireland for trial, and upon a meeting of the judges (which shows how great the doubt was) they were of opinion that he could be transmitted, because he was within the exception.

Mr. Justice Daly.—The question was, whether he could be tried by martial law, because after the act, he could have been transmitted, being charged with a capital offence.

Mr. Justice Daly.—I wish to understand another argument—you say that the act 44 Geo. 3rd did not extend to any case except those which were excepted in the Habeas Corpus act.

Mr. Macartney.—The first section extends to all cases, but the third section extends only to capital offences.

Mr. Justice Daly.—What then did it do with regard to England?

Mr. Macartney.—The same thing which was done with regard to Ireland.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Then you might draw your pen across the fourth section.

Mr. Macartney.—No such thing—I shall come to that presently. A case (while my lord Hale was chief justice of the King's-bench) was cited in colonel Lundy's case, of a man who had committed murder in Barbadoes, was taken in England, and was sent over to be tried at Barbadoes; BUT IT WAS BEFORE THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

But upon the question of transmittal, a case was cited at your lordship's house, Kimberley's case, 2 Stra. 848. He had committed a capital offence in Cork, and was taken in England, and a question arose, whether he could be transmitted; and being brought before the judges, it was held he could, being within the exception, and he was transmitted and executed.

Then I come to the case of a person escaping from England into Ireland. The words of the act are, "for remedy of the like inconvenience by the escape into Ireland of persons guilty of crimes" (still retaining the emphatical word escape—but guilty is a strange word, because my idea was, that a man accused was considered as innocent till convicted); "be it enacted, that after 1st of August, 1804" (still prospective), &c. (states the clause).

It is under this fourth section, that the present arrest is to be justified. I contend, that it relates only to the higher order of crimes, and does not embrace the lower order,—that it is prospective, and relates only to crimes to be committed thereafter.

Mr. Justice Daly.—It seems as if it did not relate to crimes, but only to the mode of proceeding against the criminal.

Mr. Macartney.—So it was argued by the attorney-general. But I contend, that it can only apply to persons, who committed offences in England and escaped into Ireland; and from that ground I cannot be removed.

In the construction of this act, which never has been construed, and is doubtful, because the judges of the land have differed in opinion upon it, it is out of the power of human wisdom to give a different interpretation to the third and fourth sections. If you shall be of opinion, that a man charged with an offence in Great Britain, though not escaping from it, but because he happens to be or reside in Ireland may be transmitted to England—it is utterly impossible, but that the decision must be the same way upon the other section, and that a person residing or being in England or Scotland, may be transmitted here into Ireland for trial.

My argument is, that the statute embraces only the higher order of crimes and is prospective:—unless both points are ruled against me, the defendant must be discharged. If the statute be retrospective, to what period may it not be extended? and it follows that in the case a man who had committed a trivial offence in England twenty or thirty years ago, there is nothing to prevent a bill of indictment being found in the most insignificant court there, and a warrant issued to take him here.

You are gravely told of the high nature of this warrant, that the chief justice who had gone the northern circuit was acquainted with the law relative to Scotland, and would not lightly put his name to such a warrant.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—It was not pretended to have effect as his warrant in this country; it is just such a warrant as he would grant for any offence committed in England, and therefore I own I was somewhat surprised, that the first affidavit should say that the warrant was illegal; because it only required that the party should be brought before the chief justice, if taken in Westminster or Middlesex; and if elsewhere, before any justice of the peace of the county. But I take for granted, the meaning of the objection is, that the arrest is illegal.

Mr. Macartney.—My argument is, that a man who may have committed a trivial offence thirty years ago, may be taken in Ireland, carried out of the country without bail or mainprize, and tried among strangers for an offence that should have been forgotten.

Having put an English case, I shall put a Scotch one. I do not know, whether you ever heard of the Scotch law called home-seeking [N. B. the learned counsel pronounced it home-sucking]. The laws of Scotland are very different from the laws of England; for the offence of seditious libel, which is only a misdemeanor in England or Ireland, a man is punished by fine, imprisonment, and sometimes with pillory. But in Scotland it is a transportable offence. Muir, a Scotch advocate, and others have been so punished. I have procured “Erskine upon the Principles of the Law of Scotland,” a book as much esteemed there, as Blackstone here. The offence of home-seeking is merely the assaulting a person in his own house, but it is a capital felony. Erskine, 506. The law is described in the Encyclopædia, and some mention is made of it in Blackstone, but no authority is referred to. Blackstone says, it is synonymous with burglary, which shows, that though he was a learned man, he was ignorant of the Scotch law.

Mr. Justice Day.—The term is home-sacking, which means sacking a man's house.*

* Lest the reader should be misled by the expressions in the text, I have extracted from Mr. Hume's Commentaries on the Law of Scotland, respecting the Description and Punishment of crimes, the following definition of the offence alluded to:

Mr. Macartney.—So Blackstone confounds it. Suppose another case—suppose an Irish ensign serving in Scotland, receives what he conceives a grievous insult, which he should resent; satisfaction is refused, and he writes to a friend in Ireland, to know what he is to do. The term “art and part,” is the same as accessorial in our law. The friend in Ireland writes to the ensign to flog his adversary wherever he finds him, and, following that advice, the ensign goes to the house and assaults his adversary. He is subject to the punishment of home-sacking—he is taken up and searched, the letter is found, the writer is accused as a promoter of the crime; a warrant is issued by a Scotch magistrate, it is transmitted to Ireland, endorsed by an Irish magistrate, and the man who thought he did nothing but give advice to a friend, for the vindication of his honour, is carried off to Scotland, and tried for the crime of home-sacking!

I contend that this is an ex post facto law, and should not be extended. 2 lord Raym. 1352. Part of the ground of my application is the affidavit of the defendant, made upon the second day after the arrest, a copy of which was delivered to the attorney-general. We had a right to make such affidavit, to explain facts, without controverting the writ or the return. The object of that affidavit was, to show, that for the crime with which the defendant is charged, he had not escaped from one island to the other. He states, that he has seen a writing signed, Medlicott, purporting to be a return to the Habeas Corpus, setting forth the warrant, &c. He is described as late of Westminster, which must be added with a view to show he was resident there. He states that he is charged with certain misdemeanors; that he believes the indictment is found upon the information of three persons, attornies of Dublin who were sent to London [the learned counsel here stated the affidavit].

“The only other article in our list of capital offences against the person, is Home-sucken, or the felonious seeking and invasion of a person in his dwelling-place or house. Notice is taken of this crime, and the same description is given of it in the laws of the Visigoths, and in those of Edmund, the Anglo-Saxon king, and of Canute the Dane. It seems, too, to have been known under that name, and as a capital offence, in the law of Utrecht [See Mathæus de vi publicâ et privatâ, ch. 4.], and of some other states of modern times. Our oldest memorial concerning it, is in the Regiam Majestatem [B. 4, ch. 9, 10], which directs the prosecution of it to be followed out in like manner as that of rape and robbery; as, indeed, in its own nature, it far exceeds the guilt of an ordinary assault, and is a crime of that bold and heinous character, which makes it a fit companion of those high transgressions. For nothing can well be attended with greater terror and alarm, or more break in upon a person's peace, and opinion of security for the future, than the sudden irruption and attack of a ruffian in that place which is most peculiarly a man's own, and which the law has carefully fenced for him, as his sanctuary and surest refuge from all manner of harm. It is true, it may not be so necessary now as in more undisciplined times to punish the transgression in every instance to the utmost extent of what the prosecutor may insist for; yet still the crime retains that rank as a Point of Dittay which ancient custom has assigned it (for it rests on custom only), and in any case of extreme or atrocious injury would be warrantably punished with the highest pains of law.”—2 Hume on Crimes, ch. VIII, p. 20.

If the facts stated in this affidavit were not true, the prosecutor might have answered them.

Mr. Justice Day.—Does it appear clearly, that the publications in England were identically the same as those published and purchased in Ireland?

Mr. Macartney.—I apprehend that every publication is a new publication.

Mr. Justice Day.—But does it clearly appear that they are of the same matter?

Mr. Macartney.—It does, by Emerson's affidavit.

Mr. Justice Day.—That is only upon belief.

Mr. Macartney.—But it is not contradicted, and must now be taken as incontrovertibly true.

Mr. Justice Day.—I do not make myself understood; I want to know, whether it is sworn distinctly and positively, not upon hearsay and belief, that the papers purchased here, are the same identical papers upon which the indictment was found?

Mr. Macartney.—It is impossible for a man not acquainted with the secrets of the crown to state that positively.

Mr. Justice Day.—The indictment must set forth the words of the libel.

Mr. Macartney.—Consider where we are. On the moment of the arrest, Mr. Justice Johnson could not send to England. If you let the motion stand over, we will apply for a copy of the indictment.

Mr. Justice Day.—If it were a felony, you could not get a copy. Upon the trial it may be read; but it is doubtful whether they would give you a copy even in misdemeanor.

Mr. Burrowes.—The libel is stated to be upon the Irish government and particular individuals who are named, all resident in Ireland. It appears upon the affidavit that most of the events happened at a certain period, and Emerson swears he bought a publication at a subsequent time in Ireland; which will upon inspection, appear to relate to the Irish government and the same individuals. Therefore it is prima facie the same, when the crown refuses to produce the original and show the matter more satisfactorily. Suppose it were taken for granted, that the fact of going out of the country was essential, the Court would not expect that to be established by evidence which it is impossible to give, but only by that which is in the power of the party, when it can be more satisfactorily shown by the prosecutor.

Mr. Macartney.—Taking the affidavit as true, it was impossible that he could have escaped from England. Because if he was not there since 1802, which he swears he was not, and if the publication related to facts originating in this country in 1803, and subsequent to that period, he could not have been in England when the publication was made, and could not have escaped therefrom. I rely that the intention of this act was, to bring offenders to justice, who, in order to avoid trial in one island, escaped to the other; and the words "reside or be," are to be construed, that the party having a residence in one island, or being in it, and escaping therefrom, comes to reside in the other; and it might be used to avoid a quibble, that though the party be not taken fleeing, he yet shall be taken wherever he shall be found, whether in his residence or not. Such is the plain meaning of the statute, without torturing or forcing the language, and therefore this case is not within it. See the hardships and difficulties, the great inconvenience and heavy oppression, that would attend another construction. A man for a misdemeanor alleged to be committed in England, and who is resident in Donegal, might, upon a bill of indictment found in Cornwall, be transmitted without bail or mainprize, there being no authority to bail him till he touched English ground.

In that part of the statement which relates to the transmittal from one island to another, there is no provision for bail, and no person can take bail, but the person having authority to try; upon that principle is founded the doctrine, that justices of peace cannot take bail, in cases of capital felony; because neither the justice nor the quarter sessions (the court to which he belongs) can try the offence. If this act were extended to a person resident in Ireland, who had not escaped, it would follow, that he must, before he meets an authority to bail him for a misdemeanor, be transmitted to Wales; and how improbable it is, that an unfortunate Irishman would find two householders of that principality to bail him, or even in London two of his countrymen who would appear, or who would be taken as bail. Suppose him a man of inferior degree, the liberty of the meanest peasant is as carefully guarded as that of the man of high rank, you will not, upon a doubtful act, restrain it; 19 Vin. 528, "no statute shall be interpreted so as to be inconvenient and against reason;" it would be highly inconvenient and against reason that a poor man should be sent out of his own country, for a bailable offence; which must happen, if the construction contended for to support this arrest be adopted, because there is no authority here to bail him. The defendant has sworn, that he cannot by legal process enforce the attendance of any witness, if he shall be transmitted for trial to England; all his witnesses reside here, and he cannot enforce their attendance: to try a man in a country where he cannot procure witnesses is against natural justice; 19 Vin. 528, a statute is not to be so construed as to destroy natural justice, and therefore you will take that line which is plain and clear, that the act of parliament between island and island was only meant by the legislature to embrace the higher crimes, and not to touch upon the lower. The words of an act of parliament, I conceive make but a small part of the consideration of the judges, when they put a construction upon it; Plowden compares the words of the law to the shell of a walnut and the sense to the kernel, which he says is the profit; the shell of this act is reside or be, and the kernel is escape.

I rely upon the word escape as showing the intention of the legislature, in enacting this very remarkable law.

Mr. Justice Day.—You do not mean to confine the word to its limited sense, flee, but any manner of migration. Suppose he had committed an offence in England, and there was no design of prosecution, and he returned in the ordinary way to his original habitation, in Ireland, you would not say, that was not such an escape as would come within the act.

Mr. Macartney.—I certainly would not contend against that. Suppose this case; that a colonel of English militia, who gallantly volunteered for this country, to free us from the rebels in 1798, committed a misdemeanor here, and that under the authority of this act a vindictive rebel, whose nose was pulled, prefers a bill of indictment and issues a warrant, which is backed by an English magistrate; the colonel must be taken to Ireland without bail or mainprize, whereby that boast of the English nation, the Habeas Corpus is defeated. Can it be supposed that the legislature meant to extend this law—which passed without debate, comment, or newspaper observation, by 400 or 500 members, which was not taken notice of in the Lords, nor heard of till it arrived here—to minor offences? If it extends to Ireland, it must equally extend to England and Scotland, and a man may be brought from Cornwall to Donegal and from Caithness to Derry upon a trivial charge. The legislature never could have intended so great a breach of the second Magna Charta.

Where extraordinary laws imposing new and severe punishments are called for, it is not upon light occasions that they are enacted; there was an act passed here upon a melancholy occasion, 15 and 16 Geo. 3rd; among other offences it makes an injury done to the habitation (which before was a mere trespass) a capital felony, and there have been many unfortunate victims of that severe but necessary law. See how the judges have interpreted that statute, by its recital, which is, that several persons have in a riotous and disorderly manner, &c. Men have been indicted for injuring habitations and have been found guilty, but upon their cases being reserved for the judges, they held, that unless it appeared that the country was in that state which the preamble describes, the party was not within the statute; the like benign and humane determination ought to be made in this case. A remarkable case occurred in England, 1 East's P. C. 424. Renwick Williams,* called the monster, was indicted upon the statute 6 Geo. 1st, for cutting a young lady. That statute was made to prevent the practice of cutting muslin and other clothes; it appeared that her clothes were cut so as to bring him within the statute; he was tried before Mr. Justice Buller, and the defence was, that the intent was not to injure her clothes but her person; Mr. Justice Buller thought he came within the case of Coke (who was indicted upon the Coventry act), and being convicted, the case was reserved for the judges; they held the conviction to be bad, which shows how careful they are to keep the law strictly within the intention of the legislature, and not to extend it one iota beyond the mischief intended to be remedied.

In this case the defendant does not come within the meaning of the statute at all, and I rely that if he has committed the offence with which he is charged, public justice may be attained and punishment inflicted without straining the law; because if he be the writer of the libel in question, it appears by the affidavit of Mr. Emerson, which is uncontradicted, that it was published in this country.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Does it follow, that the publishing a libel in England is the same offence as publishing it here?

Mr. Macartney.—I mean to say that the judges will be astute to prevent offenders escaping justice, and that here no such consequence follows from the construction I contend for. The mere writing a libel is no offence, if the writer keeps it to himself; but if he shows it to others, or sends it to the post-office, or sends it to the man intended to be libelled, that amounts to a publication. Now, Emerson's affidavit is not contradicted; and it appears by it, that the libel has been published in Dublin, and I rely upon this as an argument to induce you to a benign interpretation, because it is not necessary that he should be sent out of the county for a bailable offence.

Mr. Justice Daly.—It strikes me, that any person who publishes a libel both in England and Ireland may be punished in both countries. The conviction in England would be no bar here.

Mr. Macartney.—Then he might be punished in every county where the libel circulated.

Mr. Justice Day.—A conviction in the same island might be pleaded, but not between island and island.

* S. C. 1 Leach 529, 4th edition.

Mr. Macartney.—I contend that a man resident in Ireland, and never out of it, cannot be tried in England, or taken upon this act; and here there is no occasion to take him from his own country for a bailable offence, at great inconvenience, to be tried by a jury of strangers, and (what is most material) where no witnesses can be compelled to attend.

The doctrine, that a person who parts with a paper which is considered a libel, is guilty of a publication, is confirmed, by Preston's case, Fost. 196. He was indicted for treason, in embarking at Surrey-stairs, on board a boat, with intention to invite France to invade England. It was objected, that he committed no overt act in Middlesex. But it was held by all the judges, that the embarking at Surrey-stairs in the county of Middlesex, if the jury believed it was with the intention of carrying his traitorous purpose into effect, was an overt act, and that every step was an overt act. So in Hensey's case, 1 Bur. 646, sending letters to the post-office was considered an overt act. So Jackson's * case tried here. Upon the whole, therefore, I hope you will think, that the act of parliament bears the construction I contend for; and that not residing in England, or escaping therefrom, Mr. Justice Johnson is not within the act, and ought to be discharged.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—In this case I am under the disadvantage of not having heard any of the arguments offered at your lordship's house, except as I have been able to learn them from the counsel, who has just sat down. My argument, therefore, will be confined to such observations, as occur to me or are suggested by him.

It is impossible that an act such as this should not come under discussion at some time or other. I am sorry that this case should be the first; but my duty extends no farther than to consider the abstract question, and to show that the case comes within the statute.

The enacting words are as plain as can be. "If any person against whom a warrant shall issue for any crime or offence shall escape, go into, reside or be, it shall be lawful," &c. The statute clearly specifies four cases.

First, The case of a person, who, after a warrant issued, and he being conversant of it, flees, and escapes in the common sense of the word to another place.

Secondly. The legislature then reflected, that a man against whom a warrant issued, might not be conversant of it, nor intending to flee from it, and yet might go into another country, which could not be called an escape, because the intention might not be to flee from justice at the time.

Thirdly. The framers of the act appear, in the next place, to have considered that there are crimes which may be propagated from one country to another, without the person of the offender moving from his residence. They therefore took in the case of a man who never might be in the country where the offence was committed; and therefore, though never resident there, nor escaping from it, but altogether resident in another country and his domicile there confined, yet if such a man were the author of a crime in England, he should not be free from the hand of justice.

But then there was a fourth case. It was seen, that a man might make this objection, "I never escaped from England, nor ever was in England, and therefore I cannot have come from it, nor am I resident in Ireland, I am only occasionally in Ireland, my domicile is in another place;" to avoid any cavil of that kind, they introduced the word be, that if found there, he might be liable to a warrant from England. These are the plain enacting words; the cases are perfectly distinct and marked, and common sense shows that such must have been the intention of the legislature; because common sense must tell us, that where a man is capable of committing a crime in another country, though never there, as sending poison to kill another, or sending traitorous papers to encourage sedition—

Mr. Justice Day.—It strikes me, that argument may be turned against you. Because there the man conveying the poison, would be a perpetrator of the crime; he would be a principal.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—I suppose the case of a man sending, not conveying. The person sending is the criminal, the other may know nothing of the poison.

In opposition to those plain enacting words, I find no objection made, or indeed that occurs, but the preamble, which only mentions the word escape; but the conclusion urged does not apply. The argument supposes that the preamble controls the enacting part. It is an excellent key to the meaning of a statute, and so far is a subject of argument; but it can only be a key, where the meaning is doubtful; if the words are plain and direct, so that no doubt can arise, it is useless to recur to the preamble, which is only called in aid where the enacting part is obscure. This doctrine is recognised by lord Hardwicke, in Basset v. Basset, 3 Atk. 203. The case arose upon the statute 10 & 11 W. 3, c. 16, extending the benefit of remainder to posthumous children; and though a civil case, the principle of construction is the same. The question was, whether a posthumous child was entitled to the intermediate profits; lord Hardwicke said, that it was impossible the preamble should control the enacting part where it was plain. If this word "escape" be taken in so very limited a sense, the consequence is, it must exclude not only the words "reside or be," but "going into." So that if a person against whom a warrant issued could prove that he did not flee though he went into another country, he could not be arrested.

Mr. Justice Day.—If there were nothing more in the case than the preamble, and the enacting part were a mere echo of it, there could be no doubt upon the subject. But any man who said that the preamble should control, or that the enacting part might not go farther than the preamble, egregiously mistakes the law. Yet if it be possible to reconcile them, it is our duty to do so. What say you to this construction, that any person against whom a warrant issues for an offence against law, and who shall escape from England, go into, reside, that is, and reside—meaning that all those shall unite, that the case is of a man committing an offence in England escaping, going into and residing in Ireland,—shall be arrested, &c. Because you see escaping from England would not be enough, if he were not in Ireland, so that they must unite to bring him within the act of parliament; that makes the enacting part commensurate with the preamble, which is pretty explicit and is frequently insisted upon in the statute, “whereby their offences often remain unpunished.” The object is disclosed by the preamble, and is the case of a person committing an offence in one island and migrating to another.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—That construction cannot stand with the words as they are, if any person having committed an offence in England shall escape from, go into, reside, or be, &c. No grammatical construction is consistent with what has been suggested; and what shows that not to be the meaning, is, that this act is founded upon two former acts in England, where the cases were put distinctly. It may be necessary to remind you of the course of the law in England, before and after the union with Scotland; and the object of the present act was, to put Ireland upon the same footing. By the common law, if a man committed an offence in one county, and escaped to another, the warrant was rendered ineffectual; no grand jury could find a bill upon information taken in another county; this was found so great a grievance, that a practice prevailed of backing warrants, but it was against law,* and the 23rd Geo. 2nd, c. 26, provided if any offender should escape, he might be apprehended by a warrant endorsed; that provided for the case of escaping or going into. The framers seemed to have imagined that escape was not confined to moving as in common conversation, nor a local escape, but avoiding justice was considered an escape. But to remove any doubt, the English legislature enacted the 24th Geo. 2nd, c. 55, reciting that whereas offenders may reside or be—taking in the two other cases—i. e. may be in some other county, out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting the warrant, before such warrant issued, and without escaping or going out of the county after the warrant granted—

Mr. Justice Day.—The defect of the former act, as recited, was, that offenders may reside or be in other counties before the warrant granted, and without escaping after it was granted; because were it not for these words, it might be narrowed to the case of residing or being after the warrant granted, and therefore, the moment the offence was committed, without escaping, the offender might have gone into another county, which would not be an escape after the warrant; and therefore the act was passed.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—In your lordship's construction, the offender is supposed to escape, and go into another county, after the warrant is granted, and that the second statute was passed to provide for the case of a man residing or being in another county, though never in that where the offence was committed. What can the words escaping or going into mean? It is suggested that the second statute, intended to operate in cases after warrant granted.

Mr. Justice Day.—The 24th Geo. 2nd, recites in hæc verba the whole section of the 23rd, and then, whereas offenders before such warrant granted may reside or be, would look as if it intended to apply to such cases.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—Then your lordship supposes the statute to apply to cases of warrants issued against persons who afterwards escape. But that cannot be the meaning, because the former act had sufficiently provided for that; and it is plain, that the act of parliament upon which we are at present contending, took the former ones in the same sense, and the legislature wished to apply them both to Ireland. The former acts applied to counties, &c. and recited that offenders may escape from counties, &c. to places out of the jurisdiction of the justice of the county where the offence was committed. And it is now provided against the case of a person committing an offence in a county in Ireland, and who may reside or be out of the jurisdiction where the offence was committed, showing that the legislature was aware of the intention of the two former acts. It was found that the two statutes of Geo. 2nd did not extend to Scotland, and therefore in 1773, another statute was passed, in which the preamble recites as before, but the enacting part applies to all the cases, by inserting the words, go into, reside, or be, seeming to take the preamble of one act only, but by the enacting part to take in all the cases, not omitting the case of an escape from one county to another.

The act upon which we are now arguing was intended to extend, as between England and Ireland, all the former statutes. It is compounded of three acts, and to ascertain the meaning of the last, you will recur to those of which it is composed. Perhaps it would have been better if the framer of the last had taken more special notice of all the former; but it is evident, it was intended to comprehend them all.

* 4 Bl. Comm. 292.

I have already mentioned, that the framer of the first act seemed to have conceived, that every man who could not be caught was to be considered as having escaped, which was therefore thought sufficient in the preamble and enacting part; but if that be so now, one material part, go into, must be expunged, as much as the other words reside or be.

Having argued upon the construction of the statute, and of those from which it originated and of which it is composed, and the mischiefs intended to be remedied, and that the object was, to put the two countries upon the precise footing upon which one county was with another; I proceed to consider how it affects the Habeas Corpus act.

The Irish act, though we had not that blessing till 1782, has not the clause of the English act, which has been stated. But the argument, as it affects the English act, should have its force. The clause was meant to obviate cases distinct from the present. The subject had never cried out against the proceeding as a grievance, that a man should be brought to the country where he had committed an offence. But the complaint was, that a man charged with an offence was sent to a remote prison, and prevented from applying to the high courts for an investigation of his case, as happened to Stroude and Selden, who were charged with uttering seditious speeches in parliament. They applied for an Habeas Corpus and, surprising as it may seem at this day, they were not to be found. They were removed by the king's private authority, and upon application to know what became of them, the Crown answered, that they had behaved so improperly, it was not thought proper to produce them. And therefore, this grievance was so great, that it was provided, that no person should be sent out of the kingdom.*

There was no intention of preventing a person charged with committing an offence from being sent to the country where the offence was committed, for trial; and for that purpose the exceptions were introduced, and upon that the question arose, in William's time, of treason committed in Ireland, &c. and so was Lundy's case.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—It is hard to say upon what doubt Lundy's case was referred to the judges. Probably it was, whether the charge was treason or a misdemeanor. Because, if it had been treason, the statute left it in the power of the crown to transmit him. It must have been upon the nature of the accusation.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—It may be so—it could not have been a charge of a capital crime.

Mr. Justice Day.—The doubt was, whether he was charged with a crime capital by martial law; for if he were charged with an offence capital by common or statute law, there could have been no doubt.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—In Kimberley's case, also reported in Fitzgib. 111, the same construction prevailed.

It is said that the Habeas Corpus act having made a proviso in the case of felony only, the exception cannot be extended to inferior offences. It is an omission in that statute; they did not reflect upon the case of a misdemeanor or a libel taking effect in one country, though the shot was sent from another. But the object of this last act, when Ireland ceased to be a distinct kingdom, was, to extend the provisions of the Habeas Corpus act to cases inferior to felony. The exceptions were extended, and therefore the statute inserts the words "felons or other malefactors," wrong-doers, meaning nothing more than to extend to every case that which before had been extended to felony and treason. If it extends only to wrong-doers, without infringing upon the liberty of the subject, it is not a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act, but an elucidation of the spirit and meaning of it. But if it should be considered a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act, it may be a misfortune to be lamented, but the question is, what is the law? If this be not the meaning of the act, it seems difficult to say, what could be its object; if not extended beyond felony, to what purpose enact it, because the case of felony was provided for? The particular object was, to extend the power of bringing criminals to justice in the country where the crime was committed, though they were residents in another; otherwise it is utterly inoperative. You cannot suppose it was to substitute a backing warrant in the place of an original. The removal of the felon, and the bail of the trespasser was sufficiently provided for, as between county and county. But other cases are remedied by the subsequent statute.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—Mr Macartney contended that this statute could not be extended to cases under felony. You contend, that as to felony it did nothing, but extended to misdemeanors. But it certainly does something as to felony. The ancient practice was, to transmit a felon by the warrant of a secretary of state. Now, this act enables an ordinary prosecutor to transmit him by the warrant of any magistrate, so that it has some effect in the case of felony.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—I must admit it has some effect, and particularly as to backing warrants; but it had not that object alone. A more serious evil existed, as was the case put, of advising an assault in Scotland. One country must not become the receptacle of private malice with respect to another, with impunity. This serious mischief is remedied by the word malefactor; and the design was, to extend the remedy which existed between county and county, to the two islands.

The arguments which remain to be considered seem to arise ab inconvenienti. I do not deny the tendency of such an argument to elucidate the act; but if it be plain, no argument of that kind can be admitted. If so wide an indulgence as is mentioned by Vyner were admitted, it would depend upon every man's private reason, or rather fancy, whether the act was valid, or not. Therefore if any inconvenience exist, it must be remedied by the legislature; if there be danger from prosecutions in Scotland, let people take care how they offend there, let them remember the motto of the Scotch Thistle, noli me tangere.

With regard to another inconvenience which has been much urged, that no bail can be taken, it cannot occur in this case, because no bail is offered, nor application to accept of bail. The warrant desires bail to be taken; but it may be said that can have no effect upon the power of the King's-bench, which cannot take bail. Here the question cannot occur, because the crown has consented that bail should be taken, and therefore that inconvenience cannot arise.

Mr. Justice Daly.—The statute does not give power to a magistrate to bail, and therefore it is argued, that it does not extend to cases bailable by law.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—If that be so, there is no meaning in the word malefactor, evil doer.

Mr. Justice Day.—I consider that as synonymous with offender.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—And so is Blackstone's opinion, because he says "all offenders."

Mr. Justice Day.—Hale uses the expression bailable malefactor.

Mr. Justice Daly.—The word felony includes treason, because every treason is a felony, therefore something more must be meant.

Mr. Justice Day.—And the expression is, "other malefactors."

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—Therefore I argue, that it extends to all crimes whatever. With regard to place, I am free to admit, that it stands between the two countries, as it stood between counties before the statute Geo. 2nd.

Mr. Justice Day.—The statute of 3 Edw. 1st gave justices a power to apprehend malefactors, and to bail them, &c.; it never intended to give the power to bail felons, and therefore the word must extend to inferior crimes.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—The latter statute enables a magistrate to back a warrant, and to take bail between county and county, and if it were not so, he could not take bail, though the offence were bailable, and this power not extending to the present clause, this case must be considered as not bailable. This is an inconvenience to be remedied by a future statute. The want of the recapitulation of the clause tends to show the offence is not bailable here; and so far I admit the argument ab inconvenienti; but that cannot alter the law.

The rest of the argument relates to the statute being prospective and not retrospective. It has a prospect as to issuing the warrant, and taking the person, but says nothing with regard to the offence. It extends to all crimes whether committed before or after the act.

With regard to more minute objections, it seems extraordinary that there should be any cavil at the warrant; they may dispute the execution of the warrant, but it is the ordinary bench warrant which cannot be objected to; and it would be extraordinary, that a warrant under the name and seal of the chief justice should be objected to, when the Court will take notice of it, without farther proof.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—With regard to that, there is stronger ground; it is stated in the return, that it is the warrant of the chief justice of England, and that cannot now be controverted. It was not contended upon the former occasion, that there was any formal objection. The counsel confined themselves to the substance of the objection, and argued it with great ability.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—Not having been present, I am unacquainted with the argument.

No objection was made to the reading of the affidavits. Perhaps in strictness though not contradicting the return, they went to elucidate facts stated in the return; that the facts happened at such a time, and that the party was not out of the kingdom, and that he has no mode of compelling witnesses to attend.

This may be a hardship arising from the law as it stands. But with regard to the question, whether this arrest be valid, or not, they cannot apply farther than as an argument ab inconvenienti, which would tend to overthrow any act, however positive or clearly expressed.

I have submitted these arguments arising from the words of the statute; next upon the whole spirit, collected from the three acts of parliament from which it originated; and, lastly, the mischief to be remedied; and I am happy, as soon as I have discharged this duty, to have it in my power to dismiss a subject which must be extremely painful to every judicial and every legal mind.

Court of King's-bench, Dublin, Monday, January 28th.

Mr. Curran.—The defendant has been brought before the Court, by virtue of a Habeas Corpus which issued for the purpose; and the only question to be submitted to the Court, and the only request I shall make, because it would be unworthy to use any other, is, that my client may be discharged. I am demanding and not supplicating for what I consider a matter of right. I do not apply that he may be bailed, not merely because I do not conceive you could bail him, but I demand that he may be discharged.

After the investigation which this subject has had, I cannot indeed but regret, that it was not my fortune to have witnessed the early part of the discussion. My time to prepare has been necessarily short, but I think he would be a poor lawyer indeed, who could not, upon almost any preparation, sufficiently argue a case of this sort. After the discussion which has taken place, however, it is not necessary minutely to detail the grounds upon which the case has been brought forward. But, perhaps, as there is one of the bench, who has not heard of it before,* it is not beside the matter, shortly to allude to the facts upon which the application is made.

The writ was directed to a justice of peace having Mr. Justice Johnson in his custody. It appears, that my client was taken in his house in the country, and was brought to town; he understood from the persons having him in custody, one of whom styles himself a magistrate and peace officer, that is, a magistrate and catch-pole in one, that he was on his way to England, and that a ship was lying at the water-side to take him to that country. By some little address he got himself driven to the house of my lord chief justice, who, with that sense of justice and that feeling of humanity which adorn the magistrate and the man, interfered in his behalf. He felt that he was authorized in point of law to give him the sacred privilege of hospitality, till the writ could be obtained. It was issued, and a return made upon it, upon which return the argument must depend.

It appears that a warrant was issued by Lord Ellenborough, the chief justice of England for the apprehension of Mr. Justice Johnson, stating, that an indictment had been found against him in that country for a certain scandalous libel upon the persons concerned in the administration of this country, upon lord Hardwicke the lord lieutenant of Ireland, upon lord Redesdale the lord chancellor of Ireland, and upon one of the honourable judges of this court, whose name having been mentioned in the indictment is the reason, I presume, that the defendant has not the good fortune of his assistance. The return states that this warrant had received the additional sanction of certainly a very considerable personage in this country. It was not to any mean person that it was brought to receive the endorsement, but to a person having had great opportunities of acquiring legal knowledge, and who has attained some estimation in the higher departments of the state. He learned law under the late Mr. Baron Hamilton, whose crier he was, and he obtained credit in the state by a nolle prosequi from the crown. Under this warrant so endorsed, Mr. Justice Johnson has been taken into custody in this country; and the question is now, under these circumstances, whether he is entitled to be discharged or not? That question turns upon the construction of the act of parliament, 44 Geo. 3rd, c. 92, intituled "An Act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial, offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from one county to another." This statute is taken from others which were enacted in England, in the reign of Geo. 2nd, and which were intended for the purpose of preventing persons who had committed offences within a particular jurisdiction, because of the locality of all offences, from escaping unpunished, by reason of their changing their residence, or going to another jurisdiction not having any community of jurisdiction with the place in which the offence had been committed. The first of these statutes was made to prevent the difficulties arising from the change of the abode of the offender, after process had issued against him; and the second statute is an amendment of the first, to extend the remedy to the case, where the offender, not waiting for the process, might have thought proper to change his abode into another jurisdiction, for the purpose of avoiding the first. Under the former of these statutes the magistrate residing in the jurisdiction into which the offender fled, was to endorse the warrant; but that statute did not give the magistrate so endorsing the warrant, any authority to bail. The person arrested was sent to the magistrate, within whose jurisdiction the offence had been committed, and who had originally issued the warrant. The second statute was intended to apply a remedy to the case of an offender who had quitted the scene of his offence, before process issued against him; and it gave the magistrate who should endorse the warrant, a power of disposing of the party when taken, according to law, by bailing, if the offence were bailable.

In 1773, a statute was made for the purpose of introducing the same concurrence of the powers of different jurisdictions in the two countries, between England and Scotland, for the purpose of bringing felons and malefactors, who should so escape, back to the jurisdiction from which they escaped, in order that they should be amenable to justice. The intercourse, or concurrence and co-operation of jurisdiction between the different counties in England was settled by the former statutes. The extension of the principle, as between England and Scotland, was regulated by this last. You will find by looking at the statutes, that as between county and county, they extend to all cases where a warrant could be issued. Such is the style of the two acts respecting counties in England. But it is observable (and I shall have farther occasion to remark upon it) that the act of the 13th Geo. 3rd, which regulates the co-operation between England and Scotland, did not adopt the language of the two acts relating to England, by extending it in terms to all cases where a warrant should be granted. And notwithstanding that the legislature, in the 13th Geo. 3rd had before their eyes the two statutes of the preceding reign, the offences to which they extended, and the description by which they designated those offences, yet in the act which regulates the intercourse between England and Scotland, they abandoned that description, and used a description wholly different; because instead of stating generally, "that wherever any warrant shall issue for any offence," which would extend to all possible cases of delinquency, they introduced the terms "felons and malefactors."

Thus the law continued in England, as between its several counties, and thus it continued as between England and Scotland, from 1773, for now thirty-one years; and at last the same kind of solicitude for establishing a system of judicial co-operation between Great Britain and Ireland took place,

Respexit tamen, et longo post tempore venit:

It passed into a law, having respect to the 1st of August, 1804. There are coincidences of circumstances * which scarcely admit of comment—and I have observed with how little advantage such cases are attended, because in general, they do not require any explanation—so that really, there is no situation in which a person may not with a clear conscience show his modesty and withhold his comment—and even where it is necessary, much will not be required to make it understood. However on the 1st of August, 1804, this statute received its legal existence, and from a very early period indeed, like a young Hercules, it began its operations in the cradle.

It is the great perfection of law, that it has no childhood—Born of wisdom, it comes into the world armed for action.

Upon this statute of the 44th Geo. 3rd, and upon it only, turns the question.—I am glad that I have had occasion to state to the Court, only as preliminary and introductory matter, the existence of these statutes relating to England—because our connexion with that country is not so young but that we may all pretend to a knowledge of the literature of it; and I am glad, that though the law between Scotland and England has been somewhat argued upon, it does not enter into the subject, because I know nothing of the Scottish law, or language.—I have learned only the languages which are necessary for an Irish gentleman and an Irish subject. I speak Irish as well as I can, I speak English as well as I may, and notwithstanding whatever aboriginal kindred there may be between the highland language of Scotland and that of Ireland, I very cordially decline to debate a question of jurisdiction in Erse.

However, upon this subject of the 44th Geo. 3rd, I lament that I cannot pass it over in the same superficial way. It is necessary that I should apply myself to an investigation of its meaning, and if possible to the ascertainment of its construction; one characteristic of it I glanced at preliminarily, when I stated the common prima facie extent of the objects of the two English acts, compared with the objects of the act between England and Scotland. You find the same diversity of description in this last act, which comprehends the objects of the three former namely, to regulate the intercourse between county and county, and also between kingdom and kingdom. "Whereas it frequently happens that persons against whom warrants are granted by justices of peace for the several counties escape into other counties," that describes an act done by the criminal judge, and another act done by the accused person, by the latter of which, that of the former may be eluded and impunity achieved; by which it became necessary for the legislature to interpose in order to prevent the wrong that would be done by such an act defeating the warrant of the magistrate. It is impossible for any man who ever learned to read, not to feel the plainness and clearness with which the subject intended to be regulated is here set forth:—That offenders being within the jurisdiction where they are liable to trial and punishment, afterwards go without that jurisdiction whose limits confine the authority of the local judge. That is the defect intended to be remedied; and the remedy for it is, that whenever any person after the first of August, 1804, against whom a warrant shall be issued, shall escape, go into, reside or be in any other jurisdiction, it shall be lawful, &c. There is no occasion to pursue the anxious redundancy of phraseology: The substance comes to this, that where a warrant is issued from the jurisdiction which has cognizance of the crime, and the offender goes into another jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for the justice of the jurisdiction where such person shall escape, go into, reside or be, to endorse his name upon the warrant, which shall be sufficient authority, &c. and if the offence be bailable, bail is to be taken. Here let me, merely as I pass, make one observation showing to demonstration, that the word offender does not necessarily mean a person admissible to bail; the statute clearly uses the word offender, as a person who may be admissible to bail or not; because it says, the magistrate shall proceed with the offender, and admit him to bail or not, as the case may be; which clearly shows that the denomination of offender is not in the acceptation of this statute necessarily confined to persons admissible to bail. It goes on and gives directions as to what the second magistrate is to do; the party is to be remanded to the scene of his crime, and the jurisdiction within which his trial may take place, and it provides, I suppose upon the supposition that his travelling may not be perfectly voluntary, that it shall be at the expence of others. So that to whatever improvement he may derive in point of information by such travel, he has to add the benefit of personal economy, for the expense of the journey is to be defrayed by the public.

Now, as to this part of the subject, some observations naturally occur: here I shall make but few. There is no great hardship, if a common offender of a low class be found who has committed a brutal assault in one county, and staggers over the limits of it into another before a warrant issued against him, there is no great outrage, I say, in bringing him back, when he is sober, and trying him within the jurisdiction, where he is probably known, and in which the witnesses for him, or against him are probably known; at all events he cannot be tried without a possibility of producing his witnesses, if he has a defence; because no matter in what jurisdiction the trial may be had, the process of the law can issue to compel the attendance of the witness.

Another observation which now occurs is, that the policy upon which trial by the vicinage is founded has nothing to do with any of those subjects, upon which the country could have any cause of jealousy with regard to the executive power. It is a mere inferior domestic arrangement, for the suppression of internal misbehaviour, and the advancement of internal administrative justice. As to the state it is out of the question. The liberty of the subject is not infringed; he is tried within the jurisdiction where the fact is charged, and he is defended by the testimony of witnesses whose attendance can be enforced by a compulsory process.

I stated that the defect of justice intended to be remedied was, that persons quitting or going away from the jurisdiction of their offence, and residing or being in another jurisdiction could not be brought to trial. It is observable, that there are four verbs attached to the nominative case, offender. It is one of the meanest exercises of science, when it is obliged to creep its way by verbal criticism; but, when words are not exact, it is necessary to get at their weight, however small the scales by which it shall be ascertained.—There are four verbs, escape, go into, reside, and be.—The word escape is certainly not used in its legal determinate sense;—In law, escape means flight after arrest; it is escape from custody;—it is used in a familiar sense, and, I admit, sufficiently intelligible to a common intent; it is the quitting a place, but not the simply quitting it; there are various modes by which a place may be quitted, with more or less ceremony—with more or less of flight—with more or less celebrity, from a mere motive itinerandi, abeundi, vel evadendi.—All these different characters may be annexed to the genuine act of locomotion; but, to a person having the smallest knowledge of law, it carries with it the essential difference, rapidity of retreat for the purpose of avoiding some personal inconvenience—to avoid apprehension. It has a clear, determinate meaning, if it stood by itself—but, whatever doubt may arise from the expression is removed, when it is premised, that it is the case of a man committing an offence, and knowing there is a bailiff at his heels. There you have the act which begins—the terminus a quo—so that there must be a place from which he escapes, and a place into which he escapes.—It is a change of place, beginning at the point from which he sets out, and which is complete, the moment he passes the bounds of the jurisdiction which he wished to avoid. Therefore, he escapes from the jurisdiction, and goes into another; and having done that, the statute goes on to describe the alternative that must necessarily take place; i. e. having escaped from one jurisdiction, and gone into another, he must either reside there for some length of time; or if he does not, then he is described by being there. And even suppose some of these words are expletive, what is the mischief?—It is only an anxious description of the person who is to be the subject of the endorsed warrant.

This is very clear, that the commencement of the act, and the operation of it, is limited to the time of the escape—it must be an escape after the passing of the act—and the act must also limit the operation of the second verb, go into, in point of time; and it would appear a most extraordinary thing indeed, that, limiting these two first verbs, it should have no effect in limiting the operation of the last substantive verb, be; and that the mere being in a place should be sufficient to satisfy the act. If that word were not auxiliary to the meaning of the legislature, it would, of itself, be completely sufficient; for the former words, escape, and go into, would be out of the case. And here is a point of view, in which I cannot perceive how the intellect of a human creature can get out of the argument. The statute says, that persons may escape, go into, reside, or be, &c. and by those means justice may be evaded, and impunity secured. Therefore, says the legislature, we now enact, that whether there shall be an escape or not, or a going into or not, yet this act shall have effect, and the offenders shall be apprehended! It is impossible for any human creature not to see the folly of that construction. What is the rule of construing acts of parliament, and common instruments between man and man? It is, that every word, which has been used, was intended to convey something, either to add to, or explain what preceded. Will the word “escape,” be rejected altogether? Will the words “go into,” be rejected altogether? Will the word “reside,” be rejected, and all be reduced to one, not signifying any act done, but descriptive of simple existence? The legislature pronounces a remedy, to prevent the wrong doer, by his own act, from avoiding justice, and yet you would recite,

K

"Whereas we now enact, that, whether he does such an act or not, he shall be liable; if he escapes, he shall be followed with hot pursuit; but, whether he escapes or not, he shall be taken——"

Mr. Justice Daly.---The legislature had two objects in view. Your argument is, that a person could not commit an offence, unless he was in the country where the offence is charged to have been committed. It was intended to secure all offenders, whether they were in the country where the offences were committed, or whether they were never in it; and, therefore, the words "go into, reside, or be," are used. Your construction absolutely supposes, that a man could not commit an offence in a country without being personally there; otherwise you give little or no meaning to the word "be."

Mr. Curran.---No, my lord, I do not. The words are, "if a man shall escape, go into, reside or be," and I rely upon it, that the fact of going from one jurisdiction to another is essentially necessary to be coupled with the word being.

Mr. Justice Daly.---That argument actually supposes that an offender must be in the country where his offence was committed.

Mr. Curran.---I shall not accede to that. It does not follow that the legislature did or does contemplate that offences may be committed within a jurisdiction, by persons who were never within it. If the intention were so, see what the language would be, "that a man having committed an offence within a particular jurisdiction, whether he be out of it, or not, may be arrested." Would they encumber that idea, with three other expressions which were not necessarily applicable?

Mr. Justice Daly.---No; but my brother Daly supposes that offences may be committed by persons who were out of the jurisdiction at the time.

Mr. Curran.---I see what his lordship means. The enacting part must be urged farther than the preamble; but no lawyer will deny, that the preamble and the description of the mischief is perhaps the best way to the exposition of the enacting part. What is the grievance recited? The enacting part is calculated to meet it, or something ejusdem generis. The preamble states the escape; the leaving of one jurisdiction and going into another, where the offender could not be regularly apprehended, and it is in aid of the latter jurisdiction that the statute is enacted.

Look again to the rule, that every word should have its due operation;---suppose you apply this statute to the case of a man who never had escaped; in order to make it bear upon him, you must of necessity reject the words "escape, or go into," that is, in order to bring him within one particular description, you are to reject every other. Do you reject them in the construction which I give? No; if he escapes and goes into another jurisdiction, or resides there, or is there after the escape, every one of the rules has its full meaning and effect.

Now, be pleased to consider a little more attentively the part of the statute which relates to the present subject—"and whereas it may frequently happen," &c. (Vide section 3.) It would be strange if the Court were, without farther aid, to say, that this meant a constructive criminality, and not personal agency. The statute talks of a person leaving a place, going into another place, and avoiding justice by a corporeal act of locomotion. It would be a strange pursuit after possible exposition, to apply that to a case where a man never was physically in the place where the crime is charged to have been committed, and where impunity never could be obtained, in consequence of a corporeal leaving of that place and passing into another. But to say, though in the preamble, the act describes that as the grievance by possibility it may have relation to other cases, where a man never was in the jurisdiction, and did not leave it by any act done by him by which justice could be evaded, does not seem reconcileable to any principle, when there was no difficulty in saying, that a person resident without the jurisdiction might commit an offence in another, if such had been the intention of the legislature. In the common case of a civil bill, or prosecution for the burning of land, such an interpretation has never been urged; and shall it be pressed, where the dearest rights of man are involved,—Whether he shall have the common privilege of the accused, and the facility of defence? Will the Court in such a case say, that by possibility the legislature may have intended a case of that kind, and therefore in favour of liberty, of law, and humanity, we will adopt a possible construction, without words to support it? I trust not. I shall push this farther in the part of my argument to which I am coming. The words are, "felons and malefactors may make their escape from the jurisdiction," &c. "Be it enacted," &c. and it is of great moment to consider what the meaning of felons and malefactors is. In the first part of this statute, and in the two first English ones, the words are such as apply to all species of offenders, high and low. But it is of consequence when you come to decide upon those aggravated expressions, felons and malefactors, to say they are to be melted down, and rendered synonymous with the most insignificant offender who is liable to be prosecuted. Have you any clue by which you can be guided? Yes, this word malefactor, of itself, carries its legal, defined meaning. Now, are you therefore to reject it? No. What, then, are you to do? To elicit, from whatever circumstance you can, the meaning which the legislature affixed to the term. The first question is, do you think they meant to make this clause co-extensive with the first? You cannot think so, because they had the same expressions before them, and if they had intended to convey the same meaning, they would studiously have introduced the same words, as descriptive of the same degree of criminality. Why perplex their own act by adopting other words? It is said the words are synonymous. I do not believe there is, in our language, a perfect synonyme. In one part of this act, words are used, descriptive of all possible cases; in another part they introduce a totally different set of words. If they meant the two descriptions to have precisely the same sense, they have taken a great deal of trouble to impose difficulties upon those whose duty it is to explain these acts; because, the natural idea of any judge, finding two different expressions in a statute, would be, to suppose there was a difference of sense. Have you no other clue? I think you have two: one, from general reason and principle; and the other, from legal authority. From reason and principle, because it is a totally different case, whether you follow a pickpocket from one county to another, or from one nation to another. What is the principle upon which the comitas gentium acts? A clear one. Where the offence is of such a flagitious kind, as almost to be a stain upon humanity if it should not be punished, the comitas gentium, in the common abhorrence of the crime, will say, such a criminal shall not have a sanctuary among us. Is it the same with a petty misdemeanor? If a murderer flies to Spain, they will give him up, and say, the country shall not be stained with him; but, if a pickpocket went among them, is that a case in which the power of a nation should be exerted, to send him to the country where he committed a twopenny larceny? The principle is clear and distinct, of national expedience and mutual co-operation.

I said there was legal authority. I speak of the Habeas Corpus law, made for the purpose of abolishing an abuse, which had taken place, of sending the subjects of the realm out of it, beyond sea, upon pitiful allegations, and upon trifling delinquencies. The rights of Englishmen are now ascertained, and a charge of petty delinquency shall not overbear the power that stands between oppression and the accused; and it is enacted, that upon such grounds it shall not be lawful to transport a subject beyond the place of his residence. By that statute, a subject cannot be sent out of the kingdom for trial, except upon a charge of a capital offence. And here give me leave to see how the argument would turn, if the Court should, for a moment, take up the idea, that the merely being without the jurisdiction is sufficient ground for the act of parliament to work upon. If it were so, suppose an Englishman comes here, commits an assault, goes back to his own country, and a warrant issues against him; is he to be sent back to this country? Why; because it is alleged to be a defect of justice if he should not. What is that defect? It is precisely commensurate to the protection given by the Habeas Corpus act. The charge is, that he has committed a misdemeanor—he is an Englishman—the Habeas Corpus act says he shall not be sent out of the country. The impossibility of sending him out of the country is stated to be the grievance; and yet it is the Habeas Corpus act which has created that grievance, because it is that statute which renders it impossible so to send away a subject. There is a defect of trial—it is sought to be remedied—I care not whether the party escaped or not—the legislature says, he shall not be dragged out of the country, except for a capital crime. But in misdemeanors there is a difficulty in the way. What is it? That great personal security, for which so much English blood has been shed, the Great Charter.

Lord Coke has enumerated no fewer than thirty-four re-assertions of that law, rendered necessary by thirty-four thousand encroachments upon it. The prerogative of the crown, sought to be kept within due limits, burst forth with more violence from being restrained, overwhelming the land with arbitrary power. That is the grievance; and are you now to repeal that law, without the legislature condescending to say, they meant it? A turnpike bill would not be amended without declaring the intention to do so: And, when the legislature is silent will you outrage the constitution, by transporting a subject out of the country? What a foul transaction was it considered, when the duke D'Enghein was taken from a hospitable country, tried in a distant place, and murdered by torch-light? What was this, but removing a little difficulty which stood in the way of trial for the crime of læsæ majestatis, for a constructive want of allegiance to an usurper? If a man can be tried in one place, for an offence committed in another, what becomes of acknowledged principles? “Annihilate but time and space;” that is getting over a difficulty, and every spot may be considered as a place of competent jurisdiction. Do not commit such an outrage upon the Habeas Corpus act. There are many ways in which a law may expire without such violence; it may die of a consumption, of an apoplectic fit, or, stript of its garments, it may die of cold. But it is not upon visionary constructions, that the great privileges of the people are to be overborn, and that the so often repeated assertion of right restraining the deviations of wandering prerogative is to be evaded. Is it because the intention was possible, that therefore you will adopt it? By what kind of laws would the English nation think we deserved to be governed, if they were told we adopted this wild repudiation of what little may remain to us?

But I am arguing absurdly! Am I? Is it clear the act did mean it? I ask that question. Never shall the rights of human nature be done away, except by a construction invincibly forced upon you. I do not mean to utter any thing unconstitutional or illegal. I remember my client has the rights of the accused, and the prosecutor the privileges of an accuser. I speak with respect because of the Court, and I speak with moderation because of the Court, and I restrain the indignation with which I am bursting, if resistance does not give it energy. When the heart is bursting with grief, it is silent—the paltry and trifling concerns of life become the subject of voluble complaint.

I have talked of exposition—I have urged the topics as if they related to distant nations. I have laboured through the course of verbal criticism. I am pleading the cause of the rich and the poor. Thank God! I know the honest integrity of your lordships' minds and the pride of your hearts; I am contending for my client, I am struggling for the rights of existence, asserting the privileges of the constitution, which are not to be measured by pitiful verbal criticism or the sophistry of a clerk, or the testimoniality of a special pleader. You might as well measure the arch of the heavens upon the periphery of a lady's ring.

I come now to another topic. I alluded before to the word malefactor, as not meaning any thing perfectly definite. I do not find the word used later than the time of Edward, in the statute de malefactoribus in parvis which took away bail from such offenders. But the word has no definite sense in the discrimination of the class or enormity. That cannot be denied me—Very well. Then the particular language of the act, cannot assist you in drawing the line of exact boundary. What then is to be done? Are you to reject the auxiliary word? Certainly not. But as well as you can, from whatever circumstances can assist you, a determination is to be formed, as to the meaning of the legislature in the use of the word. Here I am warranted in saying, that the legislature did not mean to extend the description to every offence, because in that case they would not have used new words. The exception in the Habeas Corpus Act pointed out in what instances general policy required that subjects should be sent out of the country, namely, capital offences; and that act having excepted them, and the present act using the words felons and malefactors, I may be warranted in saying, it was the meaning of the legislature to apply those words to the case of capital offenders. This observation derives some strength from the expression in the present statute “no sufficient provision.” It could not be said there was no provision in capital cases, because there was some. It could not be said to be sufficient, because it was not. In the case of misdemeanors there was no provision whatever. It is called in this act an insufficient provision, which it really was: the prerogative might be applied for, as was done in Lundy's case, but even that was upon a reference to the attorney-general; and upon an idea that the exertion of the prerogative was warranted by the exception in the Habeas Corpus act, and he was transmitted by a king's messenger. That was a provision—no man could say it was not; but it was not a sufficient provision, because it was not a right ex debito justitiæ, it could only be obtained by interceding with some minister of state, and laying the foundation for it might be extremely difficult. But it was afterwards made a matter of right instead of a matter of favour, and a warrant issued by a magistrate of one county and endorsed by another, was considered authority sufficient to seize the offender. This then furnishes a natural and corresponding construction to doubtful words.

But is there nothing else in favour of it?—There is. Where the construction of a statute is not clear, what is the rule? As lord Coke says, the words of a statute are to be taken in lawful and rightful sense, and a construction must be made, in suppression of the mischief, and advancement of the remedy; but still it is to work no wrong to an innocent party. Co. Lit. 24, 381. It has been said, that the best way of expounding a statute is to consider what answer the law-giver would make to a question propounded to him; and upon this ground permit me to state the facts.

Upon the return it appears that this is a state prosecution; because it is for a supposed libel upon the lord lieutenant, the lord chancellor, one of the judges, and is of and concerning the public administrative conduct of two of those personages. It is clear, that it is upon a subject solely and exclusively relating to this country; that from the time when the subject matter and the transactions which gave occasion to these letters occurred, the person accused was never out of this country. I lay down these facts in putting this question to you; how the law-giver would answer, if you were to ask him, what was the mischief he intended to remedy, and how it was probable he intended to remedy it? Could it be intended to extinguish the man accused? Let me not be misunderstood upon this part of the case; my client does not wish to avoid investigation of the crime of which he stands accused, where he can have the advantages which a man accused ought to have. What are they? One is that by being tried in his own country he may possess that composure which gives collection to the mind under accusation, and another is, that a sympathy for the accused should prevail, which cannot be where he apprehends the ante-dooming sentence of a court of strangers. Instead of giving him the benefit of a trial you send him gagged to a foreign bar. He can have no witnesses upon a subject relating to Ireland, he has no process to compel their attendance, and therefore you send him for trial to a land of strangers, where if he has a defence to make, he is unable to urge it.

Has a man accused by the state no defence to make, except such as may arise by the testimony of witnesses. He has a great defence, of which you strip him, by sending him to a foreign tribunal—the feeling of the country upon the subject of the charge. I am not insinuating, that a libeller should not be punished. I am not saying, whether the defendant is criminal or not. The publications may be true or they may be false; but there is not a man in the nation who does not know whether they are true or false. They contain a charge upon the executive government, and shall a man be immolated upon the truth of his own accusation? The accused turns upon the accuser, and may ensure his own triumph. I have had deep and dreadful experience of the perfidy of man, of meanness and of tergiversation; but if a man were prosecuted for a charge upon the government of the country, I would look to the jury for the result; one glance of the eye secures an acquittal. If he could be brought to trial for speaking in their behalf, let them find him guilty, and let him be driven from a country where he deserved not to live, or make a gibbet high enough for him to be seen—his heart and his character might be thankful. But, no, my lords, the accused would have nothing to dread. Should he be apprehensive of the testimonial law, that the truth should not be a justification, no jury could be selected that would submit to such a doctrine, my country would fix her eyes upon a jury who hesitated in such a case, and acquit the victim.

If you put such a question to the legislature as this; is it your intention, that where a person is accused of libelling the state, he shall be brought to a land of strangers, gagged at his trial? Can that be your meaning? The English nation answers and says it was; what need the crown desire more, or what are the remaining claims of prerogative? In case of felony, no counsel was formerly admitted for the prisoner, no speech to evidence is even now admitted, no copy of the indictment is allowed. Anciently the humane absurdity of the law went so far as to say, he should not examine witnesses, upon this principle, that it is presumed the innocence of the party was clear as light, unless the guilt was made as black as night, such is the consideration of the law as between the subject and the state and it reposes no confidence in the humanity of the latter.

When speaking upon this topic, I speak with profound reverence and veneration of whatever august personage carries the sceptre in his hand. But I speak the language of the constitution and never have I, nor by the grace of God, shall I, sully that character; without vanity I bequeath it to my survivors, and may speak upon this point with unaffected and sincere humility.

The law of treason is anxiously jealous between the subject and the state, I mean those by whom the state is governed, and who are responsible for their acts, and there is no more obvious mode of escaping from punishment, than by a state delinquent washing his hands in the blood of the man who accuses him. But is that all the difficulty you impose by adopting the arguments which have been urged? I have opened but a small portion of them; you are to look to the effect with the composed powers of self command, which creates a formidable exception to the indignation with which every man must hear the case. It is this, a common catch-pole is to take an Irish subject from his native land, and put him into whatever kind of vessel he pleases, to land him wherever chance drives him; no matter whether the prisoner is old or young, sick or well, onward they are to work. The bailiff may enter him as a package in a waggon, or stop him upon the outside of a mail-coach. What is the safety of that man's life? What is the trust you repose? I tell you, an incensed prosecutor is armed with power, he lays hold of his victim; it is convenient to try him where every body knows the fact, but it is necessary that an example should be made; he gets to the other side, he moves forward to London—

Mr. Justice Daly.—The prisoner may be bailed at Holyhead.

Mr. Curran.—With this small circumstance, if he can get bail; says Archimedes, "I'll move the world!" Can you? "most undoubtedly, upon one condition, if you give me a place for my foot to stand upon." The prisoner may be bailed in Wales! I dare say he may, I should be glad to know in what kind of ale-house the Welsh Taffy would enter into bail; is it in that strange country a prisoner from Ireland can expect to find bail? In the present case he was kidnapped to the house of the chief justice.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—If that be at all material, there is this slight circumstance, he was apprised the day before, that the magistrate would wait upon him.

Mr. Curran.—But suppose him arrived in London; what defence can he make there? yes, I think there is one; there is an inborn enthusiasm for liberty, an innate love of freedom, a hatred of oppression and tyranny that would redeem the victim and secure him from the attack of the oppressor. But give such a power to a prosecutor, as the construction put upon this statute would give, and there is not a man in England, from the archbishop of Canterbury to the lowest mechanic, who may not be brought here under colour of this statute, and vice versa, and tried upon trivial accusations without the possibility of giving bail. The minister going to the House of Commons may be arrested upon the information of an Irish chairman, and a warrant granted by a trading justice. Mr. Pitt is brought over here in vinculis; what to do? to see whether he should be bailed or not. I remember Mr. Fox was here during the life time of this country: in the same way he might be brought over. It may facilitate the intercourse between the islands, any man may travel at the public expense; suppose I gave an Irishman in London, a small assault in trust. When the vacation arrives, he knocks at the door of a trading justice, tells him he wants a warrant against the counsellor. "What counsellor?" Oh sure every body knows the counsellor; "well friend and what is your name?" Thady O'Flanagan, please your honour. "What countryman are you?" An Englishman, by construction; "very well, I'll draw upon my correspondent in Ireland for the body of the counsellor."

What! my lords, is there no apprehension of an outrage of that kind? There is nothing against it, but the great expense. The two warrants cannot be obtained for less than five shillings of our money. But the expense of the journey must be defrayed by the public; and can it be supposed that the legislature intended, that the public money should be thus drawn upon at the good will of every petty prosecutor, either to gratify his malice, or supply his necessities?

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—Give me leave to ask, whether this mischief might not arise in the case of an unfounded charge of felony?

Mr. Curran.—No, my lord, accusers are not so easily found in such cases. The atrocity of the charge deters the party from making it. I have witnessed many trials, and I seldom knew a false charge of a capital crime; but there are a thousand instances of false charges of petty misdemeanors.

I shall add to that head of observation, that this is a state prosecution. Yet it must be proceeded upon as every common case between subject and subject. But if any thing can impress this particular case more upon the Court than any other, it is the circumstance that it is a prosecution by the state for a libel; see then what a power is put into the hands of a minister, or the rival of a minister. An experiment must first be made in the province, remote from the seat of government where it may be supposed to pay sub silentio. They would not venture to try it in London, to give up an inhabitant of England to an Irish catchpole, and send him upon a voyage to Ireland to know whether he should be bailed or not. It would appal the English nation to have such an artillery opened upon them. It would be to stand before a loaded cannon, while a child with a lighted torch was sitting at the touch hole. If my client must undertake this voyage, let the messenger perform the obsequies by night, and take him to the water edge in the dark, that his countrymen may not see his last look upon his native shore, which he is never to see again. Let not his wife or children witness his departure. He is to be taken to a place, where his innocence cannot appear, for there is no process to produce the witness who can attest it.

My lords, this is an odious experiment. It is of late that this perplexed doctrine of constructions has been revived, it flourished before science had attained its full maturity, and when there was nothing but commentators and scholiasts, and constructors. Are acknowledged principles to be explained away by some god-father, producing his adopted manuscript,—"nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ." A manuscript is produced, it came into the hands of a grandfather's executor, by which it appears, that lex terræ is for the common people, but iudicium parium means something more, it means the judgment of the upper House; the judgment of the peers. This exposes the freedom of the subject, and his dearest rights to the uncertainties of caprice and the vagaries of speculation. It is admitted there are real hardships imposed by this statute, but it is suggested it may be amended; perhaps it may, perhaps it may not; but under the construction contended for by the prosecutor, they are desperate and formidable. If you see one construction which is destructive of former rights, and another which is sanative of those rights, I hope you will adopt the latter. I hope that you will not think this a doubtful case; that it will be understood abroad, that it is not; that the prosecutor will be pleased with his failure; that he will feel a gratifying consciousness at going out of court mercifully triumphant. If there be any latent motive against the accused, it will be defeated by persisting in the present measure; they will exhibit him as a persecuted man, rousing and arming every principle of the human heart to pity and protect him. If they have any object, they will lose it by an odious and abominable prosecution. But grieved should I be to look to the compunction of humanity, or await the satiated vengeance of the prosecutor, instead of the honourable and upright justice of the Court, which is to pass sentence, one way or the other.

Therefore I leave my client with you; he has fled to the temple of justice, he has fallen upon its steps, I trust in Divine Providence, that he will find there a sanctuary, and that your lordships will order him to be discharged from the custody in which he is now detained.

Mr. W. Johnson.—If ever a grievous task fell upon any man, it is the present; but upon this, as upon every occasion, I shall disregard personal considerations when a duty devolves upon me; in the discussion, however, I shall exclude every thing of a personal nature, and confine myself to the legal argument. The question is, whether you will discharge the person suing out the Habeas Corpus, upon the ground that he has been illegally arrested; and that depends upon the construction of a recent act of parliament, not hitherto acted upon. The return states the warrant of the chief justice of England, grounded upon an indictment against the defendant for a misdemeanor, and that warrant endorsed by an Irish justice of peace: the ultimate question, therefore will be (for with the English warrant, save so far as it is an authority for the magistrate here to endorse it, I have nothing to do), whether the endorsement is a legal ground or warrant to arrest a person here.—You must either not intermeddle at all in this case, or you must discharge the person before you. You have not that middle course which the humanity of the law in all other cases interposes, you cannot admit to bail—

Mr. Justice Day.—That has not been argued yet.

Mr. Johnson.—I mean to argue it.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—Mr. Johnson I suppose means to argue from that, as showing the construction of the statute.

Mr. Johnson.—I mean to argue it as matter of construction, and to show, from that, what construction ought to be adopted; and therefore for the present, I shall say a word or two upon the power of any person in this country to bail in cases of this nature. In this part of the argument you will discharge from your contemplation, the particular quality of the offence, and the particular quality of the offender. You will allow me to argue it as a misdemeanor committed by any man in the community; committed in Scotland, of the law of which you are ignorant; or in England, of the law of which you may know something. Suppose it the case of a simple warrant issued in Scotland; for in all cases under this act, let it be borne in mind by the Court, that the warrant issues from an authority, and for an offence committed in a country utterly distinct, in point of legal contemplation, from the country in which the arrest is made;—it is strongly so in England, though the Court here may have some knowledge of their law; but it is literally so in Scotland, as you are not supposed to have any knowledge of their law there. This is a perfect truism in law, that the legality of the warrant must be judged of by the law of the country where it issued; as in the case supposed under the law of Scotland, surely to know whether a warrant be or be not conformable to the law of any particular country, you must have judicial knowledge of the law of the country where it has issued. But you must not only have judicial knowledge of the law creating the offence, and that it is an offence against that law, but you must be able to determine whether the offence is bailable by that law; for take this with you, that the man before you is not before you as an offender against the law of his own country, he is before you as an offender to be sure, but against the laws of another country, and as such is in custody; does it not follow as a necessary inference, that before you determine whether he is in custody for an offence from which you can discharge him, you must determine upon that law? The power to take bail, and to determine upon the offence, must perpetually meet together.

Mr. Justice Day.—Do you mean the power to try?

Mr. Johnson.—No, the authority to bail, and so far to determine upon the offence, as to its nature and extent—the application to take bail, and the determining upon the offence must meet together. Does not the authority to bail flow out of the offence? does not lord chief justice Pratt say so expressly, when he says, that in a warrant nothing more is necessary than to state what the offence is?

Mr. Justice Daly.—I do not think it necessary to labour this, because I do not doubt the power of the Court to bail, where it is not deprived by act of parliament.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—I understood Mr. Johnson to urge this as a topic of construction, for we are not called upon in this case to determine upon the question of bail.

Mr. Johnson.—Nothing more; I am to argue that the Court will not assist the extension of a law, that takes away the common right of the subject, militating against every legal notion. What relation is there between the authority of the magistrate executing this warrant, and the recognizance to be taken for bail? Where is it to be returned? By whom can it be enforced? Where is it to be estreated? If bail be taken here, the recognisors reside in Ireland; to which exchequer does it belong if it be estreated? I shall say no more upon this subject, to show the mischief that arises from taking away the right of bail. If the statute be confined to unbailable cases, no mischief falls upon the subject greater than that which would fall upon him in England if he were arrested for a non-bailable offence there; because he must be brought before a party empowered to commit him. That is one argument against construing this act (if you can avoid it) to reach misdemeanor; if you extend it to one you must extend it to all, and then you say, that the British legislature meant to put this mighty machine into motion, to level in the dust the ancient bulwarks of liberty and the Habeas Corpus law. Shall a man indiscreetly or unadvisedly offending against the law of another country, and having come upon his affairs to the country of his birth, be dragged back, after a lapse of years to the former place without bail? I am sure this Court will have nothing to do with any supposed integrity in the persons now making use of this law, or causing it to be made; they will not from any loose expression in the act, determine that a particular unforeseen case may be brought within it; they will only exercise their judicial understanding in determining what the legislature meant, which was to remedy the difficulties attending the arrest and transmission of prisoners from one country to another; those difficulties had been long felt, often complained of, and were well deserving to be remedied, therefore the stating what the law was in that point, fully satisfies the expressions of the act; there was no sufficient manner of transmitting prisoners as the law stood. By the statute of Westminster a committal per mandatum regis is expressly said to be irreplevisable, and by an equity of construction in process of time, in order that the king might not be called upon to act personally in such cases, it was allowed to the privy council; and, such is the progress of things, it was afterwards exercised by the secretary of state, though neither a conservator nor a justice of the peace. Perhaps there never was a time when such authority would have borne a strict legal examination, and yet upon that authority will depend, the legal power of transmitting persons from one kingdom to another at this day.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—After the Habeas Corpus Act, it was legal.

Mr. Johnson.—It could not be questioned after that act in the case of felony; but it was a solitary authority, and could only be called into action ex mero motu, or ex voluntate. It was a reservoir, which the persons who had the custody of it might open or not as they thought fit, and its locality was confined to a single part of the empire. No ordinary magistrate could, upon any principle of acknowledged law, act upon such a case, and as applicable to cases of escape it was perfectly inoperative. In the case of colonel Lundy who was brought from Scotland, what was the answer of the attorney-general? That he should be transmitted by the warrant from the secretary of state, and in the custody of a king's messenger; and the statute provides that it should be in a mode heretofore done, and I contend that nothing was ever done heretofore, in sending a subject out of the kingdom, but by the king's authority; and well might it be said in the language of the act, that it was insufficient. If the framers of this act thought, that for the purpose of transmitting felons the mode was sufficient, and intended to extend it to misdemeanors, they would have said, that the law was insufficient for the transmittal of offenders lower than capital felony; but that they supposed a law existed upon the subject is manifest from their expression, and it may be inferred that they thought it insufficient for the reasons which I have already stated. I pledge myself in this solemn moment to satisfy every syllable in the act, and to show that upon the construction sought by the other side, you must drive out of the act the most important words in it, because it is the same thing, if they are rendered utterly useless, that is perfectly synonymous; and before I get into the argument let me solicit the Court, having considered this case in every point of view that the human mind is capable of, that if any thing not strictly relevant fall from me, they will discard it from their consideration.

To begin then with the title of the act, it is to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the united kingdom to the other; and the mischief recited in the clause upon which the question turns, is the escape, not from prosecution or punishment,—and that I may not be supposed to confound things, I am not now upon the word escape, but I think that the part upon which I must succeed; at the same time, I must not trust my own understanding too much, or give up any part of the argument;—the mischief recited, is the escape of felons and malefactors from one kingdom to another; the recital in the third section states that felons and other malefactors in Ireland may make their escape into Great Britain. I must admit with the argument used on the part of the crown, that other malefactors must mean other than felons, but if it does, it must, according to every rule of construction I have met with, mean crimes of the same genus; and the Court will here recollect, that the law now before them, is taken from a law applicable to Scotland, where felony is no term known to the law as descriptive of crime. If that alone had been used, the act would not extend to Scotland; and, therefore, it was necessary to use a word, which, in its ordinary acceptation, would take in offences similar in one country to those which were provided for by a descriptive word in the other.

But even in England many of the majora crimina are not felony; Blackstone mentions several, even capital cases, that were not felony; heresy for a while was capital though no felony; apostacy, though not capital, was a most enormous offence; so those which were subject to præmunire were high offences in the law, and persons guilty of præmunire are not bailable, perhaps not by the transcendant power of the court of King's-bench, certainly not by the ordinary magistrate, and that is descriptive of great malefactors who are no felons; the word felons therefore, would not take in all malefactors even of the majora crimina. Is not that sufficient to satisfy the words, "other malefactors" where my argument is, to confine it to cases not bailable? If the word malefactor embraces all offenders; if it merely meant maleficium, there is no occasion for the word felons at all. Now is this meaning, which I attribute to the legislature in this word, to be collected from their conduct when they used it? I say it is; the act of 1773 refers to the acts of the 23rd and 24th of George II. expressly; the framers of the one, must have had the others before them; now the argument is, that the legislature in the act of 1773, by using the words "felons and other malefactors," meant precisely what was meant by the legislature in 23 and 24 George II. If so, would it not have been easy, meaning the same thing, to have adopted the same language, so that he that runs might read? What is the language of the act? "Any person against whom a warrant shall issue." The title of the act of the 23rd of George the second is for apprehending persons, in any county or place, against whom warrants shall be granted by the justices of the peace; that title is preserved in the 24th of George the second, for amending and rendering more effectual a clause in the act I have stated. The use I make of that is this, that if the legislature had not meant something different from the offence included within the acts of the 23rd and 24th of George the second, they would have used a language, ready to their hand, sanctioned by usage, and so plain that no man could mistake it. With these acts before them, they dropped the title altogether in the 13th of George the third, and the mischief recited is the escape of felons and other malefactors.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—If it does not interrupt this part of your argument, I should wish to know a matter that has been resting upon my mind, whether the preamble of the clause in question is not misconstrued, and misapplied, as a scale to ascertain the enacting clause? It is said that the mischief recited, is the escape of persons; Mr. Curran rested upon that all through his argument; it strikes me, that the mischief is the avoidance of trial. Escape is one mode by which that is effected; and, having recited the mischief and one mode by which it arises, the act proceeds to reach that mischief by meeting that mode and others also; that is the way in which it strikes me.

Mr. Johnson.—In the course of the argument I should be sorry to be without the assistance which that part of the act gives me, because I shall show that the construction contended for by the crown, is a construction calculated to avoid trial; I shall come to that upon the head of escape. I was urging that the legislature meant majora crimina when they used the word malefactor, and that is no extraordinary position, as appears from the most classic use of the word, by the most correct writers. Mr. South says, "it is a sad thing when men shall repair to the minister, not for prayer but refuge, as malefactors flying, &c." So lord Roscommon uses it in the same sense; so Shakespeare says, "bring forth some monstrous malefactor," and speaking of Macbeth's crime, calls it a "malefaction."

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—With regard to this part of the subject, we have a commentary much stronger than you have mentioned, and that is the act itself; the third section recites, "that felons and other malefactors in Ireland may make their escape into Great Britain, and that felons and other malefactors in Great Britain, may make their escape into Ireland, whereby their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision now in force for apprehending such offenders, and transmitting them, &c. for remedy whereof, be it enacted that if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued for any crime or offence against the laws in force in Ireland, &c." And the fourth section enacts for remedy of the like inconvenience by the escape into Ireland of persons guilty of crimes in England or Scotland, "that if any person against whom a warrant shall issue for any crime or offence against the laws of England or Scotland respectively, &c." The inconvenience mentioned in the third section was "felons and other malefactors escaping, &c." and the fourth section describes the inconvenience to be, "persons guilty of crimes, &c." that is, any crime or offence against law; are not these words strong comments upon the words felons or malefactors?

Mr. Johnson.—No doubt they are, and your lordships will adopt the construction furnished by them, if it be not subversive of common right. But if I show a construction that will satisfy the words, without invading common right, you will adopt that.

It will not be forgotten that the use I make of this argument, is as a rule of construction. You will avoid that which includesailable offences, if it puts the machine of the state in motion against every petty brawler in the land who departs from one part of the empire to the other. And it would be wrong upon the state itself, that for every petty offence, for every angry letter or speech, written or uttered in one country, by a person afterwards going to another, the expence of transmitting him should be imposed upon the public; for if this be law, it is a common right, and resorable to by every man in the community, therefore you will get out of this difficulty if you can. What compensation would it be to the state to confine a man for a week in London, after the expence of 100*l.* for sending him there? Is that dignus vindice nodus?—And here you must put out of your mind the quality of the offence, and that of the man before you, because the law applies to all, and I argue no farther than that you will confine this act to cases which are notailable; because there you invade no public right, nor open a door to great mischief. Suppose a man charged with some insignificant offence, and brought away from this country for trial in England, is fined a mark or acquitted; is he to be brought back at the public expence?—And is the power of the state, which should only be exerted in the case of treasons against the state, to be enforced against every petty offender? That would be breaking a butterfly upon a wheel! I have, therefore, shown that the Court ought to be astute to limit the construction of this act, if they can, within the boundaries I have submitted.

Upon this part I mean principally to rely, that to bring a party within this law, he must have escaped. To make myself better understood, I mean this, that the act, supposing it to apply to misdemeanors, means those committed by actual presence, and not by constructive relation. You will not determine the construction of any act of parliament from an opinion of what it should contain, if you shall be of opinion that it does not contain it. If I show that this is a casus omissus, it would be enough; but I shall also show, that if the case were within it, it would be fraught with monstrous oppression. You will not legislate, particularly for the purpose of having a common share in the destruction of law and liberty, nor adopt a construction which will level in the dust the ancient bulwarks of freedom; and if I show that the whole view of the act—the title, recital, mischief or remedy—applies to crimes committed by actual presence, and that they alone were in the contemplation of the legislature, you will confine the statute within those limits.

Let us begin with the title: the very marginal note, if it be of any authority, but it at least shows the sense of the man who made it, is, offenders escaping into Ireland.

Mr. Justice Day.—The marginal note, by Mr. Grierson, cannot be of authority; but those in Ruffhead's collection may be considered of some weight.

Mr. Johnson.—There, it is persons escaping into Scotland. But is it confined to that? No; because the mischief recited is the avoiding trial by escaping. When upon this part of the case, see whether the legislature, in the act between county and county, had not in view the actual presence and subsequent escape of the offender. The inefficacy of the first act, as stated in the second, is this; the first statute mentioned an escape after warrant issued; that was found to confine the act to too narrow limits: then it is recited in the second, that offenders may reside and be in some other county before warrant granted, and without escaping after warrant granted, therefore, even as between county and county the legislature meant the fact of an escape; that is the common sense of the act. And, if it were necessary, I will show that as between county and county in England, a man could not be arrested for a constructive misdemeanor, a man may commit a misdemeanor far from the place where it was committed, and not escaping from it, but residing and being in another, he will be a principal offender in his own county, and may be arrested there, but is not within the provisions of this act.

I now gladly resort to an expression which fell from your lordship, because I think it will decide this case. You have said, in allusion to a quaint expression used in the course of this argument, that you would be sorry to break the entire shell to get at the kernel; and that it is a bad way, to get at the sense of an act of parliament by rejecting the words of it. It is a bad way, I confess, and I will show that it is they who contend for an opposite construction, who get rid of the words of the statute. By their construction, what becomes of the operative words, "escape and go into?" I will venture to put the whole case upon this fact, strike out these words—and I have done it with my pen—from the title the recital of mischief and the remedy, and you show the act to be what is contended for by the crown. Nothing is more persuasive than a thing that meets the eye. Read the act without the words, and it is what they contend for. What will be the title? "For apprehending any person residing or being in any county," &c. Suppose the mischief recited, it would correspond with that title. What is the remedy? Read it thus—"And be it enacted, that if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued by any judge, &c. with-

"in Ireland, shall reside or be, in any place
"in England or Scotland, respectively, it "shall be lawful," &c. and vice versa. Is it too much to say, that the argument which renders the title, recital of mischief, and enacting part useless, is absurd? If a person be alive, it requires no great sagacity to describe him as being; and his existence is enough to subject him to this law.

Mr. Justice Day.—Would it follow that the substitution of these words would render the others inoperative? The escape of notorious offenders from one county to another is recited as the mischief intended to be remedied; but it does not follow, that the legislature had no other mischief in contemplation.

Mr. W. Johnson.—It is perfectly true.—But I do not substitute any word; I endeavour to give operation to each. But the opposite construction renders some of them useless.

Mr. Justice Day.—It strikes me that all these words are operative. "Escape, go into, reside or be," and that each, reddendo singula singulis, has its effect; "escape and go into," is the mischief, or two of the modes by which trial was evaded; and they might reside or be in some other county, before process issued.

Mr. W. Johnson.—Well, to make my construction still more plain, I will suffer the entire four words to remain; and by separating them, I will make every word operative. The words "escape and go into," shall describe the person upon whom the warrant operates, and "reside, and be," the place where it shall be executed. To punish escape in the first instance, and to remedy a defect in the second, was really the object of the act. Now, I will ask this question, and I put the whole case upon its issue. Does a man, who never removes from his residence, who is always to be found in the scene of every act of his life, either manifest a disposition to escape, or could he escape the law? What is the language of any informed man upon such a subject? I have citations from several enlightened writers:

"Hast thou escap'd my sword?"

"No, here I dwell, I neither fled nor fear'd you."

Why does the law set its face against escape?—Because the offence is accompanied by flight, and is in itself a quasi felony : it is a concomitant of guilt, and shows a disposition to escape punishment. At common law, flight, whether the party was acquitted or not of the original charge, was a forfeiture of goods, and it is still every day's practice, to put a formal question to the jury, did he fly for the same, or not? It was an act which the law was most anxious to punish. But there was another thing necessary in the case of flight; the remedy must be quick, or the mischief has its full effect, in endeavouring to escape; if the offence were committed in the interior of the kingdom, a man must pass through many counties, and every justice of each county has authority to send a warrant in pursuit of the fugitive. Is the mischief the same in the case of a man remaining at his post? A man continuing to reside where he procured the thing to be done, shows no disposition to escape the law or evade justice. Show me the possibility of a man remaining where he has done the act, not being amenable to the law, and I give up the question. Is that a conduct whereby his offence remains unpunished? So that against the title of this act, against the preamble reciting the mischief, and for no remedy (for upon that I ground myself), you are to work a mischief, from a looseness of expression in the enacting clause.

It will not be said by any man, that the act as between kingdom and kingdom, can have a wider operation than it has, as between county and county, in England. Suppose a man in one county, procures a murder to be committed in another and stays in the county where he procured the act, does he avoid trial? Does he escape? Does he show any symptom of guilt? or do any act by which the ordinary disposition of the law ought to be changed, and the motion of its process should have the celerity of a courier to overtake him? No; he is at his home, in his dwelling, open to all mankind.

But even if it should be supposed that the act as between county and county, in England has a more extensive operation than I would give it, there are words which might warrant such construction; because the mischief recited there is, reside and be, which words are dropt in the present act; that might furnish a different construction. Therefore, I say, when we refer to the principles of the law, we see the same mischief which struck our ancestors in early days; "escape by flight," that is prima facie evidence against the supposed offender, and warrants something out of the ordinary course of the law, because otherwise he might evade justice.

And now, my lords, I beg to say a few words upon a very new topic; one that possibly will be heard with some surprise, but which, I beg to be recollected, I only use as an argument to get at the meaning of the legislature. It is manifest that the legislature by this law must have meant, the punishment of offences committed and triable in England. And if I show, that upon the facts now before the Court, the act to which this law is now sought to be applied is not an offence triable in England, it is a fair inference from that, that it could not be an offence within the contemplation of the legislature.

I do not use this, as showing, that the gentleman before the Court has a good defence in England, if he were brought there for trial—

Mr. Justice Day.—Can we determine upon the laws of England so far as to say, whether it be an offence or not?

Mr. W. Johnson.—So far as this; because it depends upon principles flowing from the municipal laws of every nation. I do not mean to say, he may use it as a defence, in case he be removed by this assumed authority; but I mean to show the act imputed could not be within the contemplation of the legislature, when they made this law. And this will derive considerable light, from a view of some matters which I shall bring to the recollection of the Court, as marking precisely the principles upon which I shall contend.

Every crime which the imagination of man may suggest, is reducible to one or other of these classes, natural, moral, or municipal. Many natural crimes are not municipal, many moral ones are not municipal; as treachery, deceit, cruelty, hypocrisy, ingratitude, &c. I choose the division I have mentioned, because the ordinary division of mala prohibita and mala in se is not accurate, for this plain reason, that one does not exclude the other, natural crimes are immutable, eternal, and ubiquitous; their sanction is of another world; not so of mala prohibita, for the temporal sanction is their peculiar characteristic. This is a truism, that liability to punishment, and a duty of observance are exactly commensurate. Now, what does this liability arise from? (I will come to a distinction by-and-by, between a subject of the king of England, and a subject of the law of England). This liability arises, either from being a subject of a particular community, or a sojourner in it at the time of the offence committed. I defy the wit of man to extend it farther. What are the sources of this obligation? One attaches at our birth and is incident to it; the other arises from our own act, and is imposed upon us by ourselves. How do we define a municipal offence? An act committed or omitted in violation of a public law forbidding or commanding it, by a person bound to obey that law. There is no other definition, which will embrace every attribute of a municipal law; every word of it is material. Authority and obedience are not of necessity commensurate, I know that authority is often extended where obedience is not due, and obedience is sought to be enforced beyond the limits of right; but I am speaking of the right itself. Three things are necessary to constitute a municipal offence; first a public law; secondly, a fact done within the limits of municipal jurisdiction; and thirdly, by a man bound to obey that public law. I will illustrate what I mean, by a familiar instance. Perhaps no laws in the world are more strictly mala prohibita, than the regulations of the revenue; but being of municipal institution, they are as compulsory as any other. Suppose a native and resident of France (whether acquainted with these regulations or not is immaterial) writes to a correspondent in England to do certain acts, the compliance with which would work a breach of the revenue law; upon the doctrine of misdemeanors that person would be a principal in the offence. Now, if that man at any future time came within the limits of England, could he be tried upon the evidence of that letter? I will put a stronger case; suppose a native and resident of France procures a robbery to be committed in England, he could not be tried for that offence, if he afterwards came within the limits of England.

Mr. Justice Daly.—You will find in some of the books that natives of France have been tried for offences mala in se.

Mr. W. Johnson.—I admit it with all my soul, where the native of France was at the time of the offence committed a sojourner in England; he had the benefit of the English law, and under its protection might have hanged a man for picking his pocket. There was a statute enacted in England, 2nd and 3rd Edw. 6th. chap. 24th, adopted in Ireland, 10 Cha. 1st, chap. 17, with the most remarkable difference. It was found before that law, that great difficulties took place in the trial of accessaries, if their offence was committed in a different county from that of the principal; and the statute was enacted for the express purpose of remedying that mischief, and enabling the Court to try the accessory in the county where he committed the accessorial offence; showing that the legislature was studious to try him where he acted, where his witnesses were resident, and where probably he had lived during the whole course of his life; until that time there was no legal evidence of the guilt of the prisoner. I will ask this question; under all the facts before the Court, suppose a seditious libel to be a felony, for argument sake, where could the defendant, supposing him to be an offender, be tried? Where could the offence be presented? Because if it were a felony, the accessorial offence is a distinct substantive offence, and must be presented as such. Where could it be presented? Certainly not in any county in England, no man will be hardy enough to say that; and let the Court remember, that this is not an inquiry into a moral, but a municipal offence, and that it is the rule which prescribes it that governs the individual.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Is the offence charged here, merely a municipal offence, and not a natural or moral one?

Mr. W. Johnson.—Suppose it to be all, it can only be tried by a municipal law. It is not as a moral offence you could punish it, for there are thousands of moral offences stalking through the land, and you do not punish them, because they are not municipal offences; you must attach municipal regulations upon them.

Mr. Justice Daly.—You said that natural and moral offences were eternal and ubiquitous.

Mr. W. Johnson.—But their sanction is not of this world, though their obligation attends a man every where, in the desert as well as in the city; but not so of municipal offences, save in the case of treason, which I admit to be an exception, because it is a personal obligation, attaching upon a man at his birth, and which accompanies him, travel where he may; but you cannot punish an English subject for a robbery committed abroad, though it be a criminal offence; but having committed treason any where, he is liable to punishment.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Suppose a man in Ireland procured a treason to be committed in England.

Mr. W. Johnson.—He might be tried in England, by the statute of Henry 8th, which I shall come to by and by. What can show that moral guilt is not, as such, the subject of municipal regulation more strongly than the case of a man who, committing a robbery without the limits of municipal regulation, cannot be tried? murder is an exception for a good reason, because, before municipal laws arose, God set his seal upon that crime; but even so, though it has that mark of divine wrath, it could not be tried in England, but by the statute of the 33rd of Henry 8th; and what is material is, that it has been determined, that statute does not extend to accessorial offences in murder.* 1 Hawk. P. C. 119; 2 Hawk P. C. 569, 6th ed.; East, P. C. title, Homicide.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—With regard to this part of your argument, which you are urging with great ability; I wish to know, are you contending now, that the offence, such as it is stated to be, is not triable in England? if so, is that a question before us?

Mr. W. Johnson.—I mention it, only as a reason in support of my argument for the construction of the statute.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—If we see the warrant of the chief justice of England against a person for an offence committed in Westminster, can we enter into the circumstances to determine whether that person can be tried there or not?

Mr. W. Johnson.—For this purpose; neither the warrant nor the endorsement of it touches my argument, he is described as late of Westminster, therefore neither of these documents affect the case.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—I do not understand you exactly.

Mr. W. Johnson.—The grand jury of Middlesex have found an indictment against the defendant as of Middlesex; they charge him with an offence there; they decide nothing respecting his guilt; the warrant goes no farther, it authorizes the arrest of him in England, and what force has this document upon you? Is it by means of the legal knowledge of Mr. Justice Bell? the jury of Middlesex thought of no such thing, neither did lord Ellenborough; but Mr. Bell endorses the warrant for the purpose of transmitting this gentleman to England, a proceeding not thought of by the chief justice there; and it is very material to see, that there is nothing done in England, that attaches upon a man in Ireland, to show that he is triable there; there is no legal decision upon it, there is nothing done but by Mr. Justice Bell, and I may well question the authority of his act.

Mr. Justice Daly.—Do you mean to say, that there is any doubt as to the identity of the person?

Mr. W. Johnson.—Not at all.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—But suppose there were an affidavit that he was not the person, we could not interfere.

Mr. W. Johnson.—Certainly you could not; every thing I say is consistent with the return, because what I urge touches not the endorsement, nor the warrant of the chief justice. I was saying, that the prohibitions of unwritten as well as written law, must be reduced to precise terms, the language of one or the other in prohibiting a particular act must be this: "if any person shall do so and so." Does the law mean by that, the whole world? No, it would be brutum fulmen, it means subjects or residents, it means nothing else. Now examine this for a moment; something has been said upon the relation between principal and accessory, with respect to treason and murder, I have already shown the Court how they come to be liable within England, if done out of it. The statute of Ireland adopting that of Henry 8th has an extraordinary addition to accessory offences, the statute of 10th Chas. 1st, chap. 17, provides that where the offence of an accessory in murder or felony is committed out of the kingdom, it may be tried in the county where the principal is tried, which is different from the law of England, because that applies only to cases within the realm of England; it frequently happened that a person received a mortal blow out of England, and died within it, or vice versa; and therefore the second and third of Edw. 6th was enacted, as I have before mentioned, and the 2nd Geo. 2nd, chap. 21, extended to a stroke given out of the realm; this relates to murder, and to the principal in murder; and the clause in the statute of Edward, as between county and county, relates only to the case of murder, which from the heinousness of the offence might well call upon the legislature to interfere, though the provisions were not extended to other felonies, except in so far as it has been done by the Irish statute; and therefore the argument on the other side resorts to this, that a man procuring a misdemeanor to be committed in England may be tried as for a misdemeanor in England, when he could not be tried if it were a felony; so that the wisdom of the law is precisely in the inverse ratio of the iniquity of the case, and as crime erects its head, the law is without avail, but lays hold of the pettiest offence in the land.

But it may be asked, and that brings me to another head, shall such an offence as the present go unpunished? The form of the interrogatory begs the question that it is an offence, I mean a municipal offence. I answer that as the law stands, if it were a felony, it would go unpunished; but I answer from the particular nature of the offence charged here, it cannot remain unpunished; any man in this country, who procures a publication of a libel in England, must have actors there; and those who commit the fact of publication, may be punished to the utmost satiety of revenge; fine, imprisonment, pillory, form the ghastly train that follows state prosecutions; that the prosecutor should be able to march from the Solway Firth to the Irish Sea and German Ocean, one would think was a pretty extensive range, and every man publishing within those limits, would be subject to the punishments I have mentioned. Now the effect of destroying the accessory offence cannot amount to the extension of the jurisdiction of the country; it is from the exility of the offence in misdemeanors, that the accessory and principal are confounded. But was that intended to extend judicial cognizance beyond the realm, that is, the smaller the offence, the more enlarged the jurisdiction? De minimis non curat lex is the maxim of the law, and shall felons be suffered to escape from the restriction of legal rules, and shall they be extended in misdemeanor to grapple the offender wherever he may be? so that a man might procure a burglary to be committed in England, and could not be punished, but for a trivial offence by a fiction, the arm of law shall reach him in another country. What follows from this head? That the liability to punishment attaches upon the sojourner and the resident; that the obligation to obedience is in one respect imposed upon us at our birth, in the other by ourselves; and that there is a marked distinction between the subject of the king and the subject of the law: that as subjects of the king, we may offend against the law which respects him every where, but as subjects of the law, we can offend no where but where that law is in force.

Then now, my lords, to say a few words upon the great part of this case, which meets the important mischief recited in the act "that offences may not remain unpunished." It now appears by affidavit,—which not being contradicted I have a right to rely upon,—that previous to the existence of this law, the defendant was in Ireland; that he was here long previous to the events which are stated to be the subject of the publication, and previous to the publication itself, and that he has continued here ever since, which meets an objection that was relied upon with some force. It is said, he is indicted for a libel published on a given day, and that indictment may be supported by evidence of the libel published on another. But if he resided here before the first publication down to this hour, it covers every publication, if there were as many as the minutes which have elapsed since that period: it follows, therefore, in a way that cannot be contended against, that if the defendant be guilty, he must be guilty by procurement; that requires no fuller illustration than this, that no man's hand is long enough to reach from this to Middlesex, so as to manage the composing a letter press there. By legal fiction he may be there, but by actual presence he cannot; that act of procurement may be either by writing or copying the writing of another, or sending it for publication; every one of these acts must be done here. The witnesses to them, of course, reside here, and that act, wherever it arises, which by procurement makes a man an accessory in felony, by legal fiction makes him a principal in misdemeanor, must attend himself, and be carried with him 400 miles off. Now, if it shall be shown, that the defendant was the procurer of the publication in question in London, it is now before the Court that it was published in Dublin. It is sworn, that the circumstances about which the papers are conversant respect Ireland, persons resident in Ireland, and the affairs of Ireland. So that the offence is proveable and complete in Ireland, and no where else; for though it may be proveable in London, it must be by carrying witnesses from hence. Every circumstance, from the first inchoation of the crime to its completion, may be proved before you. But it is sought to drag a party and his witnesses, if he can procure them, hundreds of miles, for what? "that his offence may not remain unpunished!" I will not give vent to my sentiments of the motive, which must govern such conduct.

My lord, I heard an extraordinary doctrine, that the peace of the king was distinct in Ireland, in England and in Scotland, I deny the law. Our sovereign is the king of the British isles, give them what name you will, he is king of right, and his peace is the same in all. The Irish subject, the English or Scottish subject, are all subjects of the king of the United Kingdom, the pax regis is the same in all. For what noble purpose is this distinction of the king's peace made? For the purpose of multiplying punishments. This law will not meet with reception from any criminal judge. The object is avowedly to try the party in each place, and for that purpose to try him first where he can have no defence, in order that they may have judgment. Valeat quantum; but I will tell them, that if there were ever so many hundred publications and only one act of procurement, the party can only be once tried. I admit, that if a man be so hardy, as after conviction to publish again, he is a criminal a second time and may be again tried. But if there be one act of procurement only, though zeal may disperse or any other motive of the people may multiply the publication, the man who procures it is but once guilty, having committed one act only.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—I wish to understand you. Suppose there were a conviction in Westminster—would that bar a trial here?

Mr. W. Johnson.—If there were but one act of procurement, upon every principle of criminal law, he could not be tried twice; and if he could not procure the record of his conviction, and support it with proper averments, so as to bar a second trial, it might well call for the interposition of the legislature, in order to enforce the principles uniformly recognized in the law. I can imagine an act, ambiguous, if you will, passing the legislature; I can imagine an oppressive use attempted to be made of that law so ambiguously expressed; but I cannot suppose, that a constitutional court of law, with two constructions of an act of parliament, either of which may be supported, will adopt that which invades private rights, interferes with justice, and works wrong. What is it they do?—An act of parliament may furnish comments for a critic, who closely applies it to oppressive purposes. But it is not the duty of a constitutional court to give it such effect. Now, then, my lords, what is it you are called upon to do? In a case bailable from the nature of the offence, ex debito justitiæ, you are called upon to give operation to this law, which deprives a man of bail in his native land—to transmit him from thence, where his friends reside to look for bail to a country where he has no acquaintance, much less friends—under a law which was enacted for the apprehension of felons escaping, to take a man who never escaped, nor desired to evade trial; and this you are called upon to do, under the magic of a legal fiction.—If a man be both principal and accessory in misdemeanor, and an accessorial offence be committed here, the offence is complete here; he ought to be tried by the law to which he owes obedience, not by that to which he owed no obedience, and where the public purse is in the hands of the prosecutor, to command or procure any testimony which may be necessary to a conviction, while no human means are allowed of bringing witnesses for the accused.—You are to give the operation to this statute, the provisions of which are to bring offenders, escaping trial, to justice, by removing them to the place where their offences were committed; and for the purpose of invigorating the means of prosecution, you are to destroy every possible means of defence, and you are to do that, under colour of sending a man to a place where he is charged with an offence, that he may not escape. You are called upon to do this in a doubtful case. Will the gentlemen consider that? Surely what has passed before the enlightened judges bears out any man in saying it is a doubtful case, and you are called upon to act thus in favour of undisguised oppression, in support of power depriving the subject of right, for right without means of supporting it, is mockery.

My lords, I have made a struggle, however ineffectual, to uphold the principles of law, the eternal principles of justice, and the common rights of humanity. I know, I shall have the sympathy of the good, though I may experience the sneers of the unfeeling, but I have endeavoured to make a stand against the evil doings of the wicked, regardless of the "proud man's contumely."

Court of King's Bench, Dublin, Tuesday, January 29.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, I shall reply to the observations which have fallen from counsel, on the part of Mr. Justice Johnson, with as much conciseness as I can. So far as relates to the construction of the act of parliament, I have already had the honour to lay my sentiments before your lordship; but as Mr. Justice Daly was then absent, it will be my duty to repeat, what I fear I shall not be able to enforce with any additional argument. It has been well observed that this case must be considered like any common case, without reference to the particular misdemeanor of which the person stands accused, or the particular description of person accused of the misdemeanor. In order to try the act, every possible case may be supposed, and may be applied as tests to ascertain its meaning. We may suppose it to be the case of an innocent man falsely accused, and labouring under unjust oppression; or we may conceive it the case of a flagrant malefactor, dreading punishment, and therefore shrinking from trial. These possible cases, while they are adverted to, for the purpose of assisting the mind in construing the act of parliament, are neither one way nor the other to benefit or prejudice the particular person who has given occasion to the present discussion. I shall endeavour, therefore, to lay my sentiments before you, with every abhorrence of the crime and of the person who has committed it, but without the smallest intention of imputing guilt, merely because there has been accusation. Therefore it will not be necessary for me to take notice of the person on whose behalf the application is made, farther than to observe upon an affidavit which he has filed, and to reply to what has been expressed of the oppressive use which it is alleged has been made of this act of parliament—enacted, as has been broadly insinuated, for a specific and not for any general purpose.

In all my other observations, I wish to be understood as speaking of misdemeanors generally; and in the progress of the present discussion, I shall be obliged to call your attention to the worst description of them.

It appears that Mr. Justice Johnson is indicted for a libel in the King's-bench of England, and that a warrant, signed by the chief justice, issued for his apprehension. The date of that warrant appears to be the 24th of November, 1804, and I think it foreign to the consideration before the Court, or to those observations to which I am obliged to reply, to state, why the warrant remained unexecuted from November to January. But I shall be excused, if, in reply to some observations, probably expressed with more harshness than was intended, I state, that on the Tuesday before the warrant was executed, it was distinctly intimated to Mr. Justice Johnson, that unless he would sign a paper, undertaking to appear and plead to the indictment which had been found, it would be necessary to enforce the warrant against him; but, that if he would undertake to appear and plead within the first eight days of the then ensuing term, that the warrant should be withdrawn.

Mr. Justice Johnson, in reply, said, that his counsel were out of town, and that he would consult them on their return to town to attend the term, but did not otherwise give any immediate answer, either in the affirmative or the negative.—No reply came on Wednesday—no reply came on Thursday, and, therefore, late on that day, the warrant having been previously endorsed, two magistrates went to his house, at Milltown, informed him they had a warrant to arrest him, and also a paper, which if he signed, undertaking to appear and plead, the warrant would not be executed. But, having declined to sign it, he was then informed by the magistrate, that he had directions to execute it, either on that evening or the following morning, at any hour that should be most convenient to him; and, of course, the alternative being given, though he refused to sign the paper, the warrant was not then executed.

The magistrate, upon his return to town, was directed to write to Mr. Justice Johnson, that he would be waited upon at one o'clock the next day. It was foreseen, that he might apply for a Habeas Corpus, but not until shortly before the execution of the warrant; and, accordingly, copies of the necessary documents were prepared to be furnished to him on his arrival in town. But he required them on the spot, and they were copied accordingly. This occasioned some delay, and must appear to every one to have been altogether unnecessary. To avoid the inconvenience of taking him out of his own room, a second magistrate was present at the time of the arrest, who offered to bail him on the spot, or to discharge him on his own recognizance; but, refusing those terms, he was brought to town, and he was offered to be lodged in the house of the justice of peace who apprehended him, or in any other house in Dublin, which he might think proper to select; and he was accordingly taken, by his own desire, to a house in Harcourt-street. He then sent a message to me, to request that I would permit him to return to Milltown, in the county of Dublin; and I was at the same time informed, that he said it would require three days to prepare the necessary affidavits for obtaining a writ of Habeas Corpus. I returned for answer, that it was beyond my authority to send him back to Milltown; and, as I knew the term was approaching very near, and that a little farther delay would have the effect of postponing his trial, I desired the magistrate to tell him, that there was no authority to detain him in town, and that he must consider himself on his passage to England. This had the effect which it was intended to produce. He went with the magistrate, in whose custody he was, to the house of the chief justice, who immediately signed the fiat, and then signified to me, that he had done so, but that there might be some delay in preparing and sealing the writ. I therefore instantly consented, that upon Mr. Justice Johnson's undertaking to sue out the writ, and to have it served that evening, he should be discharged. He accordingly was discharged, the writ was afterwards delivered, and, at the appointed hour the next day, the magistrate was prepared with the return to it.

I trust I shall be excused, when charges of oppression and kidnapping have fallen in the course of the argument, for simply reciting a few facts in my own vindication; though I cannot help complaining, that it is a little severe, that, when I am seeking to bring another man to trial, I am suddenly put upon my own.* However, having been charged with

* This part of the attorney general's reply produced the following statement, which was published by Mr. Emerson (Mr. Justice Johnson's solicitor) by way of Postscript to the proceedings in the court of Exchequer:

"Considerable pains have been taken to remove the impression which the extraordinary conduct of the prosecutors, in attempting to carry off Mr. Justice Johnson by surprise, had naturally produced on the public mind; and an effort has even been made to throw upon himself the blame of the attempt.

"For this purpose, while the present report was in preparation, a publication appeared in the Dublin Evening Post, putting into the mouth of the attorney-general such expresan oppressive use of this warrant, I wish to take the first occasion of meeting and refuting the allegation, and to disclaim distinctly, both for myself and others, the most remote idea of any proceeding towards Mr. Justice Johnson, which the necessary attainment of justice did not indispensably require.

Having thus trespassed upon your lordship, by stating the mode of Mr. Justice Johnson's arrest, I have next to call your attention to the motion for his discharge; for I allow, that the mildness, forbearance or lenity, with which the warrant has been executed, cannot for a moment give it efficacy, if it be not founded in law. That warrant, endorsed by a magistrate of the county in which the party was arrested, is founded upon the stat. 44. Geo. 3. ch. 92. That statute enacts, in the fourth section, "that if any person or persons "against whom a warrant shall be issued by "any of the judges of his majesty's court of "King's-bench, &c. for any crime or offence "against the laws of England or Scotland, "respectively, shall escape, go into, reside or "be in any place of that part of the United "Kingdom called Ireland, it shall be lawful "to arrest him, &c." These words are so plain and obvious, and there is so little difficulty in that part of the act which I have stated—the operative part upon which the warrant is grounded—that I think I might be justified in asking, what quantum of ingenuity, what portion of learning is necessary to make plain words unintelligible? For that being once found, you will have ascertained that portion of intellect, which is necessary to entitle Mr. Justice Johnson to his discharge. They are words, which it is not pretended any plain man could misconstrue—words of no ambiguous meaning or import. But, in order to raise a doubt and cloud upon them, we are to search the preamble of this and of all the other sections: we are to examine the title of the act: to increase the confusion, we are to have recourse to other statutes, with an auxiliary that I have never known resorted to upon any former occasion, namely, the marginal abridgment of the compilers of the Statutes who, in abridging a clause, are supposed to make the act of parliament! We are sions, as those who know the candour and love of truth which distinguish that gentleman, must know he never uttered. This misstatement, with very slight alterations, and evidently from the same source, has been printed in a pamphlet, intituled, 'Reply of the Right Honourable the Attorney General of Ireland, to the Arguments of Counsel for the Defendant, in the Case of the King v. Mr. Justice Johnson,' from which, as it has not been openly published, though privately and industriously circulated, it becomes necessary to lay the following extract before the public:—

"'It was foreseen, that he,' Mr. Justice Johnson, 'might apply for a Habeas Corpus, to have recourse to every other statute bearing upon the same subject in England, not to strengthen our act, but to arrive at this happy conclusion, that by this “mighty” act of parliament the legislature intended little or nothing. But, my lord, the old rules of

“In the first place, the reader is referred to the statement made in the chamber before the chief justice, and his learned assessors, by Mr. Justice Johnson, the day after the arrest; a statement in which the attorney-general appeared at the time perfectly to acquiesce, when he not only admitted the celerity with which it was attempted to transport Mr. Justice Johnson, but actually vindicated that celerity, upon the ground that a more accommodating conduct in the officers might have subjected them to an action for false imprisonment: indeed this apology appeared necessary at that time to appease the indignation which the uncontradicted statement of Mr. Justice Johnson had excited in the minds of the Court. The officers were likewise present at the statement.

“In the next place the reader is referred to the letters which are hereunto subjoined from sir Henry Jebb and John Barclay Scriven, esq. the only persons, with the exception of Mr. Justice Johnson, the officers, and the editor, who were present at the circumstances to which they relate.

“The editor himself does not for a moment hesitate to declare, that his mind was from the beginning strongly impressed with the opinion, that an attempt would be made to carry off Mr. Justice Johnson,—an opinion in which the judge could not be brought to coincide. Under this impression he had on the first notice of the warrant attended at the necessary office, and had the writ of Habeas Corpus actually engrossed before the arrest was made. On his arrival in town with Mr. Justice Johnson on the day of the arrest, the editor, having inserted the copy of the warrant in the necessary affidavit, instantly repaired to the house of the chief justice, in Merrion-square (where his lordship waited in consequence of his having been apprized on the part of the judge that the writ would be required), and obtained his lordship's fiat for the writ, at the same time expressing his apprehension to his lordship, that an attempt would be made to carry off Mr. Justice Johnson. With the fiat it was necessary to proceed to the house of the deputy clerk of the crown, to obtain from him the engrossed writ, which still required the signature of the chief justice for its allowance: impressed as the editor was with his opinion of what was intended, it may be believed, that he lost no time in returning to the house of the chief justice, where, to his astonishment, he found Mr. Justice Johnson, who informed him, that the attempt had been actually made, and that the fidelity of his coachman had enabled him to defeat it, by claiming the protection of the lord chief justice, which his lordship knowing the steps which had been taken for suing out the writ of Habeas Corpus had immediately construction, by which the Court will be governed, will be found perfectly true; apply them upon the present occasion; they will granted. From this statement, and from the subjoined letters, which cannot, with truth, be contradicted, it is very clear:

"That no message was sent to the attorney-general, requiring three days, or any other time whatever, to prepare affidavits for obtaining the writ of Habeas Corpus.

"That it was not in consequence of any message or intimation from the attorney-general, that the fiat for the Habeas Corpus was so quickly applied for, it having been, on the contrary, obtained by the editor before the arrival of Mr. Justice Johnson at the house of the chief justice.

"That the officer who attended Mr. Justice Johnson did not know that he was going to the house of the chief justice.

"But on the contrary it is obvious, that the attempt (which the editor had expected) was made to carry off Mr. Justice Johnson by surprise, an attempt which can best be explained by an expression, which the report itself puts into the mouth of the attorney-general, 'I knew the term was approaching very near.'—The term was approaching very near, and had the attempt been successful, the editor would not now have to congratulate his countrymen, that a question in which their dearest interests are concerned, has become matter of solemn discussion, not only at the bar and on the bench, but before the great tribunal of public opinion.

"Dear Sir;—I have been requested to look into the argument of the attorney-general, in judge Johnson's case, in the Court of King's-bench, as stated in the Dublin Evening Post of the 28th ult.; and to say, whether the account, there given, of the arrest and subsequent occurrences which happened on Friday, 18th of January, agree with my recollection of such of them as took place in my presence—to which my answer is, that if the attorney-general stated the facts in the manner there attributed to him, he must have been misinformed on the subject. Mr. Justice Bell and Mr. Medlicott having in a coach passed me on the road to Milltown, they arrived at judge Johnson's house before me, but waited till I came up, and permitted me to go in to inform him of their arrival, while they remained on the road: immediately after me, sir Henry Jebb, the judge's physician, came in, and as soon as the judge was apprised that the magistrates were waiting, he directed that they should be admitted—judge Johnson having, after Mr. Medlicott produced the warrant (which he at first objected to), requested to know to what place he was to be taken; he was informed, that the directions given to the magistrates were, to take him to Dublin; and that he might go to Mr. Medlicott's house, or to the house of any person he chose—judge appear clear and satisfactory. You are first to see, how the law stood before the making of the act: You are then to see the mischief,

Johnson named his brother's in Harcourt-street: and then said he wished to send to the attorney-general, to request that he might be permitted to return to Milltown, to arrange matters for his departure—Mr. Justice Bell undertook to go himself to the attorney-general for the purpose, as soon as they should get to Dublin. But certainly it was not then, or at any other time, in my presence, stated, 'that it would require three' (or any other number of) 'days, to prepare the necessary 'affidavits for obtaining a writ of Habeas 'Corpus,' nor was a word said about applying for such writ. While the magistrates were at Milltown, I was not absent from the room in which they were for more than two minutes, when I went into the next apartment for a pen or some paper. I accompanied judge Johnson in his carriage to his brother's in Harcourt-street: when we arrived there I went with him into his study, when the judge desired, that as the warrant had been executed, his request to be allowed to return to his own house, which he had left without any preparation, might be communicated to the attorney-general: either there or at Milltown, I do not exactly recollect which, I offered to go to the attorney general to ask his consent, that the officer should comply with judge Johnson's wish; but Mr. Justice Bell thought it better that he should be the bearer of the message—but no mention whatsoever was made of wanting time to prepare for obtaining a writ of Habeas Corpus. Very shortly after our arrival in Harcourt-street, finding that my assistance was not wanted, and having an appointment on a reference before Master King, I took my leave. What passed after my departure I cannot know—but I have every reason to be convinced from the conversation which took place between judge Johnson and me, before the magistrates were shown into the room at Milltown, that the judge's intention of applying for a writ of Habeas Corpus was not even hinted at, while judge Johnson and the magistrates were together.—I am, most truly, yours,

J. B. SCRIVEN."

"Harcourt-street, 12th March, 1805."

"J. S. EMERSON, Esq."

"Dear Sir;—In answer to your desire, that I would mention all I recollected of what passed at the time of your arrest on the 18th of January last, at which I happened to be present.—

"I have a perfect recollection of the entire transaction:—On my calling that day to visit you, the servant showed me into your study, where I saw you, counsellor Scriven, and Mr. Emerson your solicitor; supposing you engaged on business, I attempted to retire, on which you called on me to remain, observing to me that I did not intrude.

which the legislature intended to remedy; and you are so to interpret the words, that the remedy may be extended, and the mischief corrected; and, if the words be sufficient to embrace the whole of the subject, you do

“ ‘In a very short time afterwards Mr. Bell and Mr. Medlicott were introduced, who, with some previous apology, said, they had an order for arresting you; they both appeared in one and the same character, as people employed to make the arrest; except that Mr. Medlicott was the person who had the order, and made the arrest; and Mr. Bell seemed rather to assume the direction of the proceedings.—The first circumstance that then took place was, your asking for a copy of the writ, or order (perhaps I mistake terms); they hesitated as to compliance; even as to allowing it to be read; observing, that on your going to town, you would have a copy of it from the office: both you and counsellor Scriven argued much to convince them, that you were by law entitled to it; and, on your peremptorily demanding of him (Medlicott), if he took it upon himself to refuse it; after some consultation between him and Bell, he allowed it to be copied.

“ ‘You then asked, what you were to do? and was answered, that you must instantly be brought to Dublin, unless you would sign a written paper that they produced to you; this, you said, you could not then do, nor finally determine upon without the advice of counsel, who were then absent, and to whose direction you had determined to submit your conduct. No other alternative whatever was offered. You then requested to know, what you must do on getting to town? Mr. Bell replied, that you would be permitted to remain at Mr. Medlicott's house, to which Mr. Medlicott assented, and added, or at any other house you should choose; you expressed your thanks, and said, you would prefer your brother's house in Harcourt-street; on which you all prepared to set off to town, and went accordingly to Harcourt-street.

“ ‘I followed in my own carriage, and consequently got into your brother's in a few minutes after you; Mr. Scriven and Mr. Emerson were, however, gone from it.—I found you, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Medlicott, in the back parlour together; after a very few words of general conversation, you remarked, that you left your family at Milltown, without informing them of this transaction; that they had no knowledge of what had passed, and might be greatly disturbed by what they might hear; and you desired to know, if you might be indulged in returning that night to your own house? Mr. Bell, with much apparent kindness, said, he would go and see the attorney-general.

“ ‘After an absence of some time, he returned, and said, he had missed of him, as he left home, but he would go again, and seek for him in those places likely for his being not carry the law into effect, if you diminish their operation.

It is not, give me leave to observe, that the act may operate upon less; the question is, has it not operated upon more? The ques-found at, and use his endeavours to see him; he accordingly did so; and, after some considerable delay, he returned, saying, that he was sorry to be the messenger of ill news, for that the attorney-general said, ‘he would not interfere.’ On this you said, ‘then I must give directions for my remaining and sleeping here.’ Mr. Bell then said, that he was very sorry to be obliged to announce more ill news, for that the orders were, that Mr. Medlicott must proceed with you instantly for England.

“ ‘He then took Mr. Medlicott apart, when they consulted together for some time, and Mr. Bell went away.

“ ‘When he was gone, Mr. Medlicott said, you must go directly to England, and requested pen, ink, and paper, and that a messenger might be procured to take a letter to his house.

“ ‘You spoke of the hardship on you of this unexpected hurry; that you had not left money with your family, nor had a guinea in your pocket; and that it would be absolutely necessary for you to call at one or two places before your departure. Mr. Medlicott said, he would call any where with you; and was then shown into the office or street parlour to write his letter, leaving you and me in the back parlour together; you appeared much agitated; walked up and down the room; observed that this proceeding was a sort of kidnapping, and that you were taken by surprise; that if you could see lord chief justice Downes it would not be suffered, and you did not know what to do. I asked you why you might not see him, as he was certainly at home? and you answered, you apprehended Mr. Medlicott might not agree to go there, and you therefore requested, I would direct your coachman to drive you there.

“ ‘I accordingly desired Mick to bring the carriage to the door, and not to heed any directions that might be given to him as to where he should go; but whenever you got in, to drive directly to judge Downes, in Merriion-square.

“ ‘Mick did his business very well, and saved you a disagreeable passage in a wherry, that I understand was kept in waiting in deep water, to avoid the delay of a few hours for the packet, which was to sail with the next tide.

“ ‘As to what you ask relative to any mention about Habeas Corpus, or the delay of three days to prepare a writ, there was not a word of any such matter; nor any reason offered by you for wishing to return to Milltown, except as before, to relieve the anxiety of your family, who were totally unacquainted with what had happened, and to prevent the distress which what they might hear must tion is not, whether, garbling the act, taking words out of it which are in it, something may not be found, upon which it still may attach; but the question is, "give it any other operation than I give it, and does it not leave part of the mischief precisely where it found it?" And will not a disgraceful class of malefactors still find, in their local situation, a protection from justice?

The first objection which has been made to my interpretation, is, that, considering every thing, the legislature must have intended to confine the remedial act to capital cases, and not to extend it to misdemeanors.

Now, how did the law stand before the statute was enacted? I assert, that the king, by his prerogative, might have removed from one part of his dominions to the other, all persons charged with capital offences, in order to abide their trial. I appeal to the uniform experience of every person conversant with criminal proceedings in the two countries, for the truth of this assertion; and it is farther founded upon the authority of the English Habeas Corpus act. This act was conceived in great jealousy, at the conclusion of the reign of Charles 2nd, and shortly before the accession of James. The legislature had some recollection of abuses which had been committed, and having anxious feelings that such abuses should not be renewed, the provisions of this act were conceived in the warmest regard for the liberty of the subject.

The 12th section of the English Habeas Corpus act, restrains the power of the prerogative from sending any man out of England; but by the 16th section it is provided, that this clause shall not extend to persons, who may have committed capital crimes in the places to which they shall be sent. The Irish Habeas Corpus act, having been enacted in the reign of his present majesty, it was not thought necessary to entertain that jealousy of the House of Brunswick, which the legislature had entertained of the House of Stuart; and, therefore, the Irish act does not contain the general prohibitory clause, which is in the English act, or the proviso which restrains it. It leaves the law as it found it, with regard to the prerogative of the crown—This prerogative is clearly recognized by the Irish statute alluded to by my lord chief justice, 8 Geo. 1, ch. 9, made perpetual by the 31st of the king, chap. 44, which facilitates the transmission of those capital offenders to England, and as far back as experience can reach, or history teach us, it has been the uniform practice. Did there ever occur a single instance of a capital felon escaping punishment, because the secretary of state refused to transmit him? And, therefore, if the present act be confined to capital cases, it is meant to guard, not against obvious mischiefs, which stared the legislature in the face and occurred in every hour, but against possible cases, which no history will show to have occurred. Then what are you to understand by the act? The gentlemen on the other side fix with great fondness upon the words "sufficient provision," and that heretofore a capital felon could only be transmitted by a warrant of the secretary of state. But it is said, that, under this statute, he may be transmitted by a common justice; and then the Court is gravely told, that the operation of the entire statute was merely to change the person who was to transmit, and that it has no farther operation.

But what becomes of these words, "whereby their offences often remain unpunished?" I will ask any man, whether the legislature meant by those words the obstinacy of the lord lieutenant, or his secretary, in allowing a capital malefactor to remain at large, and his crimes to pass with impunity? Or whether it was not rather intended to embrace by the act, the entire class of offenders which under the existing laws could not be rendered amenable?

Perhaps, upon this part of the case, I am unnecessarily elaborate; because, it must be obvious to the plainest understanding, that, with regard to capital cases, the act is little more than a dead letter; the object therefore of my argument is, to show that inferior offences are more within the mischief to be corrected, and that the words adopted by the legislature are sufficient to bring them within the same remedy.

To support the construction proposed on the part of the defendant, it is contended, that the words "felons and other malefactors" do not embrace minor offenders, and that the word "malefactor" is not applicable to a man who has not committed one of the greater crimes. In my judgment, the word extends to offenders of all descriptions; my construction of the word "malefactor" does not necessarily deny, that a malefactor may be a man who ought to be hanged; but their construction denies that he is a man, the measure of whose guilt may be satisfied by the chastisement of whipping. They suppose that a malefactor must be ripe for execution. I suppose he may be also a man, guilty of an inferior crime, and who may be stopped in his career of vice by timely and salutary punishment.

The first observation that naturally occurs, is, that where the words "felons and other malefactors" are used, they must mean, "malefactors other than felons." Now, if the word applied only to superior crimes, I might lay it down as a general rule, that though there may be felonies, which are not otherwise create in your absence.—I am, my dear Sir, your's most truly, HENRY JEBB.

"To the Hon. Mr. Justice Johnson," capital, yet there is no capital offence which is not a felony. 1 Hawk. 99. But, to support my argument, that position is not necessary to be maintained in its full extent—however I must observe, that the exceptions stated yesterday, of apostacy, heresy, and præmunire are unfounded, none of them being capital offences by the laws of England at this moment.

Now, that the word “felon” extends to cases not capital is manifest; petty larceny is not capital, yet it is a felony—then, who will suppose that the legislature laid hands on the petty pilferer, and yet permitted the malignant slanderer to range unmolested?

Then look to the meaning of the word “malefactor”—it signifies an evil doer, literally: taken in the common acceptation of the English language, it is an offender against the law, vide Johnson's Dictionary. By the way, this work is no indifferent repertory of belles lettres, and has been resorted to with great success by those who conceive the poets to be the best commentators upon an act of parliament. But look to the word as used in our ancient statutes. The statute de malefactoribus in parvis applies to inferior offenders—and in a passage in the second vol. of his P. C. p. 136, in observing upon the statute 34 Edward 3rd, Sir M. Hale speaks of malefactors being bound by justices of the peace to their good behaviour; and, therefore, it is a decided authority, that the word malefactor may be used as descriptive of an inferior offender. You will please to recollect also, that the person apprehended here, is to be taken before a magistrate to be dealt with as if he were arrested in England, which implies a discretion, and seems to extend to bailable cases. And when you come to the enacting clause, it does not refer to the preamble, it does not say, “such person against whom a warrant issues,” but “any person, &c.” So that if the words in the former part were not sufficiently extensive to embrace the case, which I contend they are, yet the latter words do, beyond all possibility of doubt. They embrace the case of any man against whom a warrant issues. To make him subject to this act, it is only necessary to show the existence of a warrant against him, under which he might be legally arrested in the country from which it proceeds. In any other construction, what line has the magistrate or the constable to direct him? Can human prudence protect them from actions of false imprisonment?

Give me leave to put it in another way. Suppose I should be called upon to prepare a draft of an act of parliament, to do away the doubt; I should begin by reciting, “whereas “some persons of singular sagacity in the “laws of Ireland, have considerable difficulty “in understanding the words felons and other “malefactors; be it therefore declared and “enacted, that those words shall be held, and “construed to extend to all persons guilty of

This, certainly, would not be ignotum per ignotius, for it would be explaining the act, by using the very words which are to be found in the statute which is sought to be explained. It is impossible to resort to any more comprehensive, and I know of no species of crime or offence that they do not include. You are not to torture the plain meaning of the words, in order to render the act unoperative. You are not to cast about for a hook to hang a remnant of the law upon; you are not to strip it of its legitimate energy and force, and then expose the ineffective skeleton, in mockery of the legislature.

I cannot conceive how it is possible for the human mind, whether looking into law books, or dictionaries, or taking common sense for its guide, considering the pre-existing laws, the evil to be repressed, and the remedy adopted, to hesitate in saying, that the legislature meant to embrace all offences and all offenders. In the odious catalogue, none can seek for exemption.

It has been pressed upon this part of the case, that you are not to remove a criminal for a lesser crime, in a manner that might be so inconvenient to him. It is at the same moment admitted, that a person guilty of a petty larceny, under twelve pence, may be removed, as well as a more atrocious offender, and that he clearly falls within the provisions of the act as a felon. Does he, who with malice prepense inflicts the vengeance of the sword, meeting his adversary in the dark, and striking him unseen; does he, who sends his poison into other countries, whether for the body or the mind, whether by arsenic or libel; does he, who writes from the malice of his heart, or who lives upon the reputation of others, when he can no longer subsist upon his own, seek to be compared with every common pilferer, and to profit by the comparison?

There was a long dissertation, upon this part of the case, between moral, natural, and municipal crimes; and a conclusion was drawn, that the defendant, having resided in Ireland, when the fact was committed, could not be convicted in England, for a publication there.

If the position were true it would be foreign to the present argument, and I do not know what benefit was sought to be derived from this division of crimes. A libeller is held to be an offender against the laws of God and man. His offence is prohibited in scripture, in two or three places, and the commandment of God, that we should not bear false witness against our neighbour, should be an awful admonition to him. It is forbidden, also, by the municipal regulations of the land. But it seems there is a magic in the local situation of the offender, which may protect him from punishment, notwithstanding this act, which was intended to strip him of that local protection. Shall the arm of the criminal be co-extensive with the empire, and shall the arm of justice be fettered to the spot where he resides? Shall he be allowed, with impunity, to range along the borders of one country, casting his poison into another, and polluting it with his crimes? It is said, upon this head, that you could not punish an accessory to a felony, if, at the time, he did not reside within the jurisdiction where the principal offence was committed. I admit you could not, if there were not particular laws to reach him; and in this case, if there be not a particular law to reach such an offence, it should be provided for. Yet if an accessory to a felony may escape from an imperfection in the law, that is no reason why the perpetrator of a misdemeanor shall escape, where there is no such imperfection. But in Ireland the difficulty suggested does not occur. By the statute 10 Car. 1, sess. 2, chap. 19, "if a man, whilst residing in England, be accessory to a murder or felony in Ireland, he may be indicted, tried and convicted in the country in which the principal is convicted."

But if we had no such provision in our law, will any man contend, that though a criminal of a certain description be taken in the fact he shall not be tried, because sufficient provision has not been made for the punishment of a greater offender? Shall the good fortune of one man protect the crimes of another? The statute however declares, that a person who commits an offence while out of a particular jurisdiction, shall yet be punished within it; and justly, for reason tells us, that many of the most abominable and cowardly crimes do not require the personal presence of the perpetrator. Suppose a man sent pills under pretence of administering to the health of another in England, but in reality to poison him, and the party dies; is such an offender to say, "he was not in England at the time of the offence committed?" Shall he who murders by poison sent with his own hand, be allowed to say, "I am not within the act of parliament; it was meant to fasten upon those who escape. I shall escape punishment, for I did not escape from the country in which my crime was committed."

This leads me to the second head, and is an argument to refute the position, that the statute applies only to persons who being in one country commit a crime and fly into another to avoid punishment. If you give it that construction, the poisoner escapes, the libeller escapes; all that train of crimes which debase the heart, and show the cowardice of the criminal because committed in supposed security, will be relieved from the operation of an act which professes to apply itself to all offenders. Is not this a case of such enormity as is within the provisions and words of the statute, so as to enable the law to grasp the offender? and will you stand between the law and its legitimate operation? But the feelings of the Court have been addressed on this occasion, and, through the Court, something has been said to the public. I entreat you, however, not to let every criminal embody himself with the liberty of the people, and suppose there can be no freedom in the land, but while it is an asylum for malefactors. I like to hear fine sentiments chanted from the dock; but, my lord, the liberty of the subject is to be preserved by other hands, and he who attempts to support it by defeating the law, will find himself miserably mistaken. But I cannot pass over the language which has been used, of "constitutional law and constitutional judges;" how I love to see a judge passing over the law to grasp at the constitution—mounting the liberty of the subject to ride away from an act of parliament! This Court will not exhibit such a picture; for my part, I do not understand the distinction in a court of law; I consider the laws as embodied in the constitution, and I do not feel that they can have any separate existence. If you cannot get out of the act by legal construction, look not to the constitution to help you out of the difficulty. He who is most obedient to the law is most faithful to the constitution. Construe this act so as to forward the remedy and repress the mischief, and you may despise the vain and idle attempts of any criminal to excite a public feeling in his favour, whose only pledge to the constitution will be his resistance to the law.

Your lordship knows, that the first statute which related to county and county passed in England is the 23 Geo. 2d; it extended to any person against whom a legal warrant issued, and it was confined to the cases of escape and going into, and it did not provide bail. The legislature found there was a defect in speaking of legal warrants, and in not providing for bail, and it was doubtful what species of escape fell within the act; it also occurred that a variety of crimes might be committed in a county without going into it, and therefore the act was amended by adding the words "reside or be;" these words embraced cases which the former were inadequate to reach. These acts having provided for cases only between county and county in England, it was found unreasonable that the benefit of a law which operated as between Cornwall and Cumberland, should not operate as between Cumberland and the next Scotch county, and it was thought necessary to enact a statute for that purpose in 1773. Here let me remind you, how much we have heard of the efficacy of a young act of parliament; that it is as strong as an old one; that the moment it was enacted, an unfortunate malefactor was seized under it; and something has been hinted at by a silence most expressive, that the act, young as it was, knew what it was about, and had a certain object to achieve. These silent expressions, not less eloquent for being dumb, are refuted, by stating in this open court, that this law was enacted to put Ireland and England upon the same footing to all intents and purposes as England and Scotland were before. It adopts the words used in the statutes 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd, and those of the 13th of the king; the same expressions which were used in legislating, as between the several counties in England, and the same which were used in legislating between England and Scotland, are now applied as between England, Scotland, and Ireland; and therefore, whether the statute be defective or not, it cannot be said to be an occasional act, made for a particular purpose. It was intended to render the law between the two countries similar, and if it has no merit in itself, it has at least precedent to support it. As to the slavery which it is said to introduce, the good people of England will be astonished to find that they have slept under this oppression for thirty-two years, and at length have been awakened from their slumbers by the outcry of Irish malefactors.

I thought it right to say so much in vindication of the act, because to me it was a little astonishing, that the counsel for the defendant, who refused to be tried himself, who denied all competency to try him, should feel confidence sufficient to indict the legislature of having committed a high misdemeanor in enacting this law, to put every gentleman upon his trial who had forwarded the act, and even those who never saw it till it was in print, but had the misfortune to fall under his displeasure for directing its operation in Ireland.

Having thus endeavoured to acquit the persons accused, I shall show, from the sound construction of the act, it is impossible to confine it merely to persons who escape. It is manifest, that if it were not intended to reach a man who was not in the country where the offence was committed, the two first words would be sufficient. For no man could in his proper person commit an offence in England, and be in Ireland, without escaping there, or going there; for how could a man be arrested in his proper person in Ireland, for an offence committed in his proper person in England, unless, after committing the offence, he escaped or went into Ireland, and therefore they use the words reside or be, which must be words of operative meaning, applicable to the mischief, which it must be acknowledged pre-existed. They are words of strong and distinct signification. If you strike out the words, reside or be, you certainly diminish the operation of the act of parliament, and suffer part of the evil to continue, which it was intended to correct.

But then it is said, on the other side, that if that construction be right, strike out the other words, escape and go into, and the remaining words will answer. I agree with them that if either clause ought to be struck out, it must be that which comprehends the lesser description, the insufficiency of which had rendered the other necessary; the latter comprehends the evil of escape and go into, and also the other evil which it was intended to remedy; in other words, strike out the expressions, escape and go into, and you will have an act of parliament co-extensive with the whole mischief intended to be remedied. But strike out the latter words, and the act of parliament is utterly insufficient to remedy the evil. Now, we know, it frequently happens, that the legislature may use three or four words, not synonymous, though tending to the same thing; and therefore, if you are called upon to strike out any words, which will you strike out—the comprehensive words which embrace the others, or the less comprehensive, in which the others cannot be embraced? In other terms, if you feel yourself at liberty to weed an act of parliament, will you weed it of those words which promote its effect, or of those words which diminish its operation? I have pointed out several classes of offenders who will escape punishment, if the latter words be struck out. But inasmuch as a notable discovery was made, by which the entire four words are permitted to remain, it may be necessary to observe a little upon this second construction. It seems that a word or two becomes necessary to be introduced for this purpose, and will have the effect of making very great jargon of that which was very good sense; the exposition is this, the four words are to remain, but then, they are to be separated, and the two first are to be applied to the person, and the two last to the place; thus at the expense of a little law, a little grammar, and a little good sense, the person to be apprehended, is the person who escapes or goes into—and the place where he is to be apprehended, is the place in which he shall reside or be—O! sapient and sagacious legislature! With what wisdom hast thou provided that a man shall not be taken where he is not to be found! with what timely providence hast thou pointed out to the constable the precise line of his duty! you first describe the offender, and then you provide, that he shall never be arrested, but in the place where he shall be! The person who escapes from England and goes into Ireland is the person within the act. But what do the words reside or be mean?—Oh; they have nothing to do with the person, they only guard against the indiscretion of the constable, who might otherwise arrest a man in one county, while he was innocently employed in another. There may be good sense in this argument, but I shall leave it to be discovered by others, protesting, that to my humble judgment, it is a construction which passeth all understanding.

Upon the subject of the construction of acts of parliament, I think it a waste of time to cite many authorities: but as the preambles of the act of last session, and of the several other acts upon the same subject in England, have been strongly relied upon, to control the enacting part, I shall refer you to a very penal statute in England, in which the legislature indulged in a length of preamble, which, if attended to, would have considerably abridged the efficacy of the enacting part; but unfortunately for the culprit, the enacting part was very clear. I allude to the 9th Geo. 1st, c. 22, for sending threatening letters, 2 East, P. C. 1113. The opinion of the twelve judges was taken upon the point, how far the enacting part was controlled by the preamble. They decided against the preamble; and Mr. Justice Buller, in giving the opinion of the judges, uses these words, which are strongly applicable to the act now before you.

“Where the enacting clause of a statute refers to such offences only as are mentioned in the preamble, it may thereby be controlled or restrained; but in this case it would be doing violence to very plain words, and repealing some of the obvious provisions, if it were so restrained. It is no uncommon thing for a statute to recite a particular mischief as the cause of making the statute; and yet for the enacting part of it to embrace more general objects, and to extend to other cases which the legislature thought within equal mischief.”

Another argument which has been mentioned is, that this statute is prospective as to crimes, and cannot attach upon a person whose guilt was complete before the 1st of August last, and that to give it any other construction would make it an ex post facto law. With respect to this, you will observe, that there is no reference in the act to crime; it is confined to criminals; it does not add to the catalogue of crimes—nor does it take one from it. It leaves all things where it found them, except the criminal. It seeks to bring him within the jurisdiction where his offence was committed; but it does not touch upon the crime, or make any alteration in the evidence of it. But here, the crime of which the party is accused, may have been committed long since the 1st of August, and therefore in point of fact there is no ground for the objection which has been made; it is equally without foundation in point of law. The act gives a new mode of apprehending an old offender; but is every new process for bringing in a delinquent to be called an ex post facto law? As well may a constable newly created, be called an ex post facto constable. I thought this appellation was given to a law which, after the fact done, made that criminal which was innocent before. The distinction seems too plain to be misunderstood.

My lord, the last objection is drawn from the words, “whereby their offences remain unpunished, &c.” and it is said, the offence in the present case cannot remain unpunished, because the party may be tried for it in Ireland; that is, that he may be tried in Ireland for an offence against the laws of England. I take the liberty of repeating what I asserted before, that the king’s peace is distinct in England, Scotland, and Ireland. That assertion is met by another, that the king’s peace since the union is the same throughout his dominions. I apprehend, that the union has made no sort of alteration in the administration of our law. I conceive that the king’s peace in Ireland is protected by distinct judges, distinct magistrates, and distinct laws—the king’s peace in England and in Scotland, respectively, by judges, magistrates, and laws equally distinct and independent. If a man could be tried before a judge in Ireland for an assault in Westminster, the most unheard of chaos would be introduced, and a man would be tried by one law for the breach of another. I take it that the law stands as it did before the union, and before this act; and that if a man commits a breach of the peace, or an act tending to break the peace, he must be tried in the same manner as before the union; and a conviction, or acquittal for a publication of a libel in one country, cannot be pleaded in bar to an indictment for a publication of the same libel in the other. It is not so in the same country. If a man be indicted for his offence, the peace of that country, in which he is brought to trial, is vindicated throughout; and he cannot be tried again, except for a subsequent publication, which, in truth, would be a distinct offence. The offence of a libel springs from the publication. As long as a man absorbs his own venom, the law considers him sufficiently punished by being the receptacle of his own malevolence. But if at length, satiated from feeding upon his own malice, he disseminates his noxious poison to the public, if it be in Scotland, he is an offender against the laws of Scotland, and will be punished as such: if the publication be in Ireland, he is an offender against the law of Ireland, and will be punished as such: so if he publishes in England, he is to be punished as an offender against the law of England: and the law does not allow a man when called upon to answer in one of those three countries to take refuge from punishment in the multiplicity of his crimes; he is not permitted to say “I will not be tried here, or there, because in disturbing the peace of two other countries I have transgressed the laws of my own; you should be parsimonious in punishment, because I have been prolific in crime.” But supposing the several publications to be one offence and triable in either country, does it follow that the criminal should choose his own judge? Because he refuses to be tried where the accusation is made, must justice submissively wait upon him where she may not have the same means to vindicate herself? “you have indicted me in England where you have evidence to convict me, therefore I will not go there; but you may try me in Ireland where I am not indicted, and where possibly your evidence may not be equally strong.” But, my lord, upon this part of the case let us come to plain and manly language; Mr. Curran told you what he could effect by the magic of his eye; that the author would be instantly acquitted if tried in his own country. If the author be in this land, let him come forward; let him raise his head to be seen, and justify his publication as the friend of the people; let him avow the fact; let him enable me to prove that he is the author of those letters, and I will throw myself upon the justice of an Irish jury and an Irish bench, I will not shrink from the trial of such a question in my own country. Who is he that uses those arguments? He is supposed to be an Irishman and a resident in this country; if so, he knew the falsehood of his calumny, at the moment he was accusing a member of this high court, of tarnishing his robes, and polluting the ermine which had been entrusted to him as a sacred deposit; and he preferred this accusation, not before an Irish public, where the integrity and character of the learned judge would have protected him from the coarse slander of his assailant, but before the tribunal of another country, where he could not have equal protection. This libeller, whoever he may be, dragged him to a distant court, without notice of trial, without process to bring in his witnesses, without letting him see the hand that held the accusation. Will such a man complain of being brought before the same tribunal to purge his abominations? but, let him avow himself, let him rest upon the merits of his publication, and I will try him at home. Yes, my lord, I feel it would be divine retribution, that as he tried an honest man where he was not known, he should himself be tried where he would not only have the charge of the accuser, but the whole weight of his own character to contend with. I should be influenced by more than ordinary zeal for his conviction, if I wished him to labour under more accumulated pressure. His character is not unknown to the law: he must be a man unchaste in his manners—embarrassed in his fortune—and profligate in his principles; the language may be my own, but the description is pretty accurately taken from lord Coke's report of the case "de libellis famosus."

But it is said, "I can have no witnesses, because I have no power to enforce their attendance." Who is it says so? The gentleman at present before you has made an affidavit; he states in it, distinctly, the fact with which he is accused, and does not deny it. He swears to an alibi, as his only protection, in a case in which an alibi is no legal defence. But if metaphysics are to be ransacked to extract a defence from such materials, let him go to the bar of the King's bench in England, and debate the matter there. But though another man may have cause to complain of the want of witnesses, the present defendant has none. He does not deny the charge: he does not say that he has any witnesses to examine, or that, if he has, he cannot procure their attendance; he does not distinctly say, that he has any evidence to produce; his affidavit is modestly conceived in these words, "that any evidence which deponent could procure, relative to deponent's hand-writing, conduct or character do arise in the city of Dublin and not elsewhere, and that he hath no means whereby he could be certain of, or compel the attendance of witnesses in the city of London, necessary for his defence."

I shall not observe farther upon this affidavit than to remark that it does not qualify a man to embody in his cause the liberty of the country, and to call himself the champion of the people.

If there are imperfections in this act of parliament, they may be rectified; but are we to refuse obedience to an act, as long as it is capable of being amended? It will mortify the vanity of those who have been so loud in observing on the omission to provide bail, to tell them that the observation did not originate with them. I hope it may be remedied, but certainly not without some difficulty and consideration; but as to the empty declamation about the repeal of the Habeas Corpus act, it is idle and preposterous; and every act that makes an arrest lawful which was not so before, may be as well called a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act. It never was the intention of that act to discharge a person who was lawfully arrested; for the liberty of the subject does not depend upon freedom from arrest, but in having the cases clearly and distinctly defined, in which he may be liable to it. The defendant is not in custody under a warrant of commitment. Indicted of a crime in England, he will have the full benefit in that country of the Habeas Corpus act. He is offered the same advantages here, and he disclaims the favour; and yet in his progress to an English judge and an English jury, his situation is compared to that of an unfortunate prince who was hurried to Paris, and executed at midnight. It does not become counsel for the crown thus to anticipate his conviction, and I trust the eloquence of his advocate has hurried him beyond his own view of the subject.

You will recollect that by the stat. 10 Chas. 1st, a man guilty of an accessorial offence in England, the principal felony having been committed in Ireland, might be tried in the country where the principal felon was convicted; although the accessorial offence was committed in England: and from the hour of the enactment of this law to the present moment, no instance has occurred of any difficulty under the act, nor any question on the severity of the want of compulsory process to bring over witnesses. A criminal seldom relies upon the testimony of reluctant witnesses, whose attendance can only be had by the strength of legal process. But what is the case of a man whose defence depends upon hand writing? It must be known to his most intimate friends, and they are the persons who can most accurately depose to his conduct and character; and can he say he wants a compulsory process to prove such facts? It is evident, then, that all the severity which has been expatiated upon, is not to be found in this case; and all the defendant has to complain of is, the lenity and indulgence with which he has been hitherto treated. He has been cruelly deprived of the honourable character of a martyr, and left in the humble situation of a man accused of a crime, and unwilling to take his trial.

Whether the offence in this case be bailable or not, matters little upon this argument, but in 2 Hale, 133, it is said that where there is an indictment for a bailable offence, no bail can be taken before a plea to the indictment. Therefore, upon the whole of the case, I trust you will be of opinion that there has been no severity; that the defendant has had every indulgence and attention consistent with the due administration of justice; that under the words, "felons and other malefactors," all offences are included; that a libel is an atrocious offence; that you will disappoint the intention of the legislature, if the act be not carried into full operation; that a libeller is that description of person upon which the law was peculiarly called upon to attach; and that the amendments in the latter statutes, were intended to remedy the evil which the former were not sufficiently comprehensive to embrace.

It is said, that public justice may be satisfied without proceeding against the defendant; that a man residing in Ireland could not publish in England, without having assistants there. "Prosecute them in all directions, satisfy public justice, even to revenge; but let the author escape, whoever he may be." I can well conceive, my lord, that the author who committed the crime, never meant that, the punishment should extend to himself. But shall the angry law break the weapon in pieces, and let loose the hand which directed its execution? It would be as inconsistent with law as with public feeling to do so—to prosecute those who acted in obedience to the orders of the libeller, and yet suffer him to escape.

It has also been alleged that animadversion upon public subjects is a public right. Within certain bounds, I admit it. But no man is to make public discussion, a pretence for putting forth private malice and resentment. The honest feelings of individuals are not to be made the sport of every idle calumniator who seeks his own repose in the afflictions of others; if he disseminates poison, he must answer for the consequence, and may be asked, "who subjected the actions of honest and honourable men to such a tribunal as thou art? Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Cease thy iniquitous inquisition, judge not lest thou shouldst be judged." Such is the language of common sense, such is the language of the law. The slanderer should be delivered over to the punishment he deserves.—Thus will you satisfy the law, and preserve the constitution; and, acting with even and unshaken hand, teach the body of the people this salutary lesson, that as the weakest man is strong when he is upheld by the law, so the strongest man is weak when he presumes to resist it.

[The arguments on both sides having closed here, the Court reserved its judgment for the following Thursday, Jan. 31.]

Court of King's Bench, Dublin,

Thursday, January 31st.

Mr. Justice Daly.—This case comes before the Court, upon the application of Mr Justice Johnson; who has been brought before us by virtue of a writ of Habeas Corpus, directed to a person who holds him in custody, and who has made a return to the writ. By that return it appears, that Mr. Justice Johnson stands indicted in the county of Middlesex, for publishing a libel upon his excellency the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, lord Redesdale, lord high chancellor of Ireland, and Mr. Justice Osborne, one of the judges of this court. It appears that upon this indictment lord Ellenborough, the chief justice of England, has issued a warrant for the apprehension of the prisoner, in the common form, and directed to the proper officer. It appears that this warrant has been carried over to Ireland, and has been endorsed by a magistrate of the county of Dublin; and, under the authority of that endorsement, the prisoner has been arrested in his house at Milltown, in the county of Dublin. From the moment that this warrant reached Ireland, and received the endorsement of a magistrate here, if it has any efficacy whatsoever, it derives it from an act passed in the last session of parliament, and from the 4th section of that act. [Here the learned judge stated the third and fourth sections.]

The prisoner has applied to this Court to be discharged, contending that his case is not within the purview of this law. It seems that this act of parliament is not a new conception of the legislature; its provisions appear to be taken from other acts of parliament passed in Great-Britain, to remedy the same inconveniences which this act is intended to remedy. To entitle us, therefore, to decide whether this application be well-founded, we are to see, in the first place, how the law stood before the first of these acts were made; secondly, what were the mischiefs intended to be remedied thereby; and thirdly, we are, if we can do so by fair construction of the law, to give it such an interpretation, as to make the remedy co-extensive with the mischiefs.

First, as to how stood the law before the 23rd Geo. 2nd, chap. 16, was made. Before that law was enacted, an important defect in the administration of criminal justice pervaded England; no person could be seized under the ordinary process of justice, except within the local jurisdiction which had cognizance of his crime. This was a defect, so far as it concerned the ordinary process of law, co-extensive with every crime, capital or otherwise, within the cognizance of English jurisprudence. There was, indeed, an extraordinary mode of aiding the administration of justice; namely, arrests per mandatum Regis; usually exercised by issuing the warrant of the secretary of state. But this was a remedy far from being co-extensive with the mischief, because it could only be obtained in one part of the kingdom; and, what is material to the present argument, it could only be obtained in capital cases; and even in those cases to which it was applicable, it could seldom be obtained with that celerity which justice required. It was then with regard to capital cases an insufficient remedy; all other cases were utterly without any remedy whatsoever. The defect then was a defect pervading the general administration of criminal justice in England, there being an inadequate remedy in capital cases, and cases of an inferior description being utterly unprovided for. It is natural to imagine, that when the legislature provided a remedy, it intended that remedy should be co-extensive with the mischief; and those acts of parliament must receive such a construction, if it be possible for fair interpretation to give it to them. Upon looking into those acts of parliament (I mean those which preceded the present act) I cannot have a doubt upon my mind that it was their intention to forward and make effectual the administration of justice upon every crime, great and small, to be found within the limits of English jurisprudence.

The first of these statutes is the 23rd Geo. 2nd, chap. 16. What does it say? That if any person against whom a legal warrant shall be issued, shall escape or go into another jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for the magistrate to endorse, &c.; the words are general, they are applicable to every case on which a warrant can issue, that is, every crime; and indeed it is not on the part of the application contended, that this act of parliament is confined to any distinct class of crimes. The next is the 24th Geo. 2nd, chap. 55, which gives the remedy against such persons as shall reside or be within the foreign jurisdiction, before warrant granted, without escaping or going out of the jurisdiction where the crime was committed, after warrant granted. This act is co-extensive with the former act as to crime.

The next act of parliament which I shall notice is the 13th of the present reign, of which, so far as that law goes to regulate between country and country, the present act is nearly a transcript; and after examining the scope of both those laws, I draw this broad conclusion, that it was the intention of both acts to put each of the three distinct parts of the United Kingdom in the same state with respect to each other, in which the several counties of England had before been placed with respect to each other, for the advancement of criminal justice; and my reasons for thinking so are these:

First, the mischief was the same, a defect in the general administration of justice, applicable to every crime so far as concerned the ordinary administration of justice; an inadequate remedy existing here, as it did between county and county, in capital cases, namely, a state warrant, but no remedy whatsoever for inferior offences; the defect arose precisely from the same source, it was simply a defect of jurisdiction with an inadequate provision as to cases capital, but no provision whatsoever as to inferior offences; and it is fair to suppose, that the legislature, in framing the act now before us, intended that the remedy should be co-extensive with the mischief; and we are bound to give it that extensive operation, if we can do so by fair interpretation. [Here the learned judge stated such parts of the act as are material.] Can words be found in the English language more comprehensive than those which I have now read? If any person against whom a warrant shall issue for any crime or offence against the laws of England, shall escape, go into, reside, or be in any place in Ireland, it shall and may be lawful, &c. Can words more plainly include every species of offence to be found within the limits of English jurisprudence? Indeed it seems to be admitted in argument by the counsel for the prisoner, that if we are to interpret this law, without reference to any thing but what is to be found within the enacting part of it, it must receive the construction contended for on the part of the crown. But several objections have been taken to this construction, upon grounds which I shall state as I go along, and which I think have been fully refuted by the counsel for the crown. The first objection is founded on the word "escape," which is to be found in the title and the preamble of the act; and it is contended that the scope of the act is confined to persons who having been personally within a jurisdiction, have committed crimes there, and escaped therefrom; that this is to be gathered from the title and the preamble so worded, and that the enacting part is to be controlled by them, however plain and obvious the words of the enacting part may be. But if this be a rule for the interpretation of an act of parliament, I have heard it for the first time in this argument. I hold the true rule to be, that where the enacting part of a law is obscure or doubtful, it may receive explanation from the preamble, from the title, or even from external circumstances; but where the words, as here, are plain and obvious, they cannot be controlled in their operation by any other circumstance. What are the words? "if any person shall escape, go into, reside, or be, in any place of that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland;" if the scope of this act of parliament be to make the remedy co-extensive with the mischief, I defy the ingenuity of man to find other words which can satisfy that intent so plainly and clearly as those words do. The mischief was a defect of ordinary process extending to every crime; what is the natural remedy? An effectual process, extending the same length. If then, a crime may be committed in a jurisdiction, within which the criminal never set his foot, and who yet may be the sole perpetrator of the crime, I ask, can the intent of the act of parliament be satisfied by the construction contended for by the counsel for the prisoner? But it is clear that the most enormous crimes may be committed in this manner. Poison may be conveyed in this manner through an innocent medium, and life may be destroyed by that poison in a place where the murderer never set his foot. Poison to the mind may be so conveyed, as well as poison to the body; and the most innocent and respectable characters may be blasted in places which the calumniator never saw. The most extensive mischiefs may be brought upon the public in this manner; tumults and disturbances may be excited by publications, in places where the name and the person of the author of such publications were alike unknown. If then the construction contended for by the prisoner's counsel be adopted, we exclude from the provisions of this important law, crimes of the most enormous complexion, and the most mischievous tendency, if perpetrated in a particular way; and we do so by rejecting the natural meaning of words, and interpreting them in a forced and unnatural manner.

The next objection is, that this act of parliament extends only to cases of felony, and does not include what the counsel for the defendant call minor offences, and that therefore the offence of libel is not comprehended within it. They who make this objection admit that the words of the act of parliament may be interpreted, by fair construction, to extend to every species of crime. But they say, that if it be construed to extend to any misdemeanor, it must be construed to extend to all; and if it be so construed, then it will operate to repeal an important clause in the Habeas Corpus act by a side wind. The clause they allude to, is the 12th clause in the English Habeas Corpus law, which prohibits the sending any subject of England out of the realm of England into foreign places. But the legislature has in this act of parliament spoken plainly and clearly; it intends to remedy a defect of the utmost magnitude in the administration of justice, a defect most glaring in minor offences, for before this act passed, minor offences were utterly without remedy; but it was otherwise with respect to capital offences, for capital offenders might be transmitted by a state warrant without the aid of this act from one country to the other, and I believe no instance can be stated in which such a warrant was refused. If then the construction contended for by the prisoner's counsel be adopted, it will render the act in a great measure unoperative, indeed almost a dead letter; for their construction confines it to cases where it is scarcely requisite, and withdraws it from those which stand completely in need of it. No doubt it does vary in some degree, so far as relates to Great Britain, that clause in the Habeas Corpus law; but the language it uses is so clear and explicit, that it is impossible to mistake it. The legislature also seems to have maturely weighed the benefits to be derived from that breach of the Habeas Corpus law, against the mischiefs which would have existed were it to have remained unvaried. It cannot be forgotten that when the English Habeas Corpus law was enacted, Ireland had not the benefit of the Habeas Corpus law; the grievance then was, that persons might be removed by the authority of the crown from England, where the subject could have the benefits of the Habeas Corpus act, into Ireland, or other places, where he had no such protection, and there might be illegally detained—for the words of the act are for preventing illegal imprisonments beyond the seas. But the reason for retaining that clause is now completely removed so far as relates to Ireland; for this country has the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, and were the government of England to take advantage of this variation, and send a person in custody to Ireland, if the imprisonment were illegal, he would be relieved by the Irish Habeas Corpus act; and the legislature has, in my mind, by this act of parliament, promoted the due administration of justice without infringing at all upon the liberty of the subject.

In support of this objection too an attempt is made to force the term "malefactor" from its general meaning to confine it to a particular class of offences; its general meaning is obvious to every one; it comprehends all evil-doers, and the act of parliament evidently uses it as a general term, including all offenders not comprehended in the word felons; this is the plain and obvious construction of the word malefactor, and it is likewise that construction which renders the operation of the act of parliament complete. But it is said, that the term malefactor was introduced for Scotland in order to include offences there of the same description with felony, felony being a term unknown in that law. If that were the case, would the legislature have used a general term, comprehending all offences, and not have made use of terms descriptive of the particular offences meant to be included? Such terms must of course exist in the Scottish law; no person pretends that malefactor in its vernacular sense, has not the same meaning in Scotland that it has elsewhere; so that if this construction be adopted, malefactor, which is inoperative here, and not permitted to have any meaning, will in Scotland, where it is to operate, include all offences whatever; and thus the same law couched in the same words, will have a different meaning in one part of the United Kingdom from that which it has in the other.

It is also said, strike out the words "escape" and "go into," and the act will bear the meaning contended for by the crown; but to this it was well answered, that if it were not intended to attach upon persons who can commit crimes in places where they had never been, the two first words, "escape and go into," would be sufficient to satisfy the act; for how could a man in such circumstances, come under it, unless he escaped and went into Ireland? therefore the two last words must be operative and independent of the others; and if you strike out the words "reside and be," you diminish the operation of the act. But then it is said, strike out the words, "escape" and "go into," and then the other words will fully contain the meaning contended for by the crown; this is admitted, but if you strike out any, strike out those which are least operative, and in which the others merge.

But another construction is attempted, the four descriptions are suffered to remain; the two first are applied to the person, the two last to the place; but if that be the true construction then the two last descriptions, "reside and be," are introduced for a most notable purpose indeed; they are brought in as a sort of finger-post to the officer, intimating to him, that he is to execute his warrant upon the criminal, in the place only where he happens to be. In short, I have not heard a single construction of this act of parliament, except that which gives it full and complete operation, which is not constrained, unnatural, and bordering upon absurdity.

Another argument is, that the construction contended for on the part of the crown, makes this act of parliament a law ex post facto as to crime; but supposing it were clearly so, still if an ex post facto law be enacted by the legislature, it must be obeyed; but in fact it is no such thing; it is neither prospective nor retrospective as to crime; it has not added a single crime to the criminal code, but it is clearly prospective as to that on which it is intended to operate—regulation of process and administration of justice.

Another objection is, that it appears by the affidavit of the prisoner, that he has been a length of time out of England; that from a period previous to the publication of the libel down to the present moment, he has constantly resided in Ireland; and therefore it is said, that supposing him to have procured the libel to be published in England, he is not within the jurisdiction of the English law. And to give additional weight to this argument, it is said, that there is not necessarily a failure of justice; that the crime need not remain unpunished, for he is liable to a prosecution in Ireland; and, farther, it has been broadly laid down, that if a person procures a libel to be published in England through a medium which he knows will circulate through every part of the empire, if such person be prosecuted for the publishing, we will suppose in England, and convicted, he can never be tried again in any other part of the empire, unless he does some new act amounting to a republication. With respect to the prisoner's absence from England, if that forms a valid objection to the jurisdiction of that country, the prisoner will have the benefit of it at the bar of the English court; but I deny the position to be law, and I state this to be law, without fear of contradiction, that if any subject of the king be a trespasser against his majesty's peace, within any particular jurisdiction of his united kingdom, whether he be so in his own person, or through the medium of others, he is answerable for the breach of that peace to that particular jurisdiction, whenever he can be found there. I do not recognize the distinction which has been taken at the bar, between a subject of the law and a subject of the crown. As a subject of the crown, he is bound not to infringe the laws of any part of the United Kingdom, let him reside where he will; in treason it is admitted he cannot, and for my own part I cannot see the distinction as to this point between treason and any other crime, except in the degree of offence and the punishment annexed to it. The duty of obedience to every law, from high treason to the most petty offence, flows from the same source—the duty which the subject owes to his sovereign.

But it is said that he may be tried here; no doubt he may, if there be evidence to convict him; but is it common sense to say, that a conviction for infringing the law in the county of Dublin will make satisfaction for a similar offence in the county of Middlesex? and is it not monstrous, that he who is charged with a particular crime in Middlesex, shall be permitted to say—"you have it in your power to charge me with a similar offence in the county of Dublin, and, therefore, you shall try me in Dublin, and not in Middlesex; the extension of the crime with which I am charged, gives me the privilege of choosing my own tribunal, and it is natural for me to fix upon that where I have the best chance of escaping conviction?"

Upon the whole of this case, I am of opinion, that the natural and obvious construction of this act of parliament is that which is contended for on the part of the crown. It is that construction alone which can give it due operation, and make it a complete remedy for the defects which existed before it became a law; and my opinion therefore is, that the prisoner's case comes within it, and that he is not entitled to be discharged.

Mr. Justice Day.—It must be admitted that the present question, in whatever point of view it be taken, is one of the most vital importance. On the one hand it concerns most essentially the liberty of every subject in the United Kingdom from the highest to the lowest; on the other hand, the acknowledged object of the statute before us is, ne maleficia remaneant impunita. On the one hand occurs a question which touches the most precious birth-right of a British subject; on the other, an object of great public utility. And, therefore, while I readily admit in limine that it is our duty so to interpret the statute as shall best repress the mischief and advance the remedy, I claim it to be conceded to me that the Court in its construction is bound to keep steadily in view, as its polar star, the principles of civil liberty, and not to push or strain a construction which may trench thereupon an iota beyond the strict necessity of the case.

In construing this statute I shall adopt the course pursued by my brother Daly, and consider, 1. How the law stood before the passing of the act. 2. What was the mischief which the law had not at all, or had but imperfectly provided for. And 3. It will then be my duty so to construe the statute as to make the remedy co-extensive with the mischief.

1. At common law there was no power in the state but parliament that had a right to send any subject out of the realm against his will. It resulted as a natural and necessary corollary from personal liberty, that every British subject had a right to remain in his own country till driven from it by the sentence of the law. The great charter accordingly declared (for it is but a declaration of the common law) that “nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur — aut exuletur nisi per iudicium parium vel per legem terræ.” And lord Coke’s comment upon Exuletur (2 Inst. 47.) is in these words:—“This is a beneficial law and is construed benignly; and, therefore, the king cannot send a subject of England against his will to serve him out of the realm; and not even to Ireland to serve him as deputy.” And give me leave to add, nor could he be sent out of Ireland into England against his will; for as wide as the king’s dominions extend (save only Scotland) so wide is the dominion of the common law.

But though the law was thus clearly and unquestionably established in the point, it became necessary in consequence of the arbitrary practices of the house of Stuart to reassert it in this as well as in other important particulars touching the liberty of the subject, and to throw up fresh fences and new lines of protection around it. Accordingly in the great Habeas Corpus act of England (31 Car. 2nd, c. 12) we find that important right of the subject insisted upon with a jealous and an ardent anxiety, and as it were consecrated to all futurity in the following words: “And for preventing illegal imprisonments beyond seas, be it enacted that no subject of this realm shall or may be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, or any place beyond seas; and that every such imprisonment is hereby enacted and adjudged [i. e. declared] to be illegal”—under the heaviest penalties that I know inflicted by any existing statute short of death. That statute however provides (s. 16,) “that if at any time any person residing in this realm shall have committed any capital offence in Scotland or Ireland, or any of the plantations where he ought to be tried for this offence, such person may be sent to such place to receive such trial; in such manner as the same might have been used before the making of this act.”

This latter clause we see recognizes a practice theretofore in use of transmitting capital prisoners to be tried in Ireland; a practice stated by the attorney-general to have originated in the prerogative, but which I rather hold to have been a wholesome encroachment upon the common law. Mr. Justice Blackstone lays it down broadly and without qualification, “that no power on earth except the authority of parliament can send any subject of England” [and give me leave again to add any subject of Ireland] “out of the land against his will; no, not even a criminal.” (1 Comm. 137) But this I hold to be more curious at this day, than necessary to the present discussion; because even at that period of just jealousy of the crown and noble ardour for the liberty of the subject, it was thought expedient to legalize the transmittal of capital offenders from England for trial to the scene of their crimes. And upon that law we find the King’s-bench of England have repeatedly acted. 2 Ventr. 314; Stra. 848; Fitzgib. 111, S. C.

In Ireland the common law remained unaltered by any express provision; and it is remarkable that when the Habeas Corpus act was obtained in Ireland in 1782, the whole of that important provision “for preventing illegal imprisonment beyond seas,” was most unaccountably omitted. I say unaccountably; because if a confidence in the house of Brunswick were (as suggested from the bar) the cause of this omission, the generous love of freedom which has hitherto characterized that house would have furnished an equal argument against abridging any of the provisions of that other Magna Charta. However a reciprocal practice of transmittals in capital cases obtained here, if not springing from the prerogative, yet sanctioned by that salutary provision of the English Habeas Corpus act, by the comitas gentium which has established the practice among all civilized states, though utterly unconnected, and by sound and substantial policy; a practice analogous to that of back-warrants between county and county which had long obtained in Ireland before this statute, and so settled amongst us that it is actually recognized as the law of Ireland by 8 G. 1st, c. 9, a temporary Irish statute since made perpetual.

2. Such then was the state of the law in the present point at the time of the Union. The interests of the two islands becoming altogether identified by that measure, and it being material to create a co-operation between them in the administration of criminal justice, the common legislature conceived that it resulted from and was conformable to their reciprocal obligations, and common interest, to provide that neither island should continue an asylum for the fugitives of the other. That policy had already been long acted upon as between county and county in England, and afterwards as between England and Scotland, and no doubt the wholesome effects thereof had been thoroughly proved and felt [See 5 Edw. 3rd, c. 11; the 23 Geo. 2nd, c. 26; and 24 Geo. 2nd, c. 55; and see 13 Geo. 3rd, c. 31, Brit.]. The case of capital offenders we have seen had already been provided for, I will not say in the most constitutional manner, or with sufficient regard to the rights and accommodation of the prisoner; but I join Mr. Attorney-general in challenging universal experience to say whether a single instance was ever known of a person capitally transgressing in one island, and daring with impunity to show his head and go at large in the other. I cannot, therefore, concur with the counsel for the prisoner in limiting the operation of any part of this statute to capital offenders. Their case was not the mischief which pressed itself upon the attention of the legislature; because the secretary of state's warrant had been found in capital cases to answer sufficiently the purposes of the crown; and on the part of the subject no complaint had been made of any oppressive exercise of that process in such cases. The real and urgent mischief was, that an offender who might commit a dangerous or malignant misdemeanor (suppose a seditious conspiracy or a traitorous and foul libel), or perhaps a very criminal clergyable felony (as a larceny to a great amount) in one country, was sure, by withdrawing himself into the other, to brave and set at defiance all pursuit or prosecution. He was out of the legal jurisdiction; he was beyond the reach of any known process; and he enjoyed, in unmolested security, the fruits as well as the infamy of his crime. The mischief is clearly and distinctly recited in the preamble to the third section of this statute: "Whereas it may often happen that felons and other malefactors make their escape from one island into the other whereby their offences remain unpunished." Now it is a maxim in law, that the preamble of a statute must be taken to be true. Try then the question by that test, and it will be found that the view of the legislature in that preamble could not have been confined to the escape of capital offenders only, because it would not be true to say that capital offences thereby remained unpunished. "Felons and other malefactors" are terms as comprehensive as the English vocabulary can furnish, to express all degrees of offenders from the most trivial trespass up to the most disastrous treason. The legal import of "malefactor," is offender, in its most general sense; but here it is used to import specifically a trespasser, because every malefactor other than felon can be but a trespasser. I remember in the first argument of this case at my lord's house we were referred by the prisoner's counsel to the statutum de malefactoribus in parvis* to prove that the legislature invariably apply the word "malefactor," to one guilty of the majora crimina. But upon reference to that statute, and to another of the same reign (1 Westm. c. 20.) it will be found that "malefactor" in the one, and its Norman synonyme "meffesor" in the other are used in the limited sense of trespasser, and are so translated in every edition of the statutes. So also lord Hale (2 P. C. 136, 140) uses the word "malefactor" repeatedly to signify a trespasser or bailable offender. But the flippant answer to all this is, that the language and the laws of our English Justinian are become obsolete, and an appeal is made in a court of law, from the authority of Hale to that of South, of Roscommon and of Shakespeare!—But, if a doubt can still remain, look at the preamble of the fourth section which refers to the antecedent, and is but an abstract of it, and you will find, for "felons and other malefactors," a language of the most comprehensive and unequivocal import substituted: "and, for remedy of the like inconveniency, by the escape into Ireland of persons guilty of crimes in Great Britain, be it enacted," &c.—The statute then proceeds to enact, in both clauses, in the same general and comprehensive language: "for remedy whereof, be it enacted, that if any person, against whom a warrant shall be issued for any crime or offence against the laws of Ireland, shall escape, &c. into Great Britain," or vice versa.

I feel that much time has been wasted in ascertaining the mischief in contemplation of the legislature as between the two islands; it floats upon the very surface of both those clauses, and the mere reading of them must satisfy any direct and unsophisticated understanding, that this reciprocity of process is not meant to be limited to any particular degree or order of offence. And I cannot but regret, that counsel for the prisoner should dilute, with such a milk-and-water argument, a case too strong to stand in need of sophistry or forced and unnatural construction.—The rest of Mr. Johnson's powerful and impressive argument might disdain to borrow aid from so feeble an associate. For myself, I have no doubt, upon a combined view of the title of the statute, the preambles of the third and fourth clauses which recite the mischief, the body of those two clauses which reciprocates the remedy, and the reason and policy which called for them, that the grievance felt by the legislature was the escape of offenders generally (whether "felons or other malefactors," whether high or low in the scale of offences) from the jurisdiction wherein they transgressed, and who thus eluded justice. The statute, by new and constitutional regulations, facilitates the arrest and transmittal of capital offenders, who were before liable to both. It takes them out of the hands of the secretary of state and a king's messenger, whose authority had been warmly questioned in an early period of this reign, and who might detain their prisoner till it suited their own convenience that he should travel: It puts him into the hands of the known ministers of the law, the justice of the peace and the constable, who are commanded to transmit him forthwith: And it extends, for the first time, the process to clergyable felonies and misdemeanors.

But it is objected for the prisoner, that had the legislature meant to include bailable offences within the operation of that part of the statute, they would have provided means for bailing the offender in the island to which he had escaped; and the rather, as the subject of bail was so immediately before their eyes. The legislature (say his counsel) have studiously and accurately provided in the case of bailable offences, as between county and county: and is it to be imagined, in a case of infinitely greater hardship, as between island and island, that they would not have acted with the same tender and constitutional concern for the rights and convenience of the subject, had not bailable offences been utterly excluded from their contemplation? To this I answer, by admitting at once that such provision could not have been accidentally omitted. It was impossible, where bail was so carefully provided in the same statute, in a case wherein the inconvenience and hazard of the sea did not exist, where that same law had been acted upon upwards of thirty years between England and Scotland without amendment or complaint, it is impossible that such omission could have been by accident or ex improviso. But, instead of subscribing to those eloquent but misplaced effusions upon the liberty of the subject and the rights of man, which enlivened this dull and dry argument, or instead of inferring from such omission, a construction militating with the letter, spirit, policy, and clear meaning of the statute, I draw from it a powerful, and, in my mind, an unanswerable argument, to prove, that escape is of the essence, and forms an indispensable ingredient in the composition of every case to bring it within the statute. I would not, of course, be understood to use the words escape and fugitive in their strict and legal meaning as if an escape had been effected from prison or arrest, or a catchpole were at the party's heels. I apply the words in a more enlarged and general sense, to all who, by withdrawing from the jurisdiction of their offences, decline to render themselves amenable to justice. It is observable, that the very title of the statute presumes guilt in the objects of it; it is, to render more easy the arrest, not of persons charged with offences, but of offenders who escape; thus inferring, as the law warrants, actual guilt from the flight. Flight, or an escape from arrest for felony, is an acknowledgment of guilt; and, though the prisoner be acquitted of the principal felony, he shall forfeit his goods and chattels, if the jury find that he fled. Now, though flight to avoid arrest for a misdemeanor, be not attended with such extreme consequences, still the principle is the same; every man, who is accused, is bound to submit himself to the judgment of the law; and, whether it be a trespass, or whether it be a felony with which he is charged, it may, with truth, be said of him who shrinks from trial—facinus fatetur qui judicium fugit. I consider a person who is arrested after escape, quasi in execution. Public justice demands his presence where only he is responsible, and the charge can be investigated; and, if it be easy under this statute to imagine a case of hardship, it should be recollected, that the party has no right to complain of a hardship, the legal consequence of his own criminal conduct. If it be a bed of thorns upon which he reclines, it is a bed of his own making. Thus, then, concurring as I do with the rest of the Court, that bailable offences, no less than felonies, are within the mischief of the statute, if we apply it to the case of one who never was in the country where the crime was committed, who never could have fled, escaped, or migrated from it, who is to be found at his post, ready to meet his accuser, who is amenable to process, trial, and punishment for his offences, where by law he is responsible,—if we apply the statute to such a case, we impute to the legislature a wanton and outrageous violation of the most sacred birthright of a British subject—we charge them with having, not accidentally but by design and premeditation, stript the subject of his common law right of bail, in bailable cases, guaranteed and vainly hoped to have been perpetuated to him by the Habeas Corpus act. Whereas, if you limit its operation to such as withdraw from the country where they committed the crime, and thus elude the punishment which justice and the public interest demand, you vindicate the statute, and its author, for the omission of bail in the second part of it, and show that he acted in strict conformity to the principles of the criminal law, and of the constitution.

3. I now come to the construction of the statute which enacts the remedy; though I feel that much of this has been anticipated under the two preceding heads of my argument. The act is compounded of three British statutes, and consists of two parts: the first part establishing a co-operation by criminal process between county and county in Ireland analogous to the already existing statute law of England; the second establishing the like between island and island, such as has obtained for many years between England and Scotland; and both purporting to bring to justice such offenders as, by quitting the scene of their guilt, would "remain unpunished." As far as the title of the statute may have any weight, nothing can be more expressive of the object:—"An act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from one county to another." Then comes the preamble to the first part which is confined to counties;—"Whereas it frequently happens, that persons against whom warrants are granted by justices of peace in Ireland escape into other counties out of their jurisdiction; and it may also happen that persons having committed offences in some county in Ireland may reside or be in some other county out of the jurisdiction in which such offence was committed, whereby such offenders may easily avoid being punished." This preamble plainly refers to two different kinds of escape: the one after warrant granted, and to elude it, which is the limited legal sense of escape—the other, a withdrawing out of the county before any warrant issued, and even without any direct purpose of avoiding a prosecution, which in a colloquial sense would also be an escape. That such is the true construction of this preamble will appear by reference to the two British statutes from which this first part of the act is taken. The first is a single clause of 23 G. 2, c. 26, s. 11, which enacted, "that in case any person against whom a legal warrant shall be issued shall escape or go into any other county out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting such warrant, it shall be lawful for any justice of any county to which such person shall have gone or escaped to endorse such warrant, and to cause the person against whom the same shall have been issued to be apprehended and sent to the justice who granted the warrant, or to some other justice of the county from whence such person shall have gone or escaped." This clause among other defects was soon found to have reached but half the mischief, namely the case of persons escaping out of the county after warrant issued. The legislature, therefore, in the following session, amended the clause by the 24 G. 2, c. 55, which recites that whole clause, and adds, "And whereas such offender may reside or be in some other county out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting such warrant before the granting the same, and without escaping or going out of the county after such warrant granted." And then the statute proceeds to rectify that omission in the very words of the act before us, by adding in the enacting part, those words, "reside or be," to the former words, "escape, or go into," used in the 23 G. 2. It is plain then, considering what the defect was which the 24 G. 2 professed to amend, that those words, "reside or be," were introduced to meet that casus improvisus; to provide for the case of a person who might withdraw from the county where he committed the crime, and "reside or be" in another before any warrant granted against him.

Thus, then, reddendo singula singulis, the purview of this part of our statute may be fairly paraphrased as follows; "Be it enacted that in case any person (having committed an offence in any county in Ireland) against whom a warrant shall be issued by any justice of the said county shall (after such warrant issued) escape or go into, or (before the granting such warrant) reside or be in any other county, it shall be lawful for any justice of the county where such person shall escape, go into, reside, or be, to endorse his name on such warrant," &c. This in my judgment is the natural and plain interpretation of the clause, commensurate precisely with and going the full length of the mischief, and one not open to some strong objections urged against other constructions. The plain object of this part of the act is, to render amenable to justice, men who by quitting the scene of their crime, whether before or after warrant issued, and shifting into another jurisdiction, would "remain unpunished." 2 Hawk. 183, 6th edit.

But when we come to the second part of the statute regulating the co-operation between island and island, it would seem as if the legislature had narrowed somewhat their view as to the mischief to be remedied. The only mischief recited in the third section, is the eluding punishment by escape; every other migration from the one island to the other, which had been with a minute precision recited as from one county to another in the preamble to the first part of the statute, is in this preamble omitted, or rather dropt. "And whereas felons and other malefactors may make their escape from one island to the other whereby their offences remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision for apprehending such offenders and transmitting them into the island in which their offences were committed; for remedy whereof, &c." And lest any doubt should remain that such was the mischief, and such alone, which the legislature had it in contemplation as between island and island to remedy, the fourth section recites that mischief in still more pointed terms: "And for remedy of the like inconvenience by the escape into Ireland of persons guilty of crimes in Great Britain." The obvious motive to this variation of expression was, that the legislature meant to confine that part of the statute which regulates between the two islands strictly to escapes made (whether before or after warrant issued) for the purpose of eluding justice. Now the consequence of such narrowed construction of this part will be, that, as between island and island, minor and trivial trespasses will in effect be shut out from the sphere and scope of the statute, and none will fall within its practical operation, but offences of an higher order. Government it cannot be feared will interfere but in cases which concern the state, or in the majora crimina; and as to those paltry misdemeanors and mere personal injuries, which have so excited the sensibility and alarm of counsel, is it to be seriously apprehended that an offender to shun the event of such a prosecution would "escape" or "go and reside" beyond sea? or if he did that a prosecutor would for a petty vengeance incur the expense and inconvenience of bringing him back? Such appears to have been Ruffhead's construction of the 13th, Geo. 3rd, c. 31, from which the second part of our statute is taken; and I cannot concur in the reflection cast upon his marginal abstract of that statute, referred to from the bar not as legislative authority but as the opinion (valeat quantum) of an editor, who from his learned preface, and his numerous and useful references to the reporters appears to have possessed extensive erudition, and to have been deeply versed in the statute law of England. But what closes in my mind all question upon this point, is the following passage to be found in the later edition of Blackstone's Commentaries—a work not more distinguished for its lucid order and classic elegance, than as an authority in all legal and constitutional questions. After touching upon back-warrants which had long prevailed in England (and we know also in Ireland) without law, and referring to the two British statutes of Geo. 2nd, which legalized them, the learned commentator thus concludes: "And now by statute 13th, Geo. 3rd, c. 31, any warrant for apprehending an English offender who may have escaped into Scotland, and vice versa, may be endorsed and executed by the local magistrates, and the offender conveyed back to that part of the United Kingdom in which such offence was committed." 4 Comm. 292.

I confess those imperfections in the second part of the statute do not strike my short sight, which are relied on with such confidence on the one hand, which with such unjust facility are conceded on the other, and in which counsel on both sides find such convenient refuge from the objections urged against their respective constructions of the statute. It probably would be more to be desired than practicable to establish a reciprocal power of bailing between three countries differing so essentially in their laws; but supposing no such difficulty to exist, I hold the statute (which was introduced by a lawyer high in office and eminent in character at the English bar), to have been as well and maturely considered in its provisions, as it is salutary and politic in its principle. It has been in both its parts the law of the land in Great Britain for many years; it has there stood the test of long experience; and it was reserved for the sagacity displayed through the present case to discover all its imperfections!

But the counsel for the crown contend that this construction is too narrow: and that the body of the statute (which is not to be controlled by the preamble) is large enough to embrace not only all fugitive offenders, but another class of offenders, namely, all such as by a constructive presence transgress in one island while they reside in the other. "Be it enacted that if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued for any crime against the laws of Ireland shall escape, go into, reside or be in Great Britain, it shall be lawful for any magistrate of the place in Great Britain where such person shall escape, go into, reside or be, to endorse such warrant, &c." And, in support of this construction, it is asserted, that this latter class of offenders would escape unpunished, if not included within the operation of the present statute.

To this extended construction several strong objections rush upon the mind. It is very true that the body or purview of a statute shall not be narrowed by a preamble, because the purview may (and often does) remedy the mischief, and do more; but it is no less true that where any doubt exists of the true meaning of the purview, the preamble is a safe and sure key to it. In the King v. Cartwright, 4, T. R. 490, the defendant was indicted for an assault upon a revenue officer, under the 9th Geo. 2nd, c. 35, s. 26, which enacts, "that for the more impartial trial of any indictment found for an assault committed upon a revenue officer, every such offence may be tried in any county in England." The defendant was found guilty on the count which stated the offence to have been committed in Surrey on the prosecutor, whom it described to be a revenue officer, and the venue was laid in Middlesex. On motion to arrest the judgment it was argued that the statute, though the words were general, was meant to extend only to assaults on officers in the execution of their office. And the Court were all of that opinion, and that "the mischiefs from a contrary determination would be intolerable." And Mr. Justice Buller, that acute and truly learned judge, did not disdain to refer to the title, as well as to other parts of the statute, to collect the intention of the legislature, and limit the generality of the enacting part.—The 15th and 16th Geo. 3rd (called the Whiteboy act) has been well referred to, on this point, from the bar. It enacts "that if any person shall between sunset and sunrise maliciously assault or injure the habitation, property, goods, or chattels of any other person, &c. he shall suffer death, &c." This clause, which if construed in the latitude which the words plainly warrant would be worthy only of Draco, has always upon reference to the judges been controlled by the title and preamble, and held applicable only to insurgents, and the tumultuous risings described in that preamble.—With respect to Robinson's case, cited by the attorney-general from 2 East, the doctrine laid down there cannot be disputed. But I confess I did not expect to hear that case likened to the present; a case, in which the language was plain and the provisions obvious, compared to one so doubtful that three judges have held one way, three more have held the contrary, and the seventh has hesitated.

The attorney-general candidly admitted that his construction renders altogether inoperative and utterly extinguishes the words "escape," "go into," and "reside;" and he will not deny that such construction ought to be preferred which gives full operation to every word. For there is not a more established rule of law and of common sense in the interpretation of a statute, than that no clause, sentence, or word, shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant, if by any other interpretation they may be made useful or pertinent, (1 Show. 108). By the construction which I submit, I have endeavoured to show that the preamble and the purview, the mischief and the remedy, are precisely commensurate, and every word in the statute is assigned a special operative meaning. But if the statute be extended to men who never visited the island in which the offence was committed, it will follow that the last of those four words "escape, go into, reside or be," would satisfy the statute; and the other three,—all very operative words, particularly the word "escape," which the legislature with a fond preference puts forward in the advanced ground of the statute, in the title, and all the preambles,—have been introduced for no purpose but to swell the train of the monosyllable "be" or only to be expunged. I am very ready to admit, that a crime may be committed, in one county or island, by a person, while he resides or happens to be in another; for instance, if a man in Dublin send a libel to Cork or London to be published, the publication is his act in Cork or London. But, that such an offender would remain unpunished, without the assistance of this statute, is a proposition which I confidently deny; because (to recur to the same instance) it would be impossible to transmit a libel from this to London, by any imaginable means, which would not amount in law to a previous publication of it in Dublin. The bare delivery of a libel to a messenger or letter-carrier, the dropping it in the Post-office, addressed even to the object of it, who would naturally conceal and not circulate a libel upon himself, any spontaneous emanation of a libel, however limited and circumscribed, amounts to a publication; and such publisher would be answerable to justice, in the jurisdiction where such inchoate act was done,* no less than in the other county or island where the libel issued from the press, and the publication became consummated, (5 Co. 126, a; 12 Co. 35, b; 1 Hawk. c. 73, s. 11; 5 Mod. 167).—The offence of sending and delivering threatening letters seems to come within the same rule and principle of law.—The other instances, by which this proposition has been attempted to be sustained, I apprehend have been as unfortunately selected. The case put of a man in Dublin administering poison in London, through the instrumentality of an unconscious and innocent person, will avail the gentlemen but little. Do they forget their own argument in another part of the case, that capital cases are already provided for, and that such a monster (unless it be still an unprovided and dispunishable case) would have been transmissible even before the statute? Nothing, too, could be less fortunate, than the cases of a person in Dublin procuring another to commit an assault, or mayhem, or perjury, or any misdemeanor in London. He is a principal (say they) in the misdemeanor; he must be tried where it was committed; and as he was not within the jurisdiction where the offence was committed, how can he be brought to justice, if an endorsed warrant shall not be allowed to reach him? but this reasoning is grounded altogether on an oversight of the law. At common law, the accessory in one county, to a felony committed in another, was not indictable in either. This miserable defect of the law, which occasioned so gross a failure of justice, demanded the interposition of the legislature; but, when it came under consideration, so cautious were they of invading that fundamental principle of the criminal law, the locality of offences and of trial, that they made the accessory triable, not in the county where the crime was committed, and the principal convicted, but in his own vicinage, in the county where the accessorial felony was committed.—So it is in the case of a trespasser. If he procure a misdemeanor to be committed in another county, whether in or out of the island, the law, it is true, makes him a principal offender; it makes him so, that justice may not be defeated or embarrassed in its efforts to reach him by the doctrine applicable to accessorial offenders; but still the law, consistent with itself, makes this accessorial principal indictable only in his own county. He could not be tried in Cork, or in London, or at all for the misdemeanor which he procured to be there committed while he resided in another jurisdiction; and your endorsed warrant would be but waste paper. After you had dragged him, by virtue of this process across the island, or across the sea, you must send him back to Dublin, if your object be to bring him to justice; for in Dublin, only, could he be tried for having procured the assault or the mayhem, or having suborned the perjury, to be committed in London. (2 Hawk. c. 5, s. 19, Doug. 796, Rex v. Gough).

I cannot, therefore, concur in this interpretation, which most unnecessarily strains the statute to cases of constructive presence. I cannot discover any class or description of offenders who will escape punishment, by limiting its operation to such as withdraw from the scene of their crime into another jurisdiction. The effect of such construction will be, to give the prosecutor an option to change the venue from the jurisdiction where the common law makes the party responsible, into another island, where the party is a stranger, where he can have no character to protect him, and where he has no compulsory means of securing the attendance of his witnesses; a construction, which public justice does not call for, and which exposes the party to very serious hazard, expense and oppression.—Acts of parliament, which are made to govern all, are presumed to be intelligible to all. No man of plain sense, unperturbed by the refinements of technical reasoning, could be at a loss to understand the objects of a clause which recites, “that malefactors often escape from one island into the other, whereby their offences remain unpunished;” and then provides “for transmitting such offenders into the island in which their offences were committed.”

Now what is the offence charged here upon the prisoner, and what are its circumstances, as appearing upon the face of the warrant, the return to the Habeas Corpus, and the affidavits made on his behalf, which, as far as they are not repugnant to that return, it is competent for him to read? A misdemeanor, charged to have been committed by the prisoner in England, while he resided in Ireland; the composing and publishing in Westminster a libel, which if composed by the prisoner, he must have composed in Ireland, which if published by the prisoner, must have been published by him in Ireland, before he could have published it in England; a libel upon the government, and certain much respected characters in Ireland, more properly triable in Ireland, where its malignity would be better understood and felt than in England; to be established, for the most part, by Irish witnesses, and for which, it is plain, that the prisoner is as open to prosecution in the county of Dublin as he is in the county of Middlesex. Then with what truth can this be said to be the case of an offender, “whose crime will remain unpunished,” if he be not transmitted to Westminster, by virtue of this endorsed warrant?

Gentlemen, on both sides, have indulged themselves in imagining cases. Give me leave to put a possible and no extravagant case, which might place all the dramatis personæ in rather an awkward predicament. Suppose the prisoner indicted also in Dublin, for publishing this libel, and that while he was in transitu to London under the present back-warrant, he, and the whole cavalcade, were overtaken at Conway, by a warrant from the lord chief justice of Ireland, backed by a Welsh justice. Suppose a scuffle to ensue between the two parties, who should have the prisoner—a classical combat for the body—and that one of either party fell in the battle—I ask whether this would be murder, manslaughter, or justifiable homicide? In other words, to which party would the carcase belong?

But we are told that the offence for which the prisoner stands indicted is, the publication of that libel in England; that this is a distinct offence from the publication of that identical libel (i. e. from the circulation of some copies of the same impression) in Ireland; and that he is answerable for those publications only to the respective tribunals of each country. I confess I did not expect to see the fictions of the law thus spread out to catch and entangle any party. It is contended that after a prisoner has been convicted of publishing, suppose a seditious libel in Dublin, and sentenced to 500*l.* fine and two years imprisonment, it would be competent for the prosecutor to convey him under an endorsed warrant, at the expiration of the two years to London, and there to try and punish him again for the same libel published in London; and then, if the prisoner survive all this, that he may be taken to Edinburgh, tried and convicted there also, and his remains perhaps transported for the publication of that identical libel in Scotland! and this is the mild and constitutional use to which a right is claimed of applying this new process, so perfectly analogous to the spirit of the boasted criminal code of this realm! I ask no other concession than this candid avowal to demonstrate the formidable purposes to which a beneficial process is convertible by this extended and comprehensive construction of these clauses. And a better mode of trying a doubtful principle or construction cannot be suggested, than by pushing it to its fair and natural consequences. Upon the ground of its oppressive consequences it was, that the Court decided against the plain words and literal construction contended for in the King v. Cartwright above cited. Upon the ground of the sanguinary consequences to which a literal construction of the Whiteboy act would lead, we always have looked for the intention of the legislature in the preamble, and construed that clause accordingly. I cannot deny that a judgment had in one island for the publication could not be pleaded in bar of an indictment for the same libel published in the other; though this, considering the present relation of the two islands, is a defect in the law of both which ought to be amended. Between county and county you may plead autrefois acquit, or autrefois convict; but not so between island and island, though we are told that they stand in reference to each other as county and county. But admitting the publication in the three capitals of the same libel to be in law distinct offences, yet surely in point of fact and in common sense that publication, whether its diffusion be limited or extended, is but one crime. The train may be laid in Westminster, and there may spring this moral mine of combustible infamy scattering fire and death in every direction; the crime it is true may be flagitious in proportion to the mischief and its extended operation; but still it is but one crime, whatever the extent may be of its ravages, whether it cross the Channel, the Tweed, or only the Thames. To say that the legislature would interfere in such a case and arm with any extraordinary process, a vindictive prosecutor to glut his resentment by multiplied prosecutions and multiplied punishments would be to make the legislature auxiliary to a malignant and implacable vengeance. The Court has no right to get out of a plain case by such refinement, and to be thus astute not in guarding but in construing away the liberty of a subject.

The construction of that branch of the statute of treasons which concerns the king's coin, is material in this part of the case. It is declared in the following words: "If a man counterfeit the king's money, and if a man bring false money into this realm counterfeit to the money of England, knowing the money to be false." It has been held, that though Ireland be distinct from the realm of England, and consequently money brought from thence may within the letter of the statute be said to be brought into the realm; yet, as the counterfeiting is punishable there by the laws of our king as well as in England, the bringing money from Ireland is no more within the statute than if it were part of England. (1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 67.)

Much might be said upon the ground that the construction contended for by the crown converts a prospective statute into an ex post facto law. It has therefore been called by counsel for the defendant an occasional act; and certainly such construction exposes the statute to that observation. But the best answer to so foul and unfounded an imputation would be, to say that the statute is not retrospective, that like the great body of our criminal code, it attaches only upon future offenders, and is not meant to act upon by-gone crimes. Will it be lightly believed, that the legislature intended to bring past offences under the grasp and scourge of this law? Every venial indiscretion of our early and thoughtless years, committed in the reciprocal intercourse between the two islands! Every assault or other misdemeanor (an instance well put from the bar) committed by an English militia officer or soldier in 1798, amidst the confusion and dismay of that calamitous period, who, instead of withdrawing to elude justice, was followed by the regret and gratitude of his fellow-subjects whom he had volunteered to save! I do not say that a case may not happen to justify an ex post facto law; but it must be a strong and cogent case, one in which the safety of the state, or its most important interests are concerned; and I add, that such a statute, though the crisis had called for it, would still be contrary to the genius, the spirit, and the practice of the British law.—It has been said, however, from the bar that this statute adds no new crime to the catalogue, and that an ex post facto law is one which makes an action criminal that at the time of doing was innocent. But this I take to be too narrow a definition. Will it be said, that sir John Fenwick's bill of attainder was not an ex post facto law, and of the most unconstitutional kind, because it created no new crime, and only acted upon new evidence?

Upon the whole, the present case wants two ingredients essential, in my apprehension, to bring any case within the meaning and spirit of the present statute; I mean escape and impunity.—The prisoner has never been in England since the publication of the alleged libel, and therefore has not escaped or withdrawn from justice; and if he be guilty, his offence is as open and exposed to prosecution and punishment in Ireland as it is in England. I will not say that the provisions of the Habeas Corpus act are not examinable and open to modification and amendment, as well as those of every other statute. But the legislature will approach that bulwark of our strength and glory with cautious and trembling hands, and will not without imperious necessity disturb a single brick of the proud fabric, which encloses within its sacred shrine the everlasting object of British gratitude and veneration. The twelfth and sixteenth clauses we have seen declare it illegal to send any man a prisoner out of the realm but a capital offender; now it was unnecessary to trench upon this inestimable privilege of a British subject farther than to make all offenders amenable to justice, whose crimes would otherwise remain unpunished. This construction makes it a salutary and constitutional statute. It acts upon the principle sanctioned and adopted by the Habeas Corpus act itself, and only extends to misdemeanors the provisions which that statute limited to capital offences. Give it the construction contended for, and you transform a wise and wholesome regulation of reciprocal police into an engine of intolerable oppression.

A great deal more matter presses upon my mind; but I have already been too prolix. I shall conclude with declaring my decided opinion (as decided as it can be, consistent with my unaffected respect for the rest of the Court, from whom I differ), that the prisoner's case does not come within the statute; but that if I only doubted, I should say as I do now, that the prisoner ought to have the benefit of that doubt, and be discharged.

Lord Chief Justice Downes.—It is now my duty to give my opinion on this lamentable case, which I had in vain hoped would not have become a public spectacle, but have been closed where it began, at my own house.

The writ of Habeas Corpus, issued near the end of the vacation, was made returnable im*mediately* before me; was actually returned the following morning after it issued; and having, as soon as I signed the writ, requested the assistance of all the judges in town, and in the neighbourhood, when the writ was returned I was favoured with the attendance of six of the judges, including the chief justice of the Common Pleas, and the chief baron, being all the judges who were then so near town as to make it possible for them to attend, except my brother Osborne, whom, for an obvious reason, I did not call upon.

With this assistance—the ablest which this country could give me—I hoped that the case might have been then most satisfactorily disposed of; but the arguments of counsel having closed late on the evening of the day before the term was to sit, I found some difference of opinion among the judges (and which I now find still continues as to my brother Day), upon the construction of the act of parliament in question; and the judges then present, all recommended to me to adjourn the consideration of the writ and return into this court.

The case has now come on, on the same grounds as it did before me. The return made to the writ of Habeas Corpus has been already fully stated from the bench, and the question arising is, whether the arrest is legal; and that will depend on the construction of the act of parliament of the last session.

In giving my opinion upon this question, I might satisfy myself with merely saying, that I concur in opinion with my brother Daly, and for the reasons that he has given, which appear, to my mind, perfectly satisfactory; I cannot give better; but as I find my brother Day still of a contrary opinion, I think it right to state at large the grounds of the opinion which I have formed; and in doing so, I shall, of course, touch upon that point in which the principal difference of opinion between my brethren arises.

The statute has two general objects. First, with respect to county and county in Ireland, to put the law upon the same footing exactly as it stands in England, as to bringing criminals to justice. Secondly, as nearly as circumstances would permit, to put the two islands on the same footing with respect to bringing criminals to justice, as is before done between county and county.

To effect these two objects, the statute in question is modelled on, and made out of three British statutes, viz. 23 Geo. 2nd, c. 26, 24 Geo. 2nd, c. 55, and 13 Geo. 3rd, c. 31.

The material part of the first of these statutes is recited in the second, and it is observable that the first, which reached only to prisoners who escaped, had not existed more than one year, when its defects were discovered and the remedy applied.

The statute, 24th Geo. 2nd, begins by reciting—[here the chief justice stated that statute, and then proceeded.] The mischief to be remedied by both those acts was, that persons against whom warrants were issued, avoided the punishment of their crimes.

By the first act, that mischief is recited to have happened by the persons against whom warrants have issued escaping into other counties, out of the jurisdiction of the magistrates granting the warrants, and a remedy is enacted for that mode of effecting the mischief.

The following year it was found that the remedy was not sufficiently extensive, and did not reach the whole of the evil. And the act of the 24th enacts, that in case any person against whom any warrant shall be granted, shall, before the granting such warrant, escape, go into, reside or be in any other county, then the justice of the county where the offender is, may endorse the warrant, and the arrest may be made. Then provisions are made for bailing by the justice where the arrest is made in bailable cases.

These two acts form the substance and even the material words of the first part of the act which we have to construe, and that act recites the same mischief, all the modes of effecting that mischief comprised in the two British acts, and gives the same remedy in the same words.

And thus between county and county in Ireland, the criminal process is put on the same footing as in England.

The Union seems to have called the attention of parliament to the state of the two islands with respect to criminal process, and the legislature seems to me to have intended to put the two islands in that respect as near as possible upon the same footing as two counties.

The idea was not new; the same thing had been done, above thirty years before, between England and Scotland, and the act which effected it is the model of that in question, and is in all its provisions, mutatis mutandis the same [Here the chief justice stated the 44 Geo. 3rd, shortly as to the county part, and at length as to the third and fourth sections].

The provisions of this act, so far as it is material for the present question to observe, appear to me to be, except in one instance, between county and county, and island and island, substantially the same; equally to attach upon all offenders and upon all offences with the same general object, to bring the offenders within the reach of the proper jurisdiction, that has cognizance of the offence charged.

One difference between the provisions of this act much relied on in argument, is the mode of bail provided in the case between county and county, before the magistrate of the place where the arrest is made, while no such provision but a different one exists in the case between island and island. I shall not pass over that circumstance.

The two clauses, the third and fourth, upon which the question arises, are drawn in words the largest and most comprehensive imaginable. To any plain man who should read them, I should think no doubt could arise whether they did not reach every possible crime, and every man accused, and wherever he shall be. General and comprehensive as these words are, plain and precise as their meaning is, much ability has been exerted to induce us to hold that the act cannot be understood in the sense which its words import; that we must restrain the generality of its expressions, by holding that there are either whole and numerous classes of offences intended to be excepted, or at least, that this case, circumstanced so far as it appears to us to be, cannot be held to be within it.

First it is objected that the act cannot be extended to misdemeanors which are bailable offences. How did the law stand before this act? what is the mischief pointed out by the statute? what remedy has it given? An ancient practice had prevailed, recognized to be legal by parliament in both countries. The king, by his prerogative, exercised by his secretary of state in England, and by his chief governor here, has at all times transmitted persons charged with capital offences. Whether in any other than capital cases, that prerogative had been before exercised, does not appear, nor is it material to inquire. It is plain that if it had been before exercised, it was taken away in England by the Habeas Corpus act of that country (31st Car. 2nd); and from that time, no person could be legally sent from one island to the other, except to answer for a capital offence. The power of the crown to send over the prisoner from one country to the other could not be questioned; it had been immemorially used, and was recognized in England by the Habeas Corpus act, and had also been recognized here by a statute in the year 1721. But though that power could be used by the crown in capital cases, it could be used only by the crown; and in the case of misdemeanors, no power of transmitting prisoners from one island to the other existed any where. Thus stood the law when this act was made; and the third section of the act recites, that it may frequently happen, that felons and other malefactors may escape from one island to the other, whereby their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision, by the laws in force, for apprehending and transmitting such offenders. It is contended that by this preamble the enacting words of the statute, which if they stood alone would manifestly reach all misdemeanors, must be restrained; because,

First, the enacting clause cannot comprehend misdemeanors. Secondly, if it does, from the effect of the word escape, it cannot operate upon any offender who was not personally in the country at the time of the offence, and who did not leave it after.

The words felons and other malefactors, are the description, in the preamble, of the persons on whom the law is to operate; and it is said, that admitting felons to be within the provision, malefactors cannot mean persons guilty of misdemeanors. This construction goes to narrow the operation of the act to a degree that it is impossible, from the words the act uses, can have been the intent of the makers. They have chosen the most comprehensive terms that the language could point out. Felons and other malefactors must mean, felons and malefactors other than felons. Malefactor is a term extensive enough to embrace every case of an offence punishable by law. It is used in that sense by Hale. It is used in the ancient statute de malefactoribus in parvis, to signify a trespasser. It may, as the counsel for the defendant have shown, comprehend the greatest offenders, but it equally comprehends the least; it comprises the highest and the lowest offences. The statute before us has the strongest comment on the word, when you compare the two most material sections.

The mischief of avoiding punishment is stated in the third section to be occasioned by the escape of felons and other malefactors from Ireland to England. The fourth section shows us what the act means by the words, for it says, for remedy of the like inconvenience, and shows you how that inconvenience arose, which is by the escape into Ireland, of persons guilty of crimes; so that the act manifestly uses the word to comprehend all persons guilty of any crimes; and the enacting clause is, in that respect, a farther comment, and shows that it meant any person against whom a warrant was issued for any crime or offence against the laws of England or Scotland. Then it is said, that the recital in the preamble, as to the defect in the law necessary to be remedied, must exclude misdemeanors from the contemplation of the makers of this act; because the act recites, not that no provision exists by law, for transmitting persons guilty of misdemeanors, but that no sufficient provision exists for apprehending and transmitting "such offenders;" and that, in fact, they must have meant to remedy the insufficient mode of transmitting felons, and have done that, by enabling magistrates to transmit them; but that if they meant to reach misdemeanors, they must have recited that no mode existed of transmitting them.

In fact, this preamble is perfectly true, and supported by the state the law was in, though we suppose the enacting words to extend to all misdemeanors; for the preamble says that there is no sufficient mode of transmitting such offenders, that is, felons and other malefactors, and it might well say so, when the person guilty of misdemeanor could not be transmitted at all. But a mode did exist of transmitting felons, which it has not taken away, but has added another equally applicable to all offences. No inconvenience appears to have arisen from the former mode of transmitting felons. It was not from any misapplication of the power of the crown, either in using or refusing to use its prerogative of transmitting felons, that any inconvenience arose, or is recited to have arisen. That mode is still legal and left unaffected by this act; and I cannot bring myself to think that where the act has added another mode of transmitting offenders, equally applicable to the case of all offenders, and has applied it to all, and where it was necessary in the case of misdemeanors; I say, I cannot bring myself to think, that it meant only to vary the mode of transmitting felons, and not to affect persons guilty of misdemeanors, in which case only a necessity existed. The mode adopted as to felons, has certainly given a power to magistrates who had it not before; but some provisions existed; and shall we, therefore, conclude that the act did not mean to embrace the case of misdemeanors, where it was infinitely more necessary to make provisions such as, in express terms, it has made?

It is then objected, that as no power of bailing is given, we cannot construe the act to extend to misdemeanors; that in the former part of the act, as between county and county, a power of bailing is given, and which would have been in the latter, if it were meant to extend to bailable offences. With respect to this part of the argument, I must say that I do not feel that it presses with much force. On the best consideration that I can give the case, my opinion is, that notwithstanding the different provisions with respect to bail in the different parts of this act, as between county and county, where a provision is made for bailing in the county where the defendant shall be arrested, and that no such provision is made for bailing the party where he shall be arrested as between island and island, yet I cannot think that circumstance sufficient to induce me to construe this act, so as to exclude the case of misdemeanors from its operation.

The general object of the act was, to put the different islands with respect to criminal process, as much in the state of two adjoining counties, as circumstances seemed to admit. This particular provision is copied from the act respecting Scotland. Between two counties, in the same part of the United Kingdom, there was no difficulty. The law is the same in both countries; an offence bailable in one is also bailable in the other: the law was to be executed by magistrates sufficiently conversant as to what offences were bailable; and then for the convenience of the party arrested, he is permitted to be bailed in the place where the arrest takes place. The case is different between the two islands; between England and Ireland the law may be different as to bailable offences, and in some cases is; between Scotland and Ireland there is, certainly, altogether a distinct code of laws. This law was to be executed in the three different countries, by the ordinary magistrates. How should an ordinary magistrate in Ireland know what offences are bailable by the law of Scotland, or, vice versa? With respect to England, there may in some cases be a similar difficulty; yet it cannot be said that the legislature has overlooked the circumstance; it has provided for it in the mode it then thought fit, by directing that the party accused shall be brought into the country where the offence was committed, and he is then to be taken before the justice of peace next to the place he shall land at, and there he is to be dealt with as if arrested there: he is thus brought within the jurisdiction, and then before a magistrate sufficiently conversant of the nature of his offence, who must know whether it be bailable or not, and who is to act accordingly.

I am far from denying, that this is a difficulty upon the party arrested for a misdemeanor; but it is a difficulty which was for the consideration of the legislature, and which, if they had thought fit, they might have prevented (and may hereafter) by adequate provisions: it affects not the present case as to hardship, but is used as an argument of construction. The subject was manifestly before the legislature, and they have, in express terms, enacted the same treatment both for felons and other malefactors, so far as to make them amenable; and if there be hardship, considering it as caused by the offender himself. When they are made amenable, then and not before, the treatment of the offenders will vary according to the nature of the offence. But I cannot bring myself to say, that because a milder mode might have been taken with respect to misdemeanors, the mode pointed out by the act must not be executed. I cannot say that the words of the enacting clause, so fully and comprehensively reaching the case of misdemeanors, shall be rejected against the obvious meaning of the act, against its express provisions, against its plain object; nor can I, on account of the possibility of a better provision being made with respect to bail, bring myself to say that much of the mischief manifestly intended to be remedied shall remain, and the remedy be so restricted as to be almost destroyed; for if we hold that this act does not extend to bailable cases, we reduce the whole of its operation, between island and island, to the single circumstance of changing the mode of transmitting capital felons by giving the same effect to the warrant of a justice of peace as to that of the secretary of state or lord lieutenant, which would be far, indeed, from remedying the mischief intended by this act to be prevented. It would leave misdemeanors, though plainly within the words and spirit, out of the operation of the act. It would reduce the operation of an act plainly intended to aid the administration of justice, by making offenders of all descriptions amenable, to this, that probably no one person would be ever brought to justice, who would not have been taken and sent over by the former mode of transmittal. It would amount to a repeal of the whole act, so far as respects the different islands, except a provision comparatively unimportant, and from which little or no benefit could be expected to arise.

A similar inference is drawn from another part of the act—the clause which directs that the treasurers of counties shall pay the expense of transmitting offenders.

It is asked—"can it be imagined that the legislature would suffer the man accused of a slight misdemeanor to be transmitted at the public expense?"—This would probably have been a good argument in parliament against the precise mode of making that provision; it is manifestly objectionable, and liable to obvious abuse; it would, perhaps, be equally objectionable, or more so, in the case of the slightest felony as in that of the greatest misdemeanor; as I understand the clause, it equally extends to both, and from it I can draw no reason that can convince my mind that either can be excluded from the plain and strong and comprehensive words of the enacting clause of the act, or that the act should be reduced, as I have already said, to have little or no operation at all.

Another ground of objection taken is this,—and it is important, because this head of objection seems to have great weight with my brother Day,—that the defendant has by affidavits shewn that he has not been out of the country since the fact he is charged with is alleged to have been committed; that he cannot, therefore, be said to have escaped; and that therefore he is not an object of the act. For this objection the defendant's counsel rely upon the preamble to the third section, which recites, that, whereas it may frequently happen that felons and other malefactors in Ireland, make their escape into that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain (and vice versa) whereby their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision for apprehending such offenders; that is, offenders who have escaped. And it is contended that the act cannot, therefore, extend to any person (felon or otherwise) who has not escaped; and of course, that the act cannot reach the defendant.

I construe the word escape in the preamble, in the same way that the defendant's counsel do, and think that its meaning is, a person who has fled from justice, after the offence committed; and that such is not the case of the defendant is stated by his affidavit, which shows him to have been in Ireland at the time, and long before, and ever since the period at which, he says, the publication first took place. If I thought that this act of parliament made it necessary, that to bring any person within it, it should be an essential part of the case that he should have actually fled from justice, I should be of opinion, without the affidavit, that the prisoner must be discharged; because if that circumstance of flight or actual escape, were necessary, it ought to have been alleged upon the return; for the return must show a complete legal ground for the arrest, and this contains no such allegation.

But I am far from thinking that the operation of the act is to be confined to criminals who have escaped out of the country where the crime has been committed. I take it to be a sound rule of construction, that although the preamble may be a key to the construction of a statute, yet it cannot always control the operation of the enacting words.

In Athoe's case, 8th Modern, 144, the Court laid it down, and in a capital case, that preambles are no more than recitals of inconveniences which do not exclude any other to which a remedy is given by the enacting part. And Mr. Justice Buller, in delivering the opinion of the twelve judges of England, in the case cited by Mr. Attorney-general from East's Pleas of the Crown, 1113, says, "Where the enacting clause of a statute refers to such offences only, as are mentioned in the preamble," (and I add on the same principle, where the enacting clause refers only to the same mischief and cause of the mischief as in the preamble) "the enacting clause may thereby be controlled or restrained; but in this case" (says Mr. Justice Buller, and I say so here) "it would be doing violence to very plain words, and repealing some of the obvious provisions of the act, if it were so restrained. It is," says he, "no uncommon thing for a statute to recite a particular mischief as the cause of making the statute, and yet, for the enacting part of it to embrace more general objects, and to extend to other cases, which the legislature thought within equal mischief."

If the enacting clause were to be restrained by the instance stated in the preamble here, it would upon the argument extend only to cases where the party committing the offence in England, fled from the country to avoid punishment either before, or after the warrant issued, or at least left that country. But the enacting clause in express words extends to all persons who, having committed any crime against the laws of England, shall escape, go into, or reside or be, in the country where the arrest is made; and we must (to admit the construction contended for by the defendant) hold that the words reside or be must be rejected, although they are words (as Mr. Justice Buller says) embracing more general objects, and extending to cases within equal mischief.

What is the mischief recited in the preamble here? Not the escape simply: no, that is stated as one instance causing the mischief. The mischief expressly stated in the preamble, as caused by that instance, escape, is, that their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision for apprehending them. The cases additionally provided for in the enacting clause, of residing and being in the country, out of the jurisdiction where the offence was committed, create the same mischief of the offence remaining unpunished; for the absence of the party accused from the limits of the jurisdiction, equally creates the mischief in the preamble as an actual flight, for he can no more be brought to justice in the one case than in the other. The enacting words therefore embrace those cases, and enact that a man charged with an offence in either country shall be arrested wherever he is found; this is the general effect of the enacting clause: it thus reaches the whole of the mischief recited, and in fact, does not by this construction go a jot beyond it.

The rules for construing statutes laid down in Heydon's case, in Coke, conclude with this, that the judge is to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy, and to suppress subtle inventions and evasions, for the continuance of the mischief, and to add force and life to the cure and remedy, according to the true intent of the makers of the act. This solemn duty I think I perform by the construction I give to the words of this act.

But it is said that to hold the construction which I adopt, we must reject the words "escape and go into:" this has been fully answered by the attorney-general; they are included in the subsequent more general words, and you cannot reject those general words without disappointing the plain intent of the act.

Then it is said—we cannot suffer the defendant to be transmitted, because the offence, circumstanced as he appears, is not triable in England. It is a sufficient answer to this to say, that he is indicted in England, and a warrant is come over to this country; for if he be indicted there, I know no authority we have to decide upon their right of jurisdiction, and the act requires that the party accused shall be made answerable to the jurisdiction where he stands accused.

But on what grounds are we expected to hold that doctrine? The defendant shows by his affidavit, that he has not been in England for a year before the publication, nor ever since. If this were offered to us as a defence to the charge, or if in his affidavit the defendant absolutely denied his guilt,—which he does not,—we could not listen to it, for the defence must be made where the charge is made.

It is said, if this were a felony, being of an accessorial nature, it could not be tried in England, but if triable at all, must be tried here, and so, that there is no failure of justice; and then, to show that it is possible to try the defendant here, an affidavit is made, to show that the libel complained of was actually published here. Now, without resting on the fact that if the law were so, the affidavit does not show it to be the same libel that he is indicted for, that was published in Dublin, though Mr. Emerson states he believes it the same; yet I say, supposing it to be the same, and if we had the power of deciding on the jurisdiction of the Court of King's-bench in England, can we say that they shall not be allowed to try an indictment for a libel for publishing the same papers in Westminster? Why? Because afterwards the same libel was published in Dublin, not by the defendant but another; and then the trial of this defendant shall not be had in Westminster, because another man has committed the same offence in Dublin!

But suppose the fact were, that the defendant himself had published it in Dublin, is that a reason he should not be tried in Westminster, if he is charged with committing a similar offence there? I think not—they are distinct offences, distinct in law, for an acquittal or conviction of the one could not be pleaded in bar of the other; and for any thing we can know, they are distinct in fact as to the procuring the publication. And to decide that the Court of King's-bench in England shall not try this case, we must hold, that it is impossible for a man residing in the county of Dublin to procure a publication of a libel in Westminster, and that we have a right to go into that defence, and to prohibit the Court of King's-bench in England from trying an indictment found before them.

But it is said,—and this seems to have weight with my brother Day,—that the defendant cannot be transmitted, because, as he may be tried here, though not for the same, yet for a similar offence, he cannot be said to avoid justice, and therefore is not an object of the act. To this I think a short answer may be given; that the avoidance of justice meant by this act, is the not submitting to trial where the accusation is, and that it is no sufficient reply to make, that the defendant is ready to answer where no accusation is made, or, for any thing we can tell, ever will, or can be made with effect.

This last ground of objection to the operation of the act, would equally apply, if the defendant were indicted at Cork for a publication there, and if a warrant for apprehending him were endorsed as this is, in the county of Dublin. He might say, I have not been in Cork these ten years, and another man has published it in Dublin, and I ought to answer there. But the gentlemen admit that the act is perfect and without defect, as between county and county, and reaches all possible offences and every offender, and therefore would reach the present case, and why? Because, say they, the preamble of the county clause contains the words "reside and be," and therefore the legislature had such cases in contemplation, but not in the clauses respecting the two islands—the preamble there has only the words "escape and go into."

I have already stated the effect of the preamble; the enacting words are the same with respect to island and island, as they are between county and county; the mischief is the same; the act has the same precise object in both provisions, and must therefore have the same construction in both.

But there are other objections made in the argument, some of which, perhaps, I ought to advert to. It is said that the Habeas Corpus act of England is repealed by my construction. If it is, that has been done by parliament. I do not carry the act a jot beyond its express words. This act certainly creates a power of bringing offenders to justice, which, within the provisions of that most valuable statute, was prohibited; but I believe, and hope, that few men will think that a law which does that, has done any injury to public liberty.

Many inconveniences are pointed out, with great eloquence and ingenuity, as likely to follow the construction I give the act. It exposes, say the gentlemen, every man in each island to be taken to the other, to answer the most frivolous charge, perhaps invented and contrived by malice. Abuses of the best laws may certainly happen—they may be punished where they occur, but cannot be made impossible. And, in truth, the same inconveniences might exist, even if the construction of the act confined it to cases of felony; but, as I have already said, by such construction, the plain intent and operation of the act would be construed away.

Would there be no inconvenience in the desired construction? Would there be no inconvenience in reducing this act merely to the effect of changing the mode of transmitting felons, and leaving persons guilty of enormous misdemeanors free from apprehension of punishment? If we hold, that on account of the personal presence of a defendant here, he shall not be obliged to answer to a crime affecting the peace of England, capable of being committed by him, though resident here, would that be no public inconvenience? Is there no public inconvenience in holding, that a man may safely write libels here, and transmit them to England for publication there, disturbing the peace of that country and defying its jurisdiction? Is there no public inconvenience in holding, that a resident here might plan, and by his instruments in England effect, the greatest fraud without being responsible in either country? Or in the case put by the attorney general, that a man might send poison, under pretence of medicine, to England, and actually commit a murder there; but, not being personally present, shall he be protected here, in a case where a country under a distinct separate and independent government would probably give him up to justice—nay in a case where even hostile governments have been known to do it?

And what injury to public liberty has any man to apprehend from the construction I give this act? I do no more than say,—and that in compliance with the express words of this act of parliament,—that any person or persons resident in either of the two countries, and accused by a competent jurisdiction in the other, of any offence against the law of the country where he is accused, must answer it. If he were there accidentally or voluntarily, the present defendant could not resist being amenable. We say that this act of parliament lends its aid to the administration of justice, against those who will not voluntarily submit, be their offence what it may.

I am desirous only of adding one more observation, in answer to the principal ground on which my brother Day has rested his opinion—that to be within this act, the person accused must have been, at the time of the offence, within the country, the law of which he is accused of violating, and must have fled from it, or left it afterwards; and it is this—this act is to be executed by the ordinary magistrates, and it gives those magistrates no power of inquiring into the fact of escape, or any of the circumstances attending the offence. The only document for the magistrate to act upon is the warrant coming from the country where the offender is accused: it is impossible for the magistrate to ascertain the fact that is relied on, as exempting the person accused from the operation of the act. The arrest (from the nature of the case) must be made, before he can be apprized of that fact. If the prisoner tells him that he is not an object of the act, because he was not in the country where the crime is charged to have been committed, at the time that the offence is supposed to have been committed, is the magistrate to take the prisoner's word, or his affidavit of that fact? Or is he to examine witnesses to it? Or to call for the informations given in England, or the witnesses who swore them? In short, in all such cases, if persons, circumstanced as the defendant is, are exempt from the operation of this act, the magistrate is guilty of false imprisonment, and liable to an action, without any means given by the law of preventing it.

I shall now close this unhappy case, in many respects so lamentable. Much more might be added to what I have said, but I have touched on the principal parts of the subject; and shall only add, that I have no manner of doubt that the defendant's case is within the act of parliament; and of course, that the return is good, and that he must be remanded.

The legality of the arrest was thus confirmed by a majority of the judges present; but the defendant having obtained a writ of Habeas Corpus out of the Court of Exchequer, the question was re-argued on the fourth day of February, before the judges of that court.

*Proceedings before the Court of Exchequer* in Ireland, in the Case of the Hon. Mr. Justice Johnson.*

Court of Exchequer, Dublin, February 4, 1805.

Present.—The right hon. Barry viscount Yelverton, lord chief baron; the honourable Mr. Baron George; the honourable Mr. Baron [William] Smith; the honourable Mr. Baron Maclelland.

The writ of Habeas Corpus, and the return thereto,† and the affidavits‡ of the hon. Justice Johnson and John Swift Emerson, gent. being read,

Mr. Burrowes, after stating the facts disclosed by the return and affidavits, spoke as follows:—To justify this arrest, and to warrant your lordships to remand, an act of parliament of the last session is resorted to. If that act of parliament must be so construed, abhorrent as such construction must be to the principles of our laws and constitution, the legislature must be obeyed; and we cannot be suffered to take refuge in judicial misconstruction from the mandates of the supreme power of the state.

Whether the legislature has so clearly and unequivocally expressed its will as to preclude all judicial interpretation in favour of pre-existing rights of the most sacred kind, is now to be argued and decided. What is the proposition which, in order to justify this arrest, it is admitted must be received as the perpetual law of these realms, enacted by this statute? I say perpetual; because, as the act is not limited in duration, this Court never can make the possible correction of it in future any ground of their construction; and you must decide whether the legislature intended that its subjects should exist for ever under such a rule. The proposition contended for is, "That wherever any man of any rank, however low, shall obtain a warrant from any magistrate, for any misdeameanor, however petty, against any man, however high, he may cause him to be arrested in any extremity of the United Kingdoms, and to be transmitted at the public expense, without a right of being bailed, to the kingdom where the offence is charged to have been committed; even though such person never had been for one moment in the kingdom to which he is transmitted." Such a proposition startles every man who hears it. The peculiar hardship of my client's case is merged in the public mischief; and I will not weaken his claim to a constitutional interpretation of this act, by dwelling upon his peculiar situation. It is equally his wish and his interest, that this act should be discussed upon general grounds; and in respect of him personally I shall only say, that in rejecting the attorney-general's offer to waive the operation of the law in his case and accept of bail, he acted as became the subject of a free state; and if he had compromised this question, and submitted to a violent and unconstitutional interpretation of this law in return for personal indulgence, he would have disgraced his character as a judge, and ought to be stigmatized.

In arguing this question, I will in limine admit that the obvious and primary (I do not say necessary) meaning of the enacting words establishes such a rule. The enacting words are sufficiently comprehensive to include my client's case, and every case which I have stated; and unless there be passages in the act which, according to the rules of judicial construction, may explain and limit the extent of these words, my client must be remanded. I admit, also, that the enacting words of a law are not necessarily restrained by the title or preamble; but that, on the contrary, the enacting words may extend to many cases not mentioned in either title or preamble; and that judicial interpretation in pursuit of the manifest intent of the legislature, may extend a law to cases not strictly or literally within title, preamble, or enacting words. I am so far from denying this, that I conceive that the principal strength of my client's case depends upon its admission; because, I mean to argue, that from the whole of the act, accurately examined and collated, you never can say that it was the will of the legislature that such a rule should be established; and it is not my interest, nor am I warranted, to fetter judicial interpretation within narrow and irrational limits.

Upon two grounds I contend that the act does not embrace this case:—first I say, “That as to the transmission of persons from kingdom to kingdom, it ought to be limited to persons charged with offences not bailable:”—Secondly, “That it only extends to persons who having committed an offence in any place where they were personally present, have ceased in any way to continue within the jurisdiction where the offence was actually committed.”—Mr. Justice Johnson is only accused of a misdemeanor which is bailable; and I have a right to assume (it being disclosed by affidavit, and not contradicted in the return), that he was in the kingdom of Ireland when the alleged libel was stated to have been published, by his procurement, in England and ever since; consequently, if I establish either ground, he must be discharged.

In construing this act, I am not ashamed to refer you to an elementary book; and to a part of that book at which a diligent student might arrive in the first day of his legal studies. The rules or signs, as he terms it, by which the will of the legislature may be best explained in acts of parliament, are no where laid down with more judgment and clearness than by Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the first volume of his Commentaries, page 59. These signs, according to that elegant and luminous writer, are, 1st, the words—2nd, the context—3rd, the subject matter—4th, the effects, or consequences—5th, the spirit and reason of the law.—I have already admitted that the first impression of the mere enacting words would make against my argument; but if I succeed in proving that upon the whole four latter grounds of interpretation, they are struggling on the other side against the will of the legislature, as well as against the liberty of the subject, you will no doubt discharge my client.

Apply these principles to my first objection—the legislature manifestly makes a distinction between the objects of the acts in the arrest and transmission of offenders from kingdom to kingdom, and from county to county within the same kingdom.

If no distinction were intended, the whole object of the legislature would be accomplished by the first section, by merely substituting the words United Kingdom for Ireland whenever the latter term occurs; and the third and fourth sections would not only be superfluous, but the law would be uniform and free from the objections to which it is admitted by the other side to be liable, and which it is said will be remedied by the legislature.

Upon the other side it is admitted that a distinction is made—What is the distinction according to their interpretation, and what according to ours? and let me ask you, in the first place, which is most probable to have been the intention of the legislature?—They say that as between kingdom and kingdom every class of offenders is included as well as between county and county of the same kingdom; but that persons arrested in one kingdom for bailable offences committed in another cannot be bailed, though as between county and county they may.

We say that as between kingdom and kingdom the law only acts upon offences not bailable, and that therefore the objects of the law cannot be bailed.—Their distinction repeals the Habeas Corpus acts of both countries; our's conforms to them; their distinction respects the right of being bailed when its violation would be comparatively unoppressive, and annihilates it when it is most necessary. According to their distinction we must suppose that the legislature, when in the first section they are providing for the arrest of a person accused of a misdemeanor in an adjoining county, are so tender of liberty as to provide that he shall be bailable upon the very spot where he is arrested; but that in the third and fourth sections they lose sight of every pre-existing right and valuable personal privilege, and empower the transmission of the same class of offenders from kingdom to kingdom, without a right of being bailed; and that they have distinguished the cases for the sole purpose of making this preposterous and inverted distinction. If it be said that the law would be imperfect if it did not act upon inferior offenders as well between kingdom and kingdom as between county and county, I answer that it is a vain hope to frame any law which will not be in some particular defective; and that to exclude all inferior offences would upon the whole be more practically wise than to include them all—inasmuch as the safety and peace of each distinct kingdom might be considered as sufficiently provided for by the pursuit and bringing back to punishment of daring and dangerous criminals, while the flight and banishment of inferior offenders, who would still be punished if they should ever come within the jurisdiction, might be deemed sufficient.—I shall now proceed to show how the context of this act bears upon and establishes my distinction; but I shall first state how the law before this act stood in relation to the arrest and transmission of offenders from kingdom to kingdom. First, no man could be legally arrested for any misdemeanor committed in another kingdom, consequently he could not be legally transmitted; the case was entirely unprovided for, and perhaps in wisdom should for ever remain so. In respect of felons and traitors, the practice, and perhaps the law, was different. There existed a practice, founded upon the ancient prerogative of the crown, of arresting high delinquents accused of offences not bailable, and transmitting them for trial from kingdom to kingdom, and this usage was recognized and sanctioned by the Habeas Corpus act in England. The arrest was always under a secretary of state's warrant, and the prisoner was transmitted by a king's messenger. No ordinary magistrate ever did, or could grant such a warrant: it was a mere state proceeding, optional on the part of the crown, and the authority was local and limited. In respect therefore of the arrest and transmission of higher offenders, there was some, but an insufficient remedy; in respect of inferior offenders none.

The pre-existing law being as I have stated, strongly illustrates the inference I derive from the preamble and context of the act; and the object, spirit, and policy of the act, and the consequences of the different interpretations in my opinion remove all doubt upon the subject.

The preamble of the first section, which establishes the law as between county and county, recites, "Whereas it frequently happens that persons against whom warrants are granted by, &c. &c. escape into other counties, &c. &c." Nothing can be more comprehensive than the description of the objects of this act mentioned here and in every part of this section. There is not a syllable to restrain their generality. The description both in the preamble and enacting part is precisely the same. The context concurs with the enacting words, and the spirit and reason of the law are answered by a literal and comprehensive construction—no bad effects can follow from it—no grand constitutional law is indirectly repealed—no vital principle of personal liberty is sacrificed.—The letter, context, object, spirit, and policy of the law are the same; and the legislature, having unquestionably intended to extend its provisions to misdemeanors, have provided that the liberty of the subject should not be sacrificed; and they have enacted a right of being bailed in bailable offences, commensurate to the new power of arrest which they have introduced.

Look now to the preamble, and examine the context of sections 3 and 4, which provide for cases between kingdom and kingdom. How are the objects of these sections described? "And whereas it frequently happens that felons and other malefactors in that part of the united kingdom called Ireland, make their escape into that part of the united kingdom called Great Britain." Is it a violation of our language to say that these words import the higher and more enormous offenders? If it be said that the term "malefactors" may be used to designate any offenders, is it no answer to state that that term is generally used to denote the higher offenders? that felons, and other malefactors, according to the rules of construction, mean malefactors of a like kind? and that if malefactors be interpreted as comprehending all offenders, the word felons may be rejected as surplusage? But examine the context farther, in order to discover who are the objects of this part of the act. "Whereby their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision by the laws now in force for apprehending such offenders, and transmitting them, &c. &c." Is it not manifest from these words, that the offenders within the contemplation of the legislature are felons and other malefactors, in respect of whom there pre-existed some, but an imperfect, provision by law as to arrest and transmission? In respect of inferior offenders, there pre-existed no provision at all. In respect of the higher order of criminals, there pre-existed an imperfect, and insufficient provision. Does it not follow that the legislature most clearly meant to extend the provision of these distinct sections to the latter description of offenders, and not to the former?

But it is said the enacting words are universal, and not to be restrained by the preamble. I admit they are not necessarily to be restrained; but I contend, that when the context, the subject matter of the law, the effects and consequences of the different constructions, and the spirit and reason of the law, all (as in this case) conspire to limit the generality of the enacting words, all those latter guides conjointly ought to govern. The enacting words certainly are very general: "If any person or persons against whom a warrant shall be issued, &c. &c. for any crime or offence against the laws in force in Ireland, &c. &c." If this description in the enacting part stood alone and unexplained by other words and by the context, a word could not be said in support of my construction; but I contend that it is not unreasonable or unprecedented, in pursuit of the intention of the legislature, to construe "any person" to mean "any such person as was before described;" and the words "for any crime or offence against the laws," to mean "any such crime or offence as was before described."—By the Whiteboy act, a number of offences are made capital by words totally unlimited, and by distinct sections. Innumerable instances have occurred of cases which have fallen manifestly within the enacting words; yet the judges have looked at the title, the preamble, and the recitals of that act for its object, and have never considered any case within it, unless proof was previously made that the particular county, where the question arose, was in that rebellious, riotous state, which gave rise to the severe provisions. Upon a similar principle was Renwick Williams's case* decided, by which a monstrous offender, clearly within the letter of the law, was acquitted, because his case did not fall within the evil intended to be remedied by the law under which he was tried.

It has been argued, that by the 13th Geo. 3rd in the British parliament a similar law was enacted, as between England and Scotland, with almost the same recitals and enacting words; and that that act extends to all misdemeanors, although no provision is made for bail. I say, that if these two acts be collated, important differences will be found between them. But it is unnecessary to waste time in this inquiry, because the whole gist of the observation is assumed without any proof. No single case has been adduced by which the 13th of Geo. 3rd has been construed to extend to misdemeanors; and, I say, that it is more probable that such an extension of that law was never attempted, than that it was constantly and universally acquiesced in. Can it be credited, that where a judge of the land has construed this law not to extend to misdemeanors, and where there is at least so much doubt upon the subject, that no Englishman or Scotsman, jealous of his rights, and struggling for his liberty, would have taken the opinion of a court of justice upon the subject? Such a supposition is unnatural in the extreme; and we ought rather to presume, that no Englishman or Scotsman was ever transmitted out of their respective kingdoms for a misdemeanor under this act.

It appears by this return, that the court of king's-bench has construed this act against my argument. It cannot be contended upon the other side, that this determination is binding upon you; and I will not deny that it is a formidable precedent. It is, however, but the determination of a divided court, from which also one judge was absent: and in a new case like this, when the most valuable rights of the subjects of the whole empire are involved, I should hope that you will attend more to the argument than the authority. I have a high respect for that Court: for the amiable and dignified person who presides in it I feel more than respect; I met him with an early and instantaneous predilection, which has ripened into habitual and almost involuntary esteem and veneration. I could not if I would, I would not if I could, detract from the weight of his authority by disparaging reflections. I shall not wound his feelings by praise, or the feelings of others by censure. I shall only say (what the occasion extorts) that if I were to look for any imperfection in his character, I must search for it in the excess of some noble and virtuous propensity, some amiable or admirable quality of the head or the heart. I would say that he has, perhaps, too much of a quality of which most other men have too little: you perceive I mean that intellectual humility, that modesty of mind, without which wisdom cannot exist, and even genius loses much of its lustre. To the predominance of this quality, I would, perhaps, ascribe this judgment; and I would add, that, upon such a subject as this, he would be more liable to err than upon any other. When the construction called for might appear to be an extension of jurisdiction, an interference with the functions of the legislature, a sort of constructive legislation, I should fear that the modesty of his nature might, perhaps, too much control the suggestions of his powerful and comprehensive understanding. But certain I am, that if you shall differ from him, he will rejoice that the liberty of the subject has survived this act, and will feel more gratified than rebuked.

Upon the second objection, namely, "that this act only applies to persons who, by change of place in any way occurring, have ceased to continue in the jurisdiction where the offence was committed," the case of my client is still stronger, because his case does not fall within the necessary and obvious meaning of the enacting words, and the context, object, spirit, and meaning of the legislature; and the consequences of the construction contended for on the other side are still more powerful in excluding his case under this head of objection than under the former.

It has been, I think incorrectly, said, though by high authority, that the object of this act being to prevent impunity in general, the recital of one mode by which impunity is obtained, ought not, in any degree, to control the extension of the remedy to other modes by which justice may be eluded. Most manifestly the act has no such comprehensive object, as to correct every abuse by which impunity of crimes might be procured. Many modes of eluding justice may exist, and are in daily practice, to which the legislature had not the slightest notion of applying its provisions. Every line of this act shows that the sole object of the law, and of those laws which it nearly copies, was to prevent the evasion of justice by a removal out of the jurisdiction.

The 23rd Geo. 2nd, c. 56, s. 11, in Great Britain was the first act upon the subject. The preamble and enacting words of this section are confined to persons escaping out of the jurisdiction after a warrant issued to apprehend, and no provision is made for bail in bailable offences. It was obvious that the act should have comprehended persons escaping out of the jurisdiction before the issuing of the warrant, and residing or being elsewhere; accordingly, the 24th Geo. 2nd, ch. 55, after reciting this section, proceeds, "and whereas such offenders may reside or be in some other county, &c. out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting such warrant as aforesaid, before the granting such warrant, and without escaping or going out of the county, &c. after such warrant granted." Now it is plain, that the words "without escaping after such warrant granted," import that the persons in contemplation have escaped before warrant granted. Such construction is agreeable to the ordinary rules of interpreting language, and is forced upon us by the obvious defect of the former act, and the nature of the subject. Now see whether the enacting words may not without violence be construed to extend merely to persons, who having ceased to continue within the jurisdiction where they have violated the laws and ought to be tried, are fit objects of legal pursuit; "be it therefore enacted, that from and after, &c. &c. in case any person against whom a warrant shall be issued by any justice &c. of any county, &c. shall escape, go into, reside, or be in any other county, &c. out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting such warrant, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the county, &c. where such person shall escape, go into, reside, or be, to endorse his name, &c. &c." Now I conceive it to be a natural and reasonable construction of these words, in an act made manifestly for the pursuit of fugitive offenders, to interpret the words "shall reside or be," to mean "shall become resident or existing." The contrary interpretation renders the words "shall escape or go into," totally superfluous and unmeaning; for if the words reside or be apply to all cases and all modes of residence or existence, as is contended for, such words would manifestly include the cases of residing or being, after escaping or going into the places to which the process is extended. Such an interpretation also would render the law ex post facto, when it is expressly framed to commence from a certain date, and must be considered as prospective. The date of the act cannot refer to the issuing of the warrant, but to the act of the object of the law bringing himself within its operation. The objection that a law is ex post facto, never can be answered by rendering its force dependent upon the act of a third person, subsequent to the passing of a law. I conceive that the words reside or be are introduced, in order to extend the effect of the law to all cases in which an offender is found out of the jurisdiction in which he personally violated the law, without distinguishing how, why, or under what circumstances he ceased to continue where he had offended. It might be deemed reasonable and just to bring an offender back to trial, whatever might be the cause or occasion of his removal out of the jurisdiction, although it would be repugnant to the principles of justice to force him into a jurisdiction within which he never had been.

Such are the two English acts introduced to regulate this subject between county and county in England; and it has been urged by the attorney-general in another place that the first section of the act we are construing is founded upon these acts, that the preamble of the present act contains in substance the same recitals, and that the enacting words are identically the same. The preamble of the first section of the present act recites, "whereas it frequently happens that persons against whom warrants are granted, &c. escape into other counties, &c. and it may also happen that persons having committed offences in some county or place, may reside or be in some other county or place, out of the jurisdiction, &c. whereby, &c." The former recital comprehends the objects of the 23rd Geo. 2nd, namely, persons escaping after a warrant, and the latter recital extends to persons ceasing to continue within the jurisdiction after the offence committed, whether they had left it before or after the warrant was issued. The words having committed in the second recital manifestly mean after having committed, and the words may reside or be, must mean may become resident or existing; and there is not a single sentence or word in any of the acts to show that the legislature had in contemplation the case of a man residing or being out of the jurisdiction, at the time the offence was committed within it.

If such interpretation be admissible as to the law which provides as between county and county, with what additional force does it apply to cases arising between kingdom and kingdom! The recital in the sections providing for the latter cases, is confined to felons and other malefactors escaping from one kingdom to another, and the enacting words are precisely the same.

I have argued from the words, let me now argue from the silence of the legislature. If the law had been intended to extend to constructive misdemeanors between kingdom and kingdom, would it not have made a provision for bail? Would it not have armed the prisoner with process to compel witnesses from the place where he was when the fact was committed, and where his defence would most probably arise, to attend his trial? Would it not have provided for the trial of accessaries in Ireland to felonies committed in England? As the law stood before this act, and still stands, an accessory in Ireland to a murder or felony in England could not be tried in either country. This act creates no new offence. It does not extend the jurisdiction of any court. It merely facilitates process in bringing offenders, who were before subject to trial, before a tribunal which before had cognizance of their offence. It follows clearly that an accessory resident in Ireland to a murder or felony committed in England cannot be arrested and transmitted under this act. To what end transmit him? If he cannot be tried, he must be discharged. You never could construe an act expressly made to facilitate the arrest and trial of offenders to extend to persons who cannot be tried. Such persons, however criminal in foro conscientie are, technically speaking, guilty of no municipal offence. They are in the situation of accessaries in one county to felonies committed in another before the 2nd and 3rd Edw. English, and the 10th Cha. 1st, Irish. They are objects of total impunity—what follows? That if Mr. Justice Johnson had procured a murder or felony to be committed in England while he resided here, you must discharge him without bail; but according to the argument upon the other side, upon account of the slightness of his offence you must transmit him without bail. It would be an insult to the legislature to impute to it so impolitic and preposterous a distinction; and in refusing to establish it, you vindicate their character, instead of usurping their power. Can you believe from any part of the act, or from all its parts collated and compared, that the legislature intended that no accessory to a murder or felony, however atrocious the guilt, should fall within its provision, but that every man who should procure a misdemeanor, however venial, to be committed, should be subject to its severest provisions? That the former class of offenders should triumph in total impunity, and the latter languish under the bitterest persecution?

Upon the whole of this case, I conceive that Mr. Justice Johnson is entitled to be discharged; because he is a subject of a free state entitled to personal liberty, which he has not forfeited by any crime committed against the law of the country in which he lives; because the law of the imperial parliament (whose supremacy he was himself so forward in establishing) under which, for a constructive misdemeanor, he is treated as a prisoner not bailable, is in respect of him ex-post facto; because felons and criminals escaping justice by flight or removal from the jurisdiction which should try them, appear from the title, preambles, and whole spirit of the act to be the sole objects of the legislature; because the Habeas Corpus acts of both countries would by a contrary construction stand perpetually repealed; because to support the arrest you must believe that the legislature in one and the same act provided for personal liberty where its violation would be comparatively uninjurious, but left it totally unprotected where the most oppressive consequences would follow its invasion;—that they intended to leave accessories to felonies and murders in total impunity, and to pursue inferior offences which the law does not treat as accessory, merely from their slightness, with the bitterest vengeance;—that in pursuit of justice they should for the slightest offence transmit a man as a felon to a foreign country without furnishing him with process to command the attendance of witnesses, and that in a case where the jurisdiction at home is full as competent and much more fit to try the offence. Until this question is finally settled by judicial determinations, I never can credit that the imperial parliament intended to leave the subjects of the united countries under a rule so unequal, so mischievous, and so absurd. It might perhaps be credited, that in violent times, under the predominance of an arbitrary spirit, a minister might press forward a law which would leave the liberty of the subject at the mercy of the crown: but I cannot credit, that any minister, in any parliament, would empower any man to violate the liberty of every other whom he might dislike, under the slightest pretext—would defray the expenses of his malicious prosecution, and subject a man, because he was charged with the slightest offence, to inevitable punishment, more heavy than could be inflicted in consequence of his confession or conviction of an offence of tenfold enormity. I therefore conceive that there is nothing in this act to warrant the detention of Mr. Justice Johnson, and feel a confident hope that he will be discharged.

Mr. Curran.—My Lords;—It has fallen to my lot, either fortunately, or unfortunately, as the event may be, to rise as counsel for my client on this most important and momentous occasion. I appear before you, my lords, in consequence of a writ issued by his majesty, commanding that cause be shown to this his Court why his subject has been deprived of his liberty; and upon the cause shown in obedience to this writ, it is my duty to address you on the most awful question—if awfulness is to be judged by consequences and events—on which you have been ever called upon to decide. Sorry am I that the task has not been confided to more adequate powers; but, feeble as mine are, they will at least not shrink from it. I move you therefore that Mr. Justice Johnson be released from illegal imprisonment.

I cannot but observe the sort of scenic preparation with which this sad drama is sought to be brought forward. In part I approve it; in part it excites my disgust and indignation. I am glad to find that the Attorney and Solicitor-general, the natural and official prosecutors for the state, do not appear; and I infer from their absence that his excellency the lord-lieutenant disclaims any personal concern in this execrable transaction. I think it does him much honour;—it is a conduct that equally accords with the dignity of his character, and the feelings of his heart. To his private virtues, whenever he is left to their influence, I willingly concur in giving the most unqualified tribute of respect: and I do firmly believe, it is with no small regret that he suffers his name to be even formally made use of, in avowing for a return of one of the judges of the land, with as much indifference and non-chalance as if he were a beast of the plough. I observe too, the dead silence into which the public is frowned by authority for the sad occasion. No man dares to mutter; no newspaper dares to whisper that such a question is afloat. It seems an inquiry among the tombs, or rather in the shades beyond them.

I am glad it is so—I am glad of this factitious dumbness; for if murmurs dared to become audible, my voice would be too feeble to drown them; but when all is hushed—when nature sleeps—

Cum quies mortalibus ægris,

the weakest voice is heard;—the shepherd's whistle shoots across the listening darkness of the interminable heath, and gives notice that the wolf is upon his walk; and the same gloom and stillness that tempt the monster to come abroad, facilitate the communication of the warning to beware. Yes, through that silence the voice shall be heard;—yes, through that silence the shepherd shall be put upon his guard;—yes, through that silence shall the felon savage be chased into the toil. Yes, my lords, I feel myself impressed and cheered by the composed and dignified attention with which I see you are disposed to hear me on the most important question that has ever been subjected to your consideration; the most important to the dearest rights of the human being; the most deeply interesting and animating that can beat in his heart, or burn upon his tongue.—Oh! how recreating is it to feel that occasions may arise in which the soul of man may resume her pretensions; in which she hears the voice of nature whisper to her, os homini sublime dedit calumque tueri; in which even I can look up with calm security to the Court, and down with the most profound contempt upon the reptile I mean to tread upon! I say, reptile; because, when the proudest man in society becomes so much the dupe of his childish malice, as to wish to inflict on the object of his vengeance the poison of his sting; to do a reptile's work he must shrink into a reptile's dimension; and so shrunk, the only way to assail him is to tread upon him. But to the subject:—this writ of Habeas Corpus has had a return. That return states, that lord Ellenborough, chief justice of England, issued a warrant reciting the foundation of this dismal transaction; that one of the clerks of the Crown-office had certified to him, that an indictment had been found at Westminster, charging the honourable Robert Johnson, late of Westminster, one of the justices of his majesty's Court of Common-pleas in Ireland, with the publication of certain slanderous libels against the government of that country; against the person of his excellency lord Hardwicke, lord-lieutenant of that country; against the person of lord Redesdale, the chancellor of Ireland; and against the person of Mr. Justice Osborne, one of the justices of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland. One of the clerks of the Crown-office, it seems, certified all this to his lordship. How many of those there are, or who they are, or which of them so certified, we cannot presume to guess, because the learned and noble lord is silent as to those circumstances. We are only informed that one of them made that important communication to his lordship. It puts me in mind of the information given to one of Fielding's justices; "did not," says his worship's wife, "the man with the valet make his fidavy that you was a vagram?" I suppose it was some such petty-bag officer who gave lord Ellenborough to understand that Mr. Justice Johnson was indicted. And being thus given to understand and be informed, he issued his warrant to a gentleman, no doubt of great respectability, a Mr. Williams, his tipstaff, to take the body of Mr. Justice Johnson and bring him before a magistrate, for the purpose of giving bail to appear within the first eight days of this term, so that there might be a trial within the sittings after; and if, by the blessing of God, he should be convicted, then to appear on the return of the postea, to be dealt with according to law.

Perhaps it may be a question for you to decide, whether that warrant, such as it may be, is not now absolutely spent; and, if not, how a man can contrive to be hereafter in England on a day that is past? And high as the opinion may be in England of Irish understanding, it will be something beyond even Irish exactness to bind him to appear in England, not a fortnight hence, but a fortnight ago.—I wish, my lords, we had the art of giving time this retrograde motion. If possessed of the secret, we might possibly be disposed to improve it from fortnights into years.

There is something not incurious in the juxta-position of signatures. The warrant is signed by the chief justice of all England.—In music the ear is reconciled to strong transitions of key by a preparatory resolution of the intervening discords; but here, alas! there is nothing to break the fall: the august title of Ellenborough is followed by the unadorned name of brother Bell, the sponsor of his lordship's warrant. Let me not, however, be suffered to deem lightly of the compeer of the noble and learned lord. Mr. Justice Bell ought to be a lawyer; I remember him myself long a crier to, and I know his credit with, the state; he has had a noli prosequi. I see not therefore why it may not be fairly said "fortunati ambo!" It appears by this return, that Mr. Justice Bell endorses this bill of lading to another consignee, Mr. Medlicott, a most respectable gentleman; he describes himself upon the warrant, and he gives a delightful specimen of the administration of justice, and the calender of saints in office; he describes himself a justice and a peace officer—that is a magistrate and a catch-pole:—So that he may receive informations as a justice; if he can write, he may draw them as a clerk; if not, he can execute the warrant as bailiff; and, if it be a capital offence, you may see the culprit, the justice, the clerk, the bailiff and the hangman together in the same cart; and, though he may not write, he may "ride and tie!" What a pity that their journey should not be further continued together! That, as they had been "lovely in their lives, so in their deaths they might not be divided!" I find, my lords, I have undesignedly raised a laugh; never did I less feel merriment.—Let not me be condemned—let not the laugh be mistaken.—Never was Mr. Hume more just than when he says, that "in many things the extremes are nearer to one another than the means."—Few are those events that are produced by vice and folly, that fire the heart with indignation, that do not also shake the sides with laughter. So when the two famous moralists of old beheld the sad spectacle of life, the one burst into laughter, the other melted into tears: they were each of them right, and equally right.

But these are the bitter ireful laughs of honest indignation,—or they are the laughs of hectic melancholy despair.

It is stated to you, my lords, that these two justices, if justices they are to be called, went to the house of the defendant. I am speaking to judges, but I disdain the paltry insult it would be to them, were I to appeal to any wretched sympathy of situation. I feel I am above it. I know the Bench is above it. But I know, too, that there are ranks, and degrees, and decorums to be observed; and, if I had a harsh communication to make to a venerable judge, and a similar one to his crier, I should certainly address them in very different language indeed. A judge of the land, a man not young, of infirm health, has the sanctuary of his habitation broken open by these two persons, who set out with him for the coast, to drag him from his country, to hurry him to a strange land by the “most direct way!” till the king’s writ stopped the malefactors, and left the subject of the king a waife dropt in the pursuit.

Is it for nothing, my lords, I say this? Is it without intention I state the facts in this way? It is with every intention. It is the duty of the public advocate not so to put forward the object of public attention as that the skeleton only shall appear, without flesh, or feature, or complexion. I mean every thing that ought to be meant in a court of justice. I mean not only that this execrable attempt shall be intelligible to the Court as a matter of law, but shall be understood by the world as an act of state. If advocates had always the honesty and the courage, upon occasions like this, to despise all personal considerations, and to think of no consequence but what may result to the public from the faithful discharge of their sacred trust, these phrenetic projects of power, these atrocious aggressions on the liberty and happiness of men, would not be so often attempted; for, though a certain class of delinquents may be skreened from punishment, they cannot be protected from hatred and derision. The great tribunal of reputation will pass its inexorable sentence upon their crimes, their follies, or their incompetency; they will sink themselves under the consciousness of their situation; they will feel the operation of an acid so neutralizing the malignity of their natures, as at least to make them harmless, if it cannot make them honest. Nor is there any thing of risk in the conduct I recommend. If the fire be hot, or the window cold, turn not your back to either; turn your face. So, if you are obliged to arraign the acts of those in high station, approach them not with malice nor favour, nor fear. Remember, that it is the condition of guilt to tremble, and of honesty to be bold; remember that your false fear can only give them false courage:—that while you nobly avow the cause of truth, you will find her shield an impenetrable protection; and that no attack can be either hazardous or inefficient, if it be just and resolute. If Nathan had not fortified himself in the boldness and directness of his charge, he might have been hanged for the malice of his parable.

It is, my lords, in this temper of mind, befitting every advocate who is worthy of the name, deeply and modestly sensible of his duty, and proud of his privilege, equally exalted above the meanness of temporising or of offending, most averse from the unnecessary infliction of pain upon any man or men whatsoever, that I now address you on a question, the most vitally connected with the liberty and well-being of every man within the limits of the British empire; which being decided one way, he may be a freeman; which being decided the other, he must be a slave. It is not the Irish nation only that is involved in this question: every member of the three realms is equally embarked; and would to God all England could listen to what passes here this day! they would regard us with more sympathy and respect, when the proudest Briton saw that his liberty was defended in what he would call a provincial court, and by a provincial advocate. The abstract and general question for your consideration is this:—my lord Ellenborough has signed with his own hand a warrant, which has been indorsed by Mr. Bell an Irish justice, for seizing the person of Mr. Justice Johnson in Ireland, for conveying his person by the most direct way, in such manner as these bailiffs may choose, across the sea, and afterwards to the city of Westminster, to take his trial for an alleged libel against the persons entrusted with the government of Ireland, and to take that trial in a country where the supposed offender did not live at the time of the supposed offence, nor during a period of at least eighteen months previous thereto has ever resided; where the subject of his accusation is perfectly unknown; where the conduct of his prosecutors, which has been the subject of the supposed libel, is equally unknown; where he has not the power of compelling the attendance of a single witness for his defence. Under that warrant he has been dragged from his family; under that warrant he was on his way to the water’s edge: his transportation has been interrupted by the writ before you, and upon the return of that writ arises the question upon which you are to decide, the legality or illegality of so transporting him for the purpose of trial. I am well aware, my lords, of the limits of the present discussion; if the law were clear in favour of the prosecutors, a most momentous question might arise—how far they may be delinquents in daring to avail themselves of such a law for such a purpose?—but I am aware that such is not the present question.

I am aware that this is no court of impeachment; and therefore that your inquiry is, not whether such a power hath been criminally used, but whether it doth in fact exist. The arrest of the defendant has been justified by the advocates of the crown under the forty-fourth of his present majesty. I have had the curiosity to inquire into the history of that act, and I find, that in the month of May, 1804, the brother-in-law of one of the present prosecutors obtained leave to bring in a bill to "render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the united kingdom to another, and also from one county to another:" that bill was brought in; it travelled on in the caravan of legislation unheeded and unnoticed, retarded by no difficulties of discussion or debate, and in due fulness of season it passed into a law, which was to commence from and after the 1st of August, 1804. This act, like a young Hercules, began its exploits in the cradle. In the November following the present warrant was issued under its supposed authority. Let me not be understood to say, that the act has been slid through an unsuspecting legislature, under any particular influence, or for any particular purpose: that any such man could be found, or any such influence exist, or any such lethargy prevail, would not, perhaps, be decent to suppose; still less do I question the legislative authority of parliament. We all know that a parliament may attain itself; and that its omnipotence may equally extend in the same way to the whole body of the people. We know also that most unjust and cruel acts of attainder have been obtained by corrupt men in bad times; and if I could bring myself to say, which I do not, that this act was contrived for the mere purpose of destroying an obnoxious individual, I should not hesitate to call it the most odious species of attainder that could be found upon the records of legislative degradation; because, for the simple purpose of extinguishing an individual, it would sweep the liberty of every being in the state into the vortex of general and undistinguishing destruction. These are points of view upon which the minds of the people of Ireland and England may dwell with terror, or indignation, or apathy, according as they may be fitted for liberty or for chains; but they are not points for the court; and so I pass them by. The present arrest and detention are defended under the forty-fourth of the king: are they warranted by that act? That is the only question for you to decide; and you will arrive at that decision in the usual course, by inquiring, first, how the law stood before upon the subject; next, what the imperfection or grievance of that law was; and thirdly what is the remedy intended to be applied by the act in question?

First, then, how stood the law before?—upon this part it would be a parade of useless learning to go farther back than the statute of Charles, the Habeas Corpus act, which is so justly called the second Magna Charta of British liberty: what was the occasion of the law? the arbitrary transportation of the subject beyond the realm; that base and malignant war, which the odious and despicable minions of power are for ever ready to wage against all those who are honest and bold enough to despise, to expose, and to resist them. Such is the oscitancy of man, that he lies torpid for ages under these aggressions, until at last some signal abuse, the violation of Lucretia, the death of Virginia, the oppression of William Tell, shakes him from his slumber. For years had those drunken gambols of power been played in England; for years had the waters of bitterness been rising to the brim; at last a single drop caused them to overflow—the oppression of a single individual raised the people of England from their sleep. And what does that great statute do? It defines and asserts the right, it points out the abuse; and it endeavours to secure the right, and to guard against the abuse, by giving redress to the sufferer, and by punishing the offender. For years had it been the practice to transport obnoxious persons out of the realm into distant parts under the pretext of punishment, or of safe custody. Well might they have been said to be sent "to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns," for of these wretched travellers how few ever did return? But of that flagrant abuse this statute has laid the axe to the root: it prohibits the abuse; it declares such detention or removal illegal; it gives an action against all persons concerned in the offence, by contriving, writing, signing, counter-signing, such warrant, or advising or assisting therein. That you may form a just estimate of the rights which were to be secured, examine the means by which the infringement was in future to be prevented and punished. The injured party has a civil action against the offenders; but the legislature recollected, that the sneaking unprincipled humility of a servile packed jury might do homage to ministerial power by compensating the individual with nominal damages. The statute does that of which I remember no other instance: it leaves the jury at liberty to give damages to any extent, above five hundred pounds, but expressly forbids them to find a verdict of damages below it. Was this sufficient?—No. The offenders incur a præmunire. They are put out of the king's protection; they forfeit their lands and goods; they are disabled from bearing any office of trust or profit. Did the statute stop there? The legislature saw in their prospective wisdom, that the profligate favourite who had committed treason against the king by the oppression of his subjects, might acquire such a dominion over the mind of his master, as by the exertion of prerogative to interrupt the course of justice, and prevent the punishment of his crime; if therefore the guilty minister of such abuse should attempt to pour poison into the sovereign's ear, and talk to him of mercy, this statute dashes the phial from his hand—it takes away the prerogative of pardon.—Are bulwarks like these ever constructed to repel the incursions of a contemptible enemy? Was it a trivial and ordinary occasion which raised this storm of indignation in the parliament of that day? Is the ocean ever lashed by the tempest to waft a feather, or to drown a fly? Thus, haughtily and jealously, does this statute restrain the abuses that may be committed against the liberty of the subject by the judge, the jury, or the minister. One exception, and one exception only does it contain:—It excepts from its protection by the sixteenth section, persons who may have committed any “capital offence” in Scotland or Ireland. If the principle of that exception were now open to discussion, sure I am that much might be said against its policy. On the one side, you would have to consider the mischief of letting this statute protect a capital offender from punishment, by prohibiting his transmission to that jurisdiction where his crime was committed, and where alone he could be tried. On the other, you would have to weigh the danger to be feared from the abuse of such a power, which, as the Habeas Corpus act stood, could not be resorted to in any ordinary way; but was confined to the sole and exclusive exercise of the advisers of the prerogative. You would have to consider whether it was more likely that it would be used against the guilty or the obnoxious; whether it was more likely to be used as an instrument of justice against the bad, or a pretext of oppression against the good; and finally, whether you might not apply to the subject the humane maxim of our law—that better it is that one hundred guilty men should escape, than that one innocent, and, let me add, meritorious man, should suffer. But our ancestors have considered the question; they have decided; and, until we are better satisfied than I fear we can be, that we have not degenerated from their virtue, it can scarcely become us to pass any light or hasty condemnation upon their wisdom. In this great statute then, my lords, you have the line of demarcation between the prerogative and the people, as well as between the criminal law and the subject, defined with all the exactness, and guarded by every precaution that human prudence could devise. Wretched must be that legislature whose acts you cannot trace to the first unchangeable principles of rational prerogative, of civil liberty, of equal justice! In this act you trace them all distinctly. By this act you have a solemn legislative declaration, “that it is incompatible with liberty to send any subject out of the realm, under pretence of any crime supposed or alleged to be committed in a foreign jurisdiction, except that crime be capital.” Such were the bulwarks which our ancestors placed about the sacred temple of liberty—such the ramparts by which they sought to bar out the ever-toiling ocean of arbitrary power; and thought (generous credulity!) that they had barred it out from their posterity for ever. Little did they foresee the future race of vermin that would work their way through those mounds, and let back the inundation; little did they foresee that their labours were so like those frail and transient works that threatened for a while the haughty crimes and battlements of Troy, but so soon vanished before the force of the trident and the impulse of the waters; or that they were still more like the forms which the infant's finger traces upon the beach; the next breeze, the next tide erases them, and confounds them with the barren undistinguished strand. The ill-omened bird that lights upon it sees nothing to mark, to allure, or to deter, but finds all one obliterated unvaried waste;

Still do I hope that this sacred bequest of our ancestors will have a more prosperous fortune, and be preserved by a more religious and successful care, a polar star to the wisdom of the legislator, and the integrity of the judge.

As such will I suppose its principle not yet brought into disgrace; and as such, with your permission, will I still presume to argue upon that principle.

So stood the law till the two acts of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of George 2nd which relate wholly to cases between county and county in England. Next followed the act of the thirteenth of his present majesty, which was merely a regulation between England and Scotland. And next came the act of the forty-fourth of the present reign, upon which you are now called on to decide, which as between county and county is an incorporation of the two acts of George 2nd: and as between England, Scotland, and Ireland is nearly a transcript of the thirteenth of the king.

Under the third and fourth sections of this last act the learned counsel for the learned prosecutors (for really I think it only candid to acquit the lord-lieutenant of the folly or the shame of this business, and to suppose that he is as innocent of the project from his temper, as he must from his education be ignorant of the subject) endeavour to justify this proceeding. The construction of this act they broadly and expressly contend to be this;—first, they assert that it extends not only to the higher crimes, but to all offences whatsoever: secondly, that it extends not only to persons who may have committed offences within any given jurisdictions, and afterwards escaped or gone out of such jurisdictions, but to all persons whether so escaping or going out or not:—thirdly, that it extends to constructive offences, that is, to offences committed against the laws of certain jurisdictions, committed in places not within them, by persons who never put their feet within them, but by construction of law committing them within such jurisdictions, and of course triable therein:—fourthly, that it extends peculiarly to the case of libels against the persons entrusted with the powers of government, or with offices in the state—and fifthly, that it extends not only to offences committed after the commencement of the act, but also to offences at any period however remotely previous to the existence of the statute; that is, that it is to have an ex post facto operation. The learned prosecutors have been forced into the necessity of supporting these last monstrous positions, because upon the return to the writ, and upon the affidavits it appears, and has been expressly admitted in the argument:—first, that the supposed libel upon these noble and learned prosecutors relates to the unhappy circumstances that took place in Ireland on the twenty-third of July, 1803, and of course must have been published subsequently thereto:—and secondly, that Mr. Justice Johnson from the beginning of 1802 to the present hour was never for a moment in England, but was constantly resident in Ireland; so that his guilt, whatever it be, must arise from some act of necessity committed in Ireland, and by no physical possibility committed or capable of being committed in England: these are the positions upon which a learned chancellor and a learned judge come forward to support their cause, and to stake their character, each in the face of his country, and both in the face of the British empire: these are the positions, which, thank God, it belongs to my nature to abhor, and to my education to despise, and which it is this day my most prompt and melancholy duty to refute and to resist—most prompt in obeying; most grieved at the occasion that calls for such obedience.

We must now examine this act of the forty-fourth of the king, and in doing so I trust you will seek some nobler assistance than can be found in the principles or the practice, of day-rules or side-bar motions; something more worthy a liberal and learned Court, acting under a religious sense of their duty to their king, their country, and their God, than the feeble and pedantic aid of a stunted verbal interpretation, straining upon its tip-toe to peep over the syllable that stands between it and meaning. If your object were merely to see if its words could be tortured into a submission to a vindictive interpretation, you would have only to endorse the construction that these learned prosecutors have put upon it, and that with as much grave deliberation as Mr. Justice Bell has vouchsafed to endorse the warrant which my lord Ellenborough has thought fit to issue under its authority. You would then have only to look at it, ut leguleius quidam cautus, atque acutus præcentor.

Lord Avonmore.—No, Mr. Curran, you forget; it is not præcentor, it is leguleius qui- dam cautus atque acutus, præco actionum, cantor formarum, auceps syllabarum.

Mr. Curran.—I thank you, my lord, for the assistance; and I am the more grateful, because, when I consider the laudable and successful efforts that have been made of late to make science domestic and familiar, and to emancipate her from the trammels of scholarship, as well as the just suspicion under which the harbourers and abettors of those outlawed classics have fallen, I see at what a risk you have ventured to help me out. And yet see, my lord, if you are prudent in trusting yourself to the honour of an accomplice. Think, should I be prosecuted for this misprision of learning, if I could resist the temptation of escaping by turning evidence against so notorious a delinquent as you, my good lord, and so confessedly more criminal than myself, or perhaps than any other man in the empire.

To examine this act then, my lords, we must revert to the three English statutes of which it is a transcript. The first of these is the twenty-third of George 2nd, cap. 26, sect. 11.

So much of the title as relates to our present inquiry is “for the apprehending of persons in any county or place upon warrants granted by justices of the peace in any other county or place.”

See now sect. 11, that contains the preamble and enactment as to this subject;—

“And whereas it frequently happens that persons, against whom warrants are granted by justices of the peace for the several counties within this kingdom, escape into other counties or places out of the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace granting such warrants, and thereby avoid being punished for the offences wherewith they are charged: For remedy whereof, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and fifty, in case any person against whom a legal warrant shall be issued by any justice or justices of the peace for any county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, within this kingdom, shall escape or go into any other county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, out of the jurisdiction of the justice or justices granting such warrant as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, to which such person shall have gone or escaped, to endorse such warrant, upon application made to him for that purpose, and to cause the person against whom the same shall have been issued to be apprehended and sent to the justice or justices who granted such warrant, or some other justice or justices of the county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, from whence such person shall have gone or escaped, to the end that he or she may be dealt with according to law, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.”

This act was amended by the twenty-fourth of the same reign, the title of which was, "An act for amending and making more effectual a clause in an act passed in the last session of parliament for the apprehending of persons in any county or place upon warrants granted by justices of the peace of any other county or place."

It then recites the eleventh section of the twenty-third of George 2nd, and proceeds, "And whereas such offender or offenders may reside or be in some other county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, out of the jurisdiction of the justice or justices granting such warrant, as aforesaid, before the granting such warrant, and without escaping or going out of the county, riding, division, city, liberty, town or place, after such warrant granted."

I shall reserve a more particular examination of these two acts for that head of my argument which will necessarily require it. At present, I shall only observe;—first, that they are manifestly prospective; secondly, that they operate only as between county and county in England; thirdly, that they clearly and distinctly go to all offenders whatsoever, who may avoid trial and punishment of their offences by escaping from the jurisdiction in which they were committed, and were of course triable and punishable; and fourthly, that provision is made for bailing the persons so arrested in the place where taken, if the offences charged upon them were bailable by law.

In the thirteenth of his present majesty it was thought fit to make a law with respect to criminals escaping from England to Scotland, and vice versa. Of that act the present statute of the forty-fourth is a transcript; and upon this statute arises the first question made by the prosecutors; namely, whether, like the acts of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of George 2nd, which were merely between county and county, it extended indiscriminately to the lowest as well as the highest offences? or whether the thirteenth and forty-fourth which go to kingdom and kingdom, are not confined to some and to what particular species of offences? The preamble to these two statutes so far as they bear upon our present question is contained in the third section of the forty-fourth, the act now under consideration; and there is not a word in it that is not most material. It says, "whereas, it may frequently happen that felons and other malefactors in Ireland may make their escape into Great Britain, as also that felons and other malefactors in Great Britain may make their escape into Ireland, whereby their crimes remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision by the laws now in force in Great Britain and Ireland respectively for apprehending such offenders and transmitting them into that part of the united kingdom in which their offences were committed: For remedy whereof, &c. if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued by any justice of the peace in Ireland for any crime or offence against the laws of Ireland, shall escape, go into, reside or be, in any place in England or Scotland, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace for the place, whither or where such person shall escape, &c. to endorse his name on such warrant; which warrant so endorsed shall be a sufficient authority to the person bringing it to execute the same by apprehending the person against whom it is granted, and to convey him by the most direct way into Ireland and before a justice living near the place where he shall land, which justice shall proceed with regard to him as if he had been legally apprehended in such county of Ireland."

The fourth section makes the same provision for escapes from England or Scotland into Ireland. The statute goes on and directs that the expenses of such removal, shall be repaid to the person defraying the same by the treasurer of the county in which the crime was committed, and the treasurer is to be allowed for it in his accounts.

To support the construction that takes in all possible offences of all possible degrees, you have been told—and upon the grave authority of notable cases—that the enacting part of a statute may go beyond its preamble; that it cannot be restrained by the preamble and still less by the title; that here the enacting clause has the words "any offence," and that "any offence" must extend to every offence, and of course to the offence in question. If the question had been of a lighter kind, you might perhaps have smiled at the parade of authorities produced to establish what no lawyer ever thinks of denying. The learned gentlemen would have acted with more advantage to the justice of the country, though perhaps not to the wishes of their clients, if they had reminded your lordships, that in the construction of a statute, the preamble and even the title itself may give some assistance to the judge in developing its meaning and its extent; if they had reminded you, that remedial laws are to be construed liberally, and penal laws with the utmost strictness and caution. And when they contended that a supposed libel is within the letter of this law, they would have done well to have added, that it is a maxim that there may be cases within the letter of a statute, which, notwithstanding, the judge is bound to reject from its operation as being incompatible with its spirit. They would have done well in adding that the judge is bound so to construe all laws as not to infringe upon any of the known rules of religion or morality—any of the known rules of distributive justice—any of the established principles of the liberties and rights of the subject—and that it is no more than a decent and becoming deference to the legislator to assume as certain, that whatever words he may have used, he could not possibly have meant any thing which upon the face of it was palpably absurd, immoral, or unjust. These are the principles on which I am persuaded this Court will always act, because I know them to be the principles on which every court of justice ought to act. And I abstain studiously from appealing to any judicial decisions in support of them, because to fortify them by precedent or authority would be to suppose them liable to be called in question. There is another rule which I can easily excuse the learned gentlemen from adverting to, and that is, that when many statutes are made in pari materia, any one of them is to be construed, not independently of the others, but with a reference to the entire code of which it is only a component part.

On these grounds then, I say, the forty-fourth was not, and could not be intended to go to all offences whatsoever.

First, because the acts of the twenty-third, and twenty-fourth of George 2nd had already described "all persons" by words of the most general and comprehensive kind. If the framers of the thirteenth and forty-fourth meant to carry these acts to the same length, they had the words of the former acts before their eyes, and yet they have used very different words: a clear proof, in my mind, that they meant to convey a very different meaning. In these latter acts they use very singular words—"felons and other malefactors;"—that these words are somewhat loose and indefinite I make no difficulty of admitting: but will any man who understands English deny, that they describe offences of a higher and most enormous degree? You are told, that "felon" does not necessarily mean a capital offender, because there are felonies not capital, the name being derived from the forfeiture not of life, but of property. You are also told, that malefactor means generally an ill-doer, and, in that sense, that every offender is a malefactor; but the thirteenth and forty-fourth state this class to be felons and malefactors, for whose transmission from kingdom to kingdom "no sufficient provision was made by the laws now in force." Now I think it is not unfair reasoning to say, that this act extends to a class of offenders whose transmission was admitted to be not incompatible with the just liberty of the subject of England; but for whose transmission the legislature could not say there was no provision; but for whose transmission it was clear that there was not a sufficient provision, though there was some provision. If you can find any class so circumstanced, that is exclusively liable by law to be so transmitted, the meaning of the words "felons and other malefactors," becomes fixed, and must necessarily refer to such class.

Now that class is expressly described in the Habeas Corpus act, because it declares the transmission of all persons to be illegal, except only persons charged with capital crimes; for their apprehension and transmission there was a provision, the mandatum regis; that is, the discretionary exercise of the prerogative. That power had therefore been used in cases of treason, as in Lundy's case: so in the case of lord Sanquire; Carliel, the principal in the murder of Turner, committed in London by the procurement of lord Sanquire, was arrested in Scotland whither he had fled, by the order of king James 1st, and brought back to England, where he was executed for the crime, as was lord Sanquire, the accessory before the fact; but such interference of the prerogative might be granted or withheld at pleasure, could be applied for only with great difficulty and expense, and therefore might well be called an insufficient provision. No provision for such a purpose can be sufficient, unless, instead of depending on the caprice of men in power, it can be resorted to in the ordinary course of law. You have therefore, my lords, to elect between two constructions; one which makes an adequate provision for carrying the exception in the sixteenth section of the habeas corpus act into effect; and the other, a complete and radical repeal of that sacred security for the freedom of Englishmen.—But further, the spirit and the letter of the Habeas Corpus law is, that the party arrested shall, without a moment's delay, be bailed, if the offence be bailable; but if misdemeanors are within this act, then an English subject, arrested under an Irish warrant, cannot be bailed within any part of the realm of England, but must be carried forward, in the custody of Irish bailiffs, to the sea-shore of his country, where he is to be embarked in such vessel as they think proper; and, if it should be the good pleasure of his guardians to let him land alive in any part of Ireland, then, and not till then, may he apply to an Irish justice to admit him to bail in a foreign country, where he is a perfect stranger, and where none but an idiot could expect to find any man disposed to make himself responsible for his appearance. Can you, my lords, bring your minds easily to believe that such a tissue of despotism and folly could have been the sober and deliberate intention of the legislature? but further, under the acts of George the 2nd, even from one county to the next, the warrant by the first justice must be authenticated upon oath, before it can be endorsed by the second; but, in this act, between, perhaps, the remotest regions of different kingdoms, no authentication is required; and, upon the endorsement of, perhaps, a forged warrant, which the English justice has no means of inquiring into, a British subject is to be marched through England, and carried over sea to Ireland, there to learn in the county of Kerry, or Galway, or Derry, that he had been torn from his family, his friends, his business, to the annihilation of his credit, the ruin of his affairs, the destruction of his health, in consequence of a mistake, or a practical joke, or an inhuman and remorseless project of vindictive malice;

and that he is then at liberty to return, if he is able; that he may have a good action at law against the worthy and responsible bailiff who abused him, if he is foolish enough to look for him, or unfortunate enough to find him. Can you, my lords, be brought seriously to believe, that such a construction would not be the foulest aspersion upon the wisdom and justice of the legislature?

I said, my lords, that an Englishman may be taken upon the endorsement of a forged warrant. Let me not be supposed to be such a simpleton as to think that the danger of forgery makes a shade of difference in the subject. I know too well that calendar of saints, the Irish justices; I am too much in the habit of prosecuting and defending them every term and every commission, not to be able to guess at what price a customer might have real warrants by the dozen; and, without much sagacity, we might calculate the average expense of their endorsement at the other side of the water. But, farther yet, the act provides that the expense of such transmission shall be paid at the end of the journey, by the place where the crime has been committed—but, who is to supply the expenses by the way? What sort of prosecutors do you think the more likely to advance those expenses, an angry minister, or a vindictive individual?—I can easily see that such a construction would furnish a most effectual method of getting rid of a troublesome political opponent; or a rival in trade; or a rival in love; or of quickening the undutiful lingering of an ancestor that felt not the maturity of his heir; but I cannot bring myself to believe that a sober legislature, when the common rights of humanity seem to be beaten into their last entrenchment, and to make their last stand,—I trust in God a successful one,—in the British empire, would choose exactly that awful crisis for destroying the most vital principles of common justice and liberty; or of showing to these nations, that their treasure and their blood were to be wasted in struggling for the noble privilege of holding the right of freedom, of habitation, and of country, at the courtesy of every little irritable officer of state, or of our worshipful Rivets, and Bells, and Medlicotts, and their trusty and well-beloved cousins and catchpoles.

But, my lords, even if the prosecutor should succeed,—which, for the honour and character of Ireland, I trust he cannot,—in wringing from the Bench an admission that all offences whatsoever are within this act, he will have only commenced his honourable cause, he will only have arrived at the vestibule of atrocity. He has now to show that Mr. Johnson is within the description of a malefactor, making his escape into Ireland, whereby his offence may remain unpunished, and liable to be arrested under a warrant endorsed in that place whither or where such person shall escape, go into, reside or be. For this inquiry you must refer to the twenty-third and twenty-fourth George 2nd. The first of these, twenty-third, c. 11, recites the mischief—“that persons against whom warrants are granted escape into other counties, and thereby avoid being punished.”—The enacting part then gives the remedy:—“The justice for the place into which such person shall have gone or escaped shall endorse the original warrant, and the person accused shall thereunder be sent to the justice who granted it, to be by him dealt with,” &c.

If words can be plain, these words are so—they extend to persons actually committing crimes within a jurisdiction, and actually escaping into some other after warrant granted, and thereby avoiding trial. In this act there were found two defects:—first, it did not comprehend persons changing their abode before warrant issued, and whose removing, as not being a direct flight from pursuit, could scarcely be called an escape;—secondly, it did not give the second justice a power to bail. And here you see how essential to justice it was deemed that the person arrested should be bailed on the spot, and at the moment of arrest, if the charge was bailable.

Accordingly, the twenty-fourth of George 2nd, cap. 55, was made:—After reciting the former act, and the class of offenders thereby described, namely, actual offenders actually escaping, it recites that “whereas such offenders may reside or be in some other county before the warrant granted, and without escaping or going out of the country after such warrant granted,” it then enacts, “that the justice for such place where such person shall escape, go into, reside, or be, shall endorse, &c. and may bail if bailable, or transmit,” &c.

Now the construction of these two acts taken together is manifestly this: it takes in every person, who being in any jurisdiction, and committing an offence therein, escaping after warrant, or without escaping after warrant, going into some other jurisdiction, and who shall there reside, that is, permanently abide, or shall be, that is, not permanently so as to be called a resident.

Now here it is admitted that Mr. Johnson was not within the realm of England since the beginning of 1802, more than a year before the offence existed; and therefore you are gravely called upon to say, that he is the person who made his escape from a place where he never was, and into a place which he had never left.—To let in this wise and humane construction, see what you are called upon to do:—the statute makes such persons liable to arrest if they shall have done certain things, to wit, if they shall escape, go into, reside, or be; but if the fact of simply being, i. e. existing in another jurisdiction, is sufficient to make them so liable, it follows of course, that the two only verbs that imply doing any thing, that is, escape or go into must be regarded as superfluous, that is, that the legislature had no idea whatsoever to be conveyed by them when they used them, and therefore are to be altogether expunged and rejected.

Such, my lords, are the strange and unnatural monsters that may be produced by the union of malignity and folly. I cannot but own that I feel an indignant, and perhaps ill-natured satisfaction in reflecting that my own country cannot monopolize the derision and detestation that such a production must attract. It was originally conceived by the wisdom of the east; it has made its escape and come into Ireland under the sanction of the first criminal judge of the empire: here, I trust in God, we shall have only to feel shame or anger at the insolence of the visit; without the melancholy aggravation of such an execrable guest continuing to reside or to be among us. On the contrary, I will not dismiss from my heart, the cheering expectation, that your decision, my lords, will show the British nation, that a country, having as just and as proud an idea of liberty as herself, is not an unworthy ally in the great contest for the rights of humanity; is no unworthy associate in resisting the progress of barbarity and military despotism, and in defending against its enemies, that great system of British freedom, in which we have now a common interest, and under the ruins of which, if it should be overthrown, we must be buried in a common destruction.

I am not ignorant, my lords, that this extraordinary construction has received the sanction of another Court, nor of the surprise and dismay with which it smote upon the general heart of the bar. I am aware that I may have the mortification of being told in another country of that unhappy decision, and I foresee in what confusion I shall hang down my head when I am told it. But I cherish, too, the consolatory hope, that I shall be able to tell them, that I had an old and learned friend, whom I would put above all the sweepings of their hall, who was of a different opinion—who had derived his ideas of civil liberty from the purest fountains of Athens and of Rome—who had fed the youthful vigour of his studious mind with the theoretic knowledge of their wisest philosophers and statesmen—and who had refined that theory into the quick and exquisite sensibility of moral instinct, by contemplating the practice of their most illustrious examples—by dwelling on the sweet soul'd piety of Cimon—on the anticipated christianity of Socrates—on the gallant and pathetic patriotism of Epaminondas—on that pure austerity of Fabricius, whom to move from his integrity would have been more difficult than to have pushed the sun from his course. I would add, that if he had seemed to hesitate, it was but for a moment—that his hesitation was like the passing cloud that floats across the morning sun, and hides it from the view, and does so for a moment hide it, by involving the spectator without even approaching the face of the luminary. And this soothing hope I draw from the dearest and tenderest recollections of my life—from the remembrance of those attic nights, and those reflections of the gods, which we have partaken with those admired, and respected, and beloved companions, who have gone before us;—over whose ashes the most precious tears of Ireland have been shed [Here lord Avonmore could not refrain from bursting into tears.] Yes, my good lord, I see you do not forget them; I see their sacred forms passing in sad review before your memory; I see your pained and softened fancy recalling those happy meetings, where the innocent enjoyment of social mirth became expanded into the nobler warmth of social virtue, and the horizon of the board became enlarged into the horizon of man—where the swelling heart conceived and communicated the pure and generous purpose—where my slenderer and younger taper imbibed its borrowed light from the more matured and redundant fountain of yours. Yes, my lord, we can remember those nights without any other regret than that they can never more return, for

“We spent them not in toys, or lust, or wine;
“But search of deep philosophy,
“Wit, eloquence, and poesy, “Arts, which I lov'd, for they, my friend,* were thine.”

But, my lords, to return to a subject from which to have thus far departed, I think, may not be wholly without excuse. The express object of the forty-fourth was to send persons from places where they were not triable by law, back to the places that had jurisdiction to try them. And in those very words does Mr. Justice Blackstone observe on the thirteenth of the king, that it was made to prevent impunity by escape, by giving a power of “sending back” such offenders as had so escaped.

This topic of argument would now naturally claim its place in the present discussion. I mention it now, that it might not be supposed that I meant to pretermitt so important a consideration. And I only mention it, because it will connect itself with a subsequent head of this inquiry in a manner more forcibly applicable to the object, when I think I may venture to say, it will appear to demonstration, that if the offence charged upon the defendant is triable at all, it is triable in Ireland and no where else; and of course that the prosecutors are acting in direct violation of the statute, when they seek to transport him from a place where he can be tried, into another country which can have no possible jurisdiction over him.

* “Lord Avonmore, in whose breast political resentment was easily subdued, by the same noble tenderness of feeling which distinguished the late Mr. Fox, upon a more celebrated occasion, could not withstand this appeal to his heart. At this period, there was a suspension of intercourse between him and Mr. Curran; but the moment the Court rose, his lordship sent for his friend, and threw himself into his arms, declaring that unworthy artifices had been used to separate them, and that they should never succeed in future.” 1. Life of Curran by his Son, 148, note.

Let us now, my lords, examine the next position contended for by those learned prosecutors. Having laboured to prove that the act applies not merely to capital crimes, but to all offences whatsoever; having laboured to show that an act for preventing impunity by escape extends to cases not only where there was no escape, but where escape in fact was physically impossible; they proceeded to put forward boldly a doctrine which no lawyer, I do not hesitate to say it, in Westminster-hall would have the folly or the temerity to advance; that is, that the defendant may by construction of law be guilty of the offence in Westminster, though he should never have passed within its limits till he was sent thither to be tried. With what a fatal and inexorable uniformity do the tempers and characters of men domineer over their actions and conduct! How clearly must an Englishman, if by chance there be any now listening to us, discern the motives and principles that dictated the odious persecutions of 1794 re-assuming their operations; forgetting that public spirit by which they were frustrated; unappalled by fear, undeterred by shame, and returning again to the charge; the same wild and impious nonsense of constructive criminality, the same execrable application of the ill-understood rules of a vulgar, clerk-like, and illiterate equity, to the sound and plain and guarded maxims of the criminal law of England! the purest, the noblest, the chastest system of distributive justice that was ever venerated by the wise, or perverted by the foolish, or that the children of men in any age or climate of the world have ever yet beheld; the same instruments, the same movements, the same artists, the same doctrines, the same doctors, the same servile and infuriated contempt of humanity, and persecution of freedom! the same shadows of the varying hour that extend or contract their length, as the beam of a rising or a sinking sun plays upon the gnomon of self-interest! How demonstratively does the same appetite for mice authenticate the identity of the transformed princess that had been once a cat.

But it seems as if the whole order and arrangement of the moral and the physical world had been contrived for the instruction of man, and to warn him that he is not immortal. In every age, in every country, do we see the natural rise, advancement and decline of virtue and of science. So it has been in Greece, in Rome; so it must be, I fear, the fate of England. In science, the point of its maturity and manhood is the commencement of its old age; the race of writers and thinkers, and reasoners passes away, and gives place to a succession of men who can neither write, nor think, nor reason. The Hales, the Holts, and the Sommerses shed a transient light upon mankind, but are soon extinct and disappear, and give place to a superficial and over-weening generation of laborious and strenuous idlers,—of silly scholiasts, of wrangling mooters, of prosing garrulists who explore their darkling ascent upon the steps of science by the balustrade of cases and manuscripts, who calculate their depth by their darkness, and fancy they are profound because they feel they are perplexed. When the race of the Palladios is extinct, you may expect to see a clumsy hod-man collected beneath the shade of his shoulders affecting to fling a builder's glance upon the temple, on the proportion of its pillars, and to pass a critic's judgment on the doctrine that should be preached within them.

Εξοχος ἀνθρώπων κεφαλὴν καὶ εὐρείας ὤμους,”

Let it not, my lords, be considered amiss, that I take this up as an English rather than an Irish question. It is not merely because we have no Habeas Corpus law in existence (the antiquary may read of it, though we do not enjoy it)—it is not merely because my mind refuses itself to the delusion of imaginary freedom, and shrinks from the meanness of affecting an indignant haughtiness of spirit that belongs not to our condition, that I am disposed to argue it as an English question; but it is because I am aware that we have now a community of interest and of destiny that we never had before—because I am aware, that blended as we now are, the liberty of man must fall where it is highest, or rise where it is lowest, till it finds its common level in the common empire—and because, also, I wish that Englishmen may see, that we are conscious that nothing but mutual benevolence and sympathy can support the common interest that should bind us against the external or the intestine foe; and that we are willing, whenever that common interest is attacked, to make an honest and animated resistance, as in a common cause, and with as cordial and tender an anxiety for their safety as for our own.

Let me now briefly, because no subject can be shorter or plainer, consider the principle of local jurisdictions, and constructive crimes:

A man is bound to obedience, and punishable for disobedience of laws: first, because by living within their jurisdiction he avails himself of their protection; and this is no more than the reciprocity of protection and allegiance on a narrower scale—and secondly, because, by so living within their jurisdiction, he has the means of knowing them, and cannot be excused because of his ignorance of them. I should be glad to know, upon the authority of what manuscript, of what pocket-case, the soundness of these principles can be disputed? I should be glad to know upon what known principle of English law, a Chinese, or a Laplander, can be kidnapped into England, and arraigned for a crime which he committed under the pole, to the injury of a country which he had never seen—in violation of a law which he had never known, and to which he could not owe obedience—and, perhaps, for an act, the non-performance of which might have forfeited his liberty or his life to the laws of that country which he was bound to know, and was bound to obey. Very differently did our ancestors think of that subject;—they thought it essential to justice, that the jurisdiction of criminal law should be local and defined—that no man should be triable but there, where he was accused of having actually committed the offence; where the character of the prosecutor, where his own character was known, as well as the characters of the witnesses produced against him; and where he had the authority of legal process to enforce the attendance of witnesses for his defence. They were too simple to know any thing of the equity of criminal law. Poor Bracton or Fleta would have stared if you had asked them, “What, gentlemen, do you mean to say that such a crime as this shall escape from punishment?” Their answer would have been, no doubt, very simple and very foolish; they would have said, “We know there are many actions that we think bad actions, which yet are not punishable, because not triable by law; and which are not triable, because of the local limits of criminal jurisdictions.” And, my lords, to show with what a religious scrupulosity the locality of jurisdictions was observed, you have an instance in the most odious of all offences—treason only excepted—I mean the crime of wilful murder. By the common law, if a man in one county procured a murder to be committed, which was afterwards actually committed in another, such procurer could not be tried in either jurisdiction, because the crime was not completed in either. This defect was remedied by the act of Edward 6th, which made the author of the crime amenable to justice: but in what jurisdiction did it make him amenable? was it there where the murder was actually perpetrated? by no means, but there only where he had been guilty of the procurement, and where alone his accessorial offence was completed. And here you have the authority of parliament for this abstract position, that where a man living in one jurisdiction does an act, in consequence of which a crime is committed within another jurisdiction, he is by law triable only where his own personal act of procurement was committed, and not there where the procured or projected crime actually took effect. In answer to these known authorities of common law, has any statute, has a single decision or even dictum of a court been adduced? Or, in an age in which the pastry-cooks and snuff-shops have been defrauded of their natural right to these compositions that may be useful without being read, has even a single manuscript been offered to show the researches of these learned prosecutors, or to support their cause? No, my lords; there has not.

I said, my lords, that this was a fruit from the same tree that produced the stupid and wicked prosecutions of 1794: let me not be supposed to say it is a mere repetition of that attempt, without any additional aggravation. In 1794, the design—and odious enough it was—was confined to the doctrine of constructive guilt; but it did not venture upon the atrocious outrage of a substituted jurisdiction; the Englishman was tried on English ground, where he was known, where he could procure his witnesses, where he had lived, and where he was accused of a crime, whether actual or constructive; but the locality of the trial defeated the infernal malice of those prosecutions. The speeches of half the natural day, where every jury-man had his hour, were the knell of sleep, but they were not the knell of death. The project was exposed, and the destined victims were saved. A piece so damned could not safely be produced again on the same stage. It was thought wise, therefore, to let some little time pass, and then to let its author produce it on some distant provincial theatre for his own benefit, and at his own expense and hazard. To drag an English judge from his bench, or an English member of parliament from the senate, and in the open day, in the city of London, to strap him to the roof of a mail-coach, or pack him up in a waggon, or hand him over to an Irish bailiff, with a rope tied about his leg, to be goaded forward like an ox, on his way to Ireland, to be there tried for a constructive misdemeanor, would be an experiment, perhaps, not very safe to be attempted. These Merlins, therefore, thought it prudent to change the scene of their sorcery;

The people of England might, perhaps, enter into the feelings of such an exhibition with an officiousness of sympathy, not altogether for the benefit of the contrivers—

Nec coram populo natos Medea trucidet—

and it was thought wise to try the second production before spectators whose necks were pliant, and whose hearts were broken—where every man who dared to refuse his worship to the golden calf, would have the furnace before his eyes, and think that it was at once useless and dangerous to speak, and discreet at least, if it was not honest, to be silent—I cannot deny that it was prudent to try an experiment which, if successful, must reduce an Englishman to a state of slavery more abject and forlorn than that of the helots of Sparta, or the negroes of your plantations—for see, my lords, the extent of the construction now broadly and directly contended for at your bar:—The king's peace in Ireland, it seems, is distinct from his peace in England, and both are distinct from his peace in Scotland; and of course the same act may be a crime against each distinct peace, and severally and successively punishable in each country—so much more inveterate is the criminality of a constructive than of an actual offence. So that the same man for the same act against laws that he never heard of may be punished in Ireland, be then sent to England by virtue of the warrant of Mr. Justice Bell, endorsed by my lord Ellenborough; and after having his health, his hopes, and his property destroyed for his constructive offences against his majesty's peace in Ireland, and his majesty's peace in England, he may find that his majesty's peace in the Orkneys has after all, a vested remainder in his carcass; and, if it be the case of a libel, for the full time and term of fourteen years from the day of his conviction before the Scottish jurisdiction, to be fully completed and determined. Is there, my lords, can there be a man who hears me, that does not feel that such a construction of such a law would put every individual in society under the despotical dominion, would reduce him to be the despicable chattel, of those most likely to abuse their power, the profligate of the higher, and the abandoned of the lower orders? to the remorseless malice of a vindictive minister, to the servile instrumentality of a trading justice?—Can any man who hears me conceive any possible case of abduction, of rape or of murder, that may not be perpetrated, under the construction now shamelessly put forward?—Let us suppose a case: By this construction a person in England, by procuring a misdemeanor to be committed in Ireland, is constructively guilty in Ireland, and, of course, triable in Ireland—let us suppose that Mr. Justice Bell receives, or says here receives information, that the lady of an English nobleman wrote a letter to an Irish chambermaid, counselling her to steal a row of pins from an Irish pedlar, and that the said row of pins was, in consequence of such advice and counsel, actually stolen, against the Irish peace of our lord the king; suppose my lord Ellenborough, knowing the signature, and reverencing the virtue of his tried and valued colleague, endorses this warrant; is it not clear as the sun that this English lady may, in the dead of night be taken out of her bed, and surrendered to the mercy of two or three Irish bailiffs, if the captain who employed them should happen to be engaged in any contemporary adventure nearer to his heart, without the possibility of any legal authority interposing to save her, to be matronized in a journey by land, and a voyage by sea, by such modest and respectable guardians, to be dealt with during the journey as her companions might think proper—and to be dealt with afterwards by the worshipful correspondent of the noble and learned lord, Mr. Justice Bell, according to law?—I can without much difficulty, my lords, imagine, that after a year or two had been spent in accounts current, in drawing and redrawing for human flesh, between our worthy Bells and Medlicotts on this side of the water, and their noble or their ignoble correspondents on the other, they might meet to settle their accounts, and adjust their balances; I can conceive that the items might not be wholly destitute of curiosity:—Brother B. I take credit for the body of an English patriot.—Brother E. I set off against it that of an Irish judge.—Brother B. I charge you in account with three English bishops.—Brother E. I set off Mrs. Mac Lane and two of her chickens; petticoat against petticoat.—Brother B. I have sent you the body of a most intractable disturber, a fellow that has had the impudence to give a threshing to Buonaparté himself; I have sent you Sir Sidney.—Dearest brother E.—But I see my learned opponents smile—I see their meaning.—I may be told that I am putting imaginary and ludicrous, but not probable, and therefore, not supposable cases; but I answer, that reasoning would be worthy only of a slave, and disgraceful to a freeman. I answer, that the condition and essence of rational freedom is, not that the subject probably will not be abused, but that no man in the state shall be clothed with any discretionary power, under the colour and pretext of which he can dare to abuse him. As to probability, I answer, that in the mind of man there is no more instigating temptation to the most remorseless oppression, than the rancour and malice of irritated pride and wounded vanity.—To the argument of improbability I adduce in answer, the very fact, the very question in debate; nor to such answer can I see the possibility of any reply, save that the prosecutors are so heartily sick of the point of view into which they have put themselves by their prosecution, that they are not likely again to make a similar experiment. But when I see any man fearless of power, because it possibly, or probably, may not be exercised upon him, I am astonished at his fortitude; I am astonished at the tranquil courage of any man who can quietly see that a loaded cannon is brought to bear upon him, and that a fool is sitting at its touch-hole with a lighted match in his hand. And yet, my lords, upon a little reflection, what is it, after what we have seen, that should surprise us, however it may shock us? What have the last ten years of the world been employed in, but in destroying the land-marks of rights, and duties, and obligations? in substituting sounds in the place of sense? in substituting a vile and canting methodism in the place of social duty and practical honour? in suffering virtue to evaporate into phrase, and morality into hypocrisy and affectation?—We talk of the violations of Hamburgh or of Baden; we talk of the despotical and remorseless barbarian who tramples on the common privileges of the human being; who, in defiance of the most known and sacred rights, issues the brutal mandate of usurped authority; who brings his victim by force within the limits of a jurisdiction to which he never owed obedience, and there butchers him for a constructive offence. Does it not seem as if it were a contest whether we should be more scurrilous in invective, or more atrocious in imitation? Into what a condition must we be sinking, when we have the front to select, as the subjects of our obloquy, those very crimes which we have flung behind us in the race of profligate rivalry!

My lords, the learned counsel for the prosecutors have asserted, that this act of the forty-fourth of the king extends to all offences, no matter how long or previously to it they may have been committed. The words are, "That from and after the first day of August, 1804, if any person, &c. shall escape, &c."—Now, certainly nothing could be more convenient for the purpose of the prosecutors than to dismiss, as they have done, the words "escape and go into," altogether. If those words could have been saved from the ostracism of the prosecutors, they must have designated some act of the offenders, upon the happening or doing of which the operation of the statute might commence; but the temporary bar of these words they wave by the equity of their own construction, and thereby make it a retrospective law; and having so construed it a manifestly ex post facto law, they tell you it is no such thing, because it creates no new offence, and only makes the offender amenable who was not so before. The law professes to take effect only from and after the first of August, 1804:—Now, for eighteen months before that day, it is clear that Mr. Johnson could not be removed by any power existing from his country and his dwelling; but the moment the act took effect, it is made to operate upon an alleged offence, committed, if at all, confessedly eighteen months before. But another word as to the assertion, that it is not ex post facto, because it creates no new crime, but only makes the party amenable. The force of that argument is precisely this:—If this act inflicted deportation on the defendant by way of punishment after his guilt had been established by conviction, that would, no doubt, be tyrannical, because ex post facto; but here he suffers the deportation, while the law is bound to suppose him perfectly innocent; and that only by way of process to make him amenable, not by way of punishment: and surely he cannot be so unreasonable as not to feel the force of the distinction. How naturally, too, we find similar outrages resort to similar justifications! Such exactly was the defence of the forcible entry into Baden. Had that been a brutal violence committed in perpetration of the murder of the unfortunate victim, perhaps very scrupulous moralists might find something in it to disapprove; but his imperial majesty was too delicately tender of the rights of individuals and of nations, to do any act so flagrant as that would be, if done in that point of view; but his imperial majesty only introduced a clause of ne omittas into his warrant, whereby the worshipful Bells and Medlicotts that executed it, were authorised to disregard any supposed fantastical privilege of nations that gave sanctuary to traitors; and he did that from the purest motives; from as disinterested a love of justice as that of the present prosecutors, and not at all in the way of an ex post facto law, but merely as process to bring him in, and make him amenable to the competent and unquestionable jurisdiction of the bois de Boulogne.—Such are the wretched sophistries to which men are obliged to have recourse, when their passions have led them to do what no thinking man can regard without horror, what they themselves cannot look at without shame, and for which no legitimate reasoning can suggest either justification or excuse. Such are the principles of criminal justice, on which the first experiment is made in Ireland; but I venture to pledge myself to my fellow-subjects of Great Britain, that, if the experiment succeeds, they shall soon have the full benefit of that success. I venture to promise them, they shall soon have their full measure of this salutary system for making men "amenable," heaped and running over into their bosoms.

There now remains, my lords, one, and only one topic of this odious subject, to call for observation. The offence here appears by the return and the affidavits to be a libel upon the Irish government, published by construction in Westminster. Of the constructive commission of a crime in one place by an agent, who, perhaps, at the moment of the act, is in another hemisphere, you have already heard enough:—Here, therefore, we will consider it simply as an alleged libel upon the Irish government; and whether, as such, it is a charge coming within the meaning of the statute, and for which a common justice of peace in one kingdom is empowered to grant a warrant for conveying the person accused for trial into the other. Your lordships will observe, that in the whole catalogue of crimes for which a justice of peace may grant a warrant, there is not one that imposes upon him the necessity of deciding upon any matter of law, involving the smallest doubt or difficulty whatsoever. In treason, the overt-act; in felony, whether capital or not, the act; in misdemeanors, the simple act. The dullest justice can understand what is a breach of the peace, and can describe it in his warrant. It is no more than the description of a fact which the informer has seen and sworn to. But no libel comes within such a class, for it is decided over and over, that a libel is no breach of the peace; and upon that ground it was, that Mr. Wilkes, in 1763, was allowed the privilege of parliament, which privilege does not extend to any breach of the peace.

See then, my lords, what a task is imposed upon a justice of the peace, if he is to grant such a warrant upon such a charge: he no doubt may easily comprehend the allegation of the informer as to the fact of writing the supposed libel; in deciding whether the facts sworn amounted to a publication or not, I should have great apprehension of his fallibility; but if he got over those difficulties I should much fear for his competency to decide what given facts would amount to a constructive publication. But even if he did solve that question,—a point on which if I were a justice, I should acknowledge myself most profoundly ignorant,—he would then have to proceed to a labour in which I believe no man could expect him to succeed: that is, how far the paper sworn to was, in point of legal construction, libellous or not. I trust, this Court will never be prevailed upon to sanction, by its decision, a construction that would give to such a set of men a power so incompatible with every privilege of liberty, or of law. To say it would give an irresistible power of destroying the liberty of the press in Ireland would, I am aware, be but a silly argument, where such a thing has long ceased to exist; but I have for that very reason a double interest now, as a subject of the empire, in that noble guardian of liberty in the sister nation. When my own lamp is broken, I have a double interest in the preservation of my neighbour's. But if every man in England, who dares to observe, no matter how honestly and justly, upon the conduct of Irish ministers, is liable to be torn from his family and dragged hither by an Irish bailiff, for a constructive libel against the Irish government, and upon the authority of an Irish warrant, no man can be such a fool as not to see the consequence. The inevitable consequence is this: that at this awful crisis, when the weal, not of this empire only, but of the whole civilized world, depends on the steady faith and consolidated efforts of these two countries—when Ireland is become the right arm of England—when every thing that draws the common interest and affection closer gives the hope of life—when every thing that has even a tendency to relax that sentiment is a symptom of death,—even at such a crisis may the rashness or folly of those entrusted with its management so act as to destroy its internal prosperity and repose, and lead it into the two-fold fatal error, of mistaking its natural enemies for its friends, and its natural friends for its natural enemies; without any man being found so romantically daring as to give notice of the approaching destruction.

My lords, I suppose the learned counsel will do here what they have done in the other court: they will assert, that this libel is not triable here; and they will argue, that so false and heinous a production surely ought to be triable somewhere. As to the first position, I say the law is directly against them. From a very early stage of the discussion, the gentlemen for the prosecution thought it wise for their clients to take a range into the facts much more at large than they appeared on the return to the writ, or even by the affidavits that have been made; and they have done this to take the opportunity of aggravating the guilt of the defendant, and at the same time of panegyrising their clients; they have therefore not argued upon the libel generally as a libel, but they have thought it prudent to appear perfectly acquainted with the charges which it contains:—they have therefore assumed, that it relates to the transactions of the twenty-third of July, 1803, and that the guilt of the defendant was, that he wrote that letter in Ireland, which was afterwards published in England; not by himself, but by some other persons. Now, on these facts, nothing can be clearer than that he is triable here. If it be a libel, and if he wrote it here, and it was published in England, most manifestly there must have been a precedent publication, not merely by construction of law, in Ireland, but a publication by actual fact; and for this plain reason, if you for a moment suppose the libel in his possession (and if he did in fact write it, I can scarcely conceive that it was not, unless he wrote it perhaps by construction), there were no physical means of transmitting it to England that would not amount to a publication here; because, if he put it into the post-office, or gave it to a messenger to carry thither, that would be complete evidence of publication against him: so would the mere possession of the paper, in the hands of the witness who appeared and produced it, be perfect evidence, if not accounted for or contradicted, to charge him with the publication; so that really I am surprised how gentlemen could be betrayed into positions so utterly without foundation. They would have acted just as usefully for their clients, if they had admitted, what every man knows to be the fact, that is, that they durst not bring the charge before an Irish jury. The facts of that period were too well understood. The Irish public might have looked at such a prosecution with the most incredulous detestation; and if they had been so indiscreet as to run the risk of coming before an Irish jury, instead of refuting the charges against them as a calumny, they would have exposed themselves to the peril of establishing the accusation, and of raising the character of the man whom they had the heart to destroy, because he had dared to censure them. Let not the learned gentlemen, I pray, suppose me so ungracious as to say, that this publication, which has given so much pain to their clients, is actually true; I cannot personally know it to be so, nor do I say so, nor is this the place or the occasion to say that it is so. I mean only to speak positively to the question before you, which is matter of law. But as the gentlemen themselves thought it meet to pronounce an eulogy on their clients, I thought it rather unseemly not to show that I attended to them: I have most respectfully done so; I do not contradict any praise of their virtues or their wisdom, and I only wish to add my very humble commendation of their prudence and discretion, in not bringing the trial of the present libel before a jury of this country.

The learned counsel have not been contented with abusing this libel as a production perfectly known to them; but they have wandered into the regions of fancy. No doubt the other judges, to whom those pathetic flights of forensic sensibility were addressed, must have been strongly affected by them. The learned gentlemen have supposed a variety of possible cases. They have supposed cases of the foulest calumniators aspersing the most virtuous ministers. Whether such supposed cases have been suggested by fancy, or by fact, it is not for me to decide; but I beg leave to say, that it is as allowable to us as to them to put cases of supposition—

Possum, invidear?

Let me then, my lords, put an imaginary case of a different kind:—Let me suppose that a great personage, entrusted with the safety of the citadel (meaning and wishing perhaps well, but misled by those lacquered vermin that swarm in every great hall), leaves it so loosely guarded, that nothing but the gracious interposition of Providence has saved it from the enemy. Let me suppose another great personage going out of his natural department, and under the supposed authority of high station, disseminating such doctrines as tend to root up the foundation of society—to destroy all confidence between man and man—and to impress the great body of the people with a delusive and desperate opinion, that their religion could dissolve or condemn the sacred obligations that binds them to their country—that their rulers have no reliance upon their faith, and are resolved to shut the gates of mercy against them.

Suppose a good and virtuous man saw, that such doctrines must necessarily torture the nation into such madness and despair, as to render them unfit for any system of mild or moderate government; that, if on one side, bigotry or folly shall inject their veins with fire, such a fever must be kindled as can be allayed only by keeping a stream of blood perpetually running from the other, and that the horrors of martial law must become the direful but inevitable consequence. In such a case let me ask you what would be his indispensable duty?—it would be, to avert such dreadful dangers, by exposing the conduct of such persons; by holding up the folly of such bigoted and blind enthusiasm to condign derision and contempt; and painfully would he feel that on such an occasion he must dismiss all forms and ceremonies; and that to do his duty with effect, he must do it without mercy. He should also foresee, that a person so acting when he returned to those to whom he was responsible, would endeavour to justify himself by defaming the country which he had abused—for calumny is the natural defence of the oppressor: he should, therefore, so reduce his personal credit to its just standard, that his assertions might find no more belief than they deserved. Were such a person to be looked on as a mere private individual, charity and good-nature might suggest not a little in his excuse. An inexperienced man, new to the world, and in the honeymoon of preferment, would run no small risk of having his head turned in Ireland. The people in our island are by nature penetrating, sagacious, artful and comic—‘natio comœda est.’ In no country under heaven would an ass be more likely to be hood-winked, by having his ears drawn over his eyes, and acquire that phantastical alacrity that makes dullness disposable to the purposes of humorous malice, or interested imposture. In Ireland, a new great man could get the freedom of a science as easily as of a corporation, and become a doctor, by construction, of the whole Encyclopædia; and great allowance might be made under such circumstances for indiscretions and mistakes, as long as they related only to himself; but the moment they become public mischiefs, they lose all pretensions to excuse—the very ambition of incapacity is a crime not to be forgiven; and however painful it may be to inflict punishment, it must be remembered, that mercy to the delinquent would be treason to the public.

I can the more easily understand the painfulness of the conflict between charity and duty, because at this moment I am labouring under it myself; and I feel it the more acutely, because I am confident, that the paroxysms of passion that have produced these public discussions have been bitterly repented of. I think, also, that I should not act fairly if I did not acquit my learned opponents of all share whatsoever in this prosecution—they have too much good sense to have advised it; on the contrary, I can easily suppose Mr. Attorney-General sent for to give counsel and comfort to his patient; and after hearing no very concise detail of his griefs, his resentments and his misgivings, methinks I hear the answer that he gives, after a pause of sympathy and reflexion;—“No, sir, do not proceed in such a business; you will only expose yourself to scorn in one country, and to detestation in the other. You know you durst not try him here, where the whole kingdom would be his witness. If you should attempt to try him there, where he can have no witness, you will have both countries upon your back. An English jury would never find him guilty. You will only confirm the charge against yourself; and be the victim of an impotent, abortive malice. If you should have any ulterior project against him, you will defeat that also; for they who might otherwise concur in the design, will be shocked and ashamed of the violence and folly of such a tyrannical proceeding, and will make a merit of protecting him, and of leaving you in the lurch. What you say of your own feelings, I can easily conceive.—You think you have been much exposed by those letters; but then remember, my dear sir, that a man can claim the privilege of being made ridiculous or hateful by no publications but his own. Vindictive critics have their rights, as well as bad authors. The thing is bad enough at best; but, if you go on, you will make it worse—it will be considered an attempt to degrade the Irish bench and the Irish bar—you are not aware what a nest of hornets you are disturbing.—One inevitable consequence you do not foresee—you will certainly create the very thing in Ireland that you are so afraid of, a newspaper;—think of that, and keep yourself quiet. And in the mean time, console yourself with reflecting, that no man is laughed at for a long time;—every day will procure some new ridicule that must supersede him.”—Such, I am satisfied, was the counsel given;—but I have no apprehension for my client, because it was not taken. Even if it should be his fate to be surrendered to his keepers—to be torn from his family—to have his obsequies performed by torch light—to be carried to a foreign land, and to a strange tribunal, where no witness can attest his innocence, where no voice that he ever heard can be raised in his defence, where he must stand mute, not of his own malice, but the malice of his enemies—yes, even so, I see nothing for him to fear—that all gracious Being, that shields the feeble from the oppressor, will fill his heart with hope, and confidence, and courage; his sufferings will be his armour, and his weakness will be his strength: he will find himself in the hands of a brave, a just, and a generous nation—he will find that the bright examples of her Russells and her Sidneys have not been lost to her children; they will behold him with sympathy and respect, and his persecutors with shame and abhorrence; they will feel, too, that what is then his situation, may to-morrow be their own—but their first tear will be shed for him, and the second only for themselves—their hearts will melt in his acquittal; they will convey him kindly and fondly to their shore; and he will return in triumph to his country; to the threshold of his sacred home, and to the weeping welcome of his delighted family; he will find that the darkness of a dreary and a lingering night hath at length passed away, and that joy cometh in the morning.—No, my lords, I have no fear for the ultimate safety of my client. Even in these very acts of brutal violence that have been committed against him, do I hail the flattering hope of final advantage to him, and not only of final advantage to him but of better days and more prosperous fortune for this afflicted country—that country of which I have so often abandoned all hope, and which I have been so often determined to quit for ever.

*Sape vale dicto multa sum deinde locutus,
Et quasi discedens oscula summa dabam,
Indulgens animo, pes tardus erat.*

But I am reclaimed from that infidel despair—I am satisfied that while a man is suffered to live, it is an intimation from Providence that he has some duty to discharge, which it is mean and criminal to decline: had I been guilty of that ignominious flight, and gone to pine in the obscurity of some distant retreat, even in that grave I should have been haunted by those passions by which my life had been agitated—

—————Vivis quæ cura—————
—————Eadem sequitur tellure repostos.

And if the transactions of this day had reached me, I feel, how my heart would have been agonized by the shame of the desertion, nor would my sufferings have been mitigated by a sense of the feebleness of that aid, or the smallness of that service which I could render or withdraw. They would have been aggravated by the consciousness that, however feeble or worthless they were, I should not have dared to thieve them from my country.—I have repented—I have staid—and I am at once rebuked and rewarded by the happier hopes that I now entertain.—In the anxious sympathy of the public—in the anxious sympathy of my learned brethren, do I catch the happy presage of a brighter fate for Ireland. They see, that within these sacred walls, the cause of liberty and of man may be pleaded with boldness and heard with favour. I am satisfied they will never forget the great trust, of which they alone are now the remaining depositaries. While they continue to cultivate a sound and literate philosophy—a mild and tolerating christianity—and to make both the sources of a just, and liberal, and constitutional jurisprudence, I see every thing for us to hope. Into their hands therefore, with the most affectionate confidence in their virtue, do I commit these precious hopes. Even I may live long enough yet to see the approaching completion, if not the perfect accomplishment of them. Pleased shall I then resign the scene to fitter actors—pleased shall I lay down my wearied head to rest, and say “Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.”

Mr. William Johnson.*—My Lords; As the counsel for the crown will be entitled to the reply, I should be precluded from any opportunity of addressing the Court upon this subject, if I did not offer myself at this moment to its consideration. I feel that I have more than a common claim to be heard on this occasion. Certainly no man ever acted under the impulse of a more imperious duty, or had a more afflicting task to perform. In what I shall say, however, to the Court, I shall confine myself to a discussion of the legal questions now before it; and will endeavour not to entertain a thought, or utter an expression, connected with my own personal feelings.

Your lordships will determine the question now before you upon the construction of this act, not from any opinion of what it ought to extend to, but from what, according to the established rules of interpretation, it does extend to. Even if it should be your opinion, that it would have been matter of prudent regulation, that the provisions of this act should embrace the present case; you will yet, if I show you that it is, at all events, a casus omisus, leave it as the act has done. You will be the more inclined to do so, if in the course of my observations I should show you, that to extend this act to the case now before you, would be to subvert the most acknowledged principles of justice, and the admitted common law rights of the meanest individual in society. You will not legislate; and particularly you will not do so to have your share in the common destruction of law and liberty. In the interpretation of a statute, levelling by the construction contended for the ancient bulwarks of our constitution, you will go for such a purpose as little way as possible. If I show you, that from the whole view of this act, the committing a crime by actual presence; and escaping or removing after such commission were alone in the contemplation of the legislature; and that the title, recitals, and provisions of this act regard these alone, you will not extend it to cases of the constructive commission of offences, neither within the title of this act, the recited mischief, nor the remedy provided by it.

The application now before the Court on the part of the defendant, is to be discharged from an illegal arrest. It depends upon a recent act of parliament, upon the construction of which you have no judicial decisions. The return to the Habeas Corpus which has been sued out by the defendant, states a warrant of the chief justice of England, grounded on an indictment found at Middlesex against the defendant, for the publication of a libel. This warrant has been endorsed by an Irish justice of the peace, under a presumed authority, given by the 44th of the present king, chap. 92. Under this endorsement the defendant has been arrested; and it now appears, by uncontroverted documents before the Court, that the gentleman applying for his discharge has been a continuing resident of this part of the United Kingdom, from a period before which it is absolutely impossible that the offence, with which he stands charged, could have been committed; and within which, he could not himself have done any act in England, criminal or otherwise; or within such period have removed therefrom. The question, therefore, will be, whether under all these circumstances, appearing as well upon the part of the return itself, as on the uncontradicted affidavits made on the part of the defendant, this warrant of lord Ellenborough, so endorsed, is a sufficient authority under which to arrest and hold the present defendant.

Your lordships must observe, that the only power you can exercise in this case is to discharge. You must either not intermeddle at all, or intermeddle to this extent. If the arrest be legal, though only on process, and for a misdemeanor, your authority is at an end. There have been times when such a proposition would have startled the constitutional feelings of a judge of the land: whether it be right, that such times should have passed away, is not for me to argue. Such is the present law; but whether it extends to the case before you—that is, to the case of an offence bailable of common right, is one of the questions on which I mean to trouble you.

Some crude and indigested opinions have been thrown out in the course of this discussion as if this Court could take bail in a case circumstanced like the present: it may, therefore, be necessary to examine this matter a little upon principle:—The present act embraces the three countries, England, Ireland, and Scotland. The legal jurisdictions of these countries are perfectly distinct; and in legal contemplation so are their laws. The principle of distinctness is as strong between the laws of England and Ireland, as between the laws of Scotland and either of the other countries; though the distinctness in point of fact may not be so great. Let us then, for the sake of argument, suppose that the warrant in this case had been issued in Scotland, for in sound reasoning it will make no difference, though it may strike common apprehension more: is there any tribunal in this country which can determine whether the warrant be or be not conformable to the law of that country? For instance, what tribunal in this country has judicial knowledge of the crimes of hamesucken and sorning? yet these are capital offences by the law of Scotland. A tribunal which has not knowledge of the law can have none of the offence, and therefore cannot act upon it. In Wilkes's case, my lord Camden lays it down, that it is sufficient if the offence appear in the warrant on which a party is arrested; because that is the guide to the magistrate in taking or refusing bail. This is sufficient upon principle; and I will not trouble the court upon the practical absurdity which would follow, from any attempt to take bail in this country for offences committed in England or Scotland. They will shortly appear from a few simple questions:—To whom is the recognizance to be returned? Of what court can it be made a record? By what process is the return of it to be enforced? If forfeited, where is it to be estreated? and if estreated, how to be levied?

Enough has been said, and much more might be said, to show, that as the law now stands, this court, much less any inferior tribunal, cannot take bail for offences alleged to be committed in England or Scotland. I use this argument merely as an argument of construction; and to show, that if you can avoid it, you will not give this act a construction which would militate with the common law right of the subject—that is, of being bailed for a bailable offence within the jurisdiction where the arrest is made. If this act should be so construed, I will venture to say, it will stand a single and awful exception in the history of English legislation. It must, therefore, be your anxious desire, if the established rules of construction will allow you, to confine the operation of this act to offences not bailable; no mischief will then arise: for to such offenders it can make no difference, whether the jurisdiction within which they are arrested have or have not an authority to bail. Let us examine this matter a little more minutely:—

If this act of parliament extend to one misdemeanor it extends to all. I throw out of the present discussion all consideration of the particular quality of the misdemeanor charged upon the present defendant. Your lordships have nothing to do with any supposed intent which the persons who brought in this bill, at this particular time, might have had. You will not trouble yourselves with the consideration, whether any hope was entertained, either by an adoption of the letter of certain expressions, or by any ingenious interpretation of doubtful and ambiguous passages, of bringing within this act any particular case, excluded by its general spirit and policy and the settled principles of law: with such considerations you will have nothing to do. You sit here to ascertain the meaning of the legislature, and to arrive at it through the known maxims of law, and the established rules of construction.

I shall endeavour to show, in the first place, that you ought not to extend this act to bailable offences; because you would thereby repeal the Habeas Corpus act, and take away by construction the common law right of every subject in the realm: and secondly, that though you should feel yourselves bound to do so, you will yet be of opinion, that this act can relate only to offences committed by actual presence in that part of Great Britain or Ireland in which the offence is charged to have been done, and consequent escape or removal; and that it would be pregnant with the utmost absurdity, and effect the most unheard of solecism in legislation, to extend it to cases where the person charged resided out of that part of the United Kingdom in which he is charged at the time of the commission of the alleged offence—in other words, that avoidance of justice, by removal from the place where the act is done which is charged to be an offence, is an indispensable requisite to give operation to this law.

Before I particularly examine the first head of this argument, permit me to take notice of an observation made by your lordship in another place:—Your lordship said, and truly, that before the passing of the act now before you, persons charged with capital offences might be arrested and transmitted from one kingdom to the other for trial in the place where their crime was alleged to have been perpetrated; and that a special saving and provision in the English Habeas Corpus act recognizes this proceeding, and provides, that it may thereafter take place, as it had done before. Your lordship then said, that it is recited by the present act, that there existed no sufficient provision in the law of either countries for the arrest and transmission of offenders; and your objection is, that this recital cannot be accounted for, unless this act be extended beyond capital cases, for that the law had already provided for such cases. In my humble judgment, this objection may receive a complete answer. The words referred to in the present act are, “That there was no sufficient provision for the transmission of such offenders.” This expression admits there was some existing provision of the kind alluded to. Let us see what it was:—

By the statute of Westminster the first, commitments per speciale mandatum domini regis were declared irreplevisable. By the equity of the statute this was in time extended to commitments by order of the privy council, where it was supposed the king presided. At length, in point of practice, this authority came to be exercised by the secretary of state; not by any authority of his as secretary of state, but as being constructively a commitment per speciale mandatum domini regis. You will see this history of the authority of the secretary of state to commit, stated by my lord Camden, in his famous argument given in the judgment he pronounced in the case, Entick, v. Carrington and others, reported in the 11th volume of the state trials, Mr. Hargrave's edition.* Under the exercise of this authority it was, that persons in England, charged with capital felonies done abroad, were arrested and transmitted to the scene of their guilt to receive trial. Applied to the cases of such offenders, the foundations of such an authority were not likely to be very critically examined. Independent of the recognition of it by the provision alluded to in the act of Habeas Corpus, there is little in such a proceeding to satisfy the feelings of a constitutional lawyer: not that any man could object to the end for which, in the instances under consideration, it was exercised. The heart and mind of every man accedes spontaneously to the act, by which the traitor, murderer, or felon, is brought back to the scene of his guilt, to receive the punishment due to his crime; and the exercise of a vigour beyond the law would be long submitted to when applied to such offenders. The provision in the English Habeas Corpus act has, however, given a sanction to what might have well been questioned before; and I admit, that since that time, the authority so exercised could not be questioned.

It was, however, extremely defective.—There was but one tribunal that could act, and that fixed to a particular place, and not open to the subject ex debito justitiæ. From the nature of it, it must have been difficult to put in motion, and almost ineffectual to prevent farther escape upon the moment of discovery. Flowing merely from the prerogative, and to be exercised only at discretion, the protection of the crown would, in all such cases be insufficient for the aggrieved subject. The reservoirs of justice should, if I may use the expression, be always open, and scattered through the land. This was to be found only in one corner of the kingdom, and was under the key of whatever individual was the minister of the day. He could not be compelled to act by any of the ordinary existing authorities in the realm; and when he did, it was a kind of phenomenon in a regulated government like ours, to see the secretary of state doing the duty of a justice of the peace, and a king's messenger substituted in the place of the constable. Upon the whole, it was a jurisdiction neither fixed in its principles, certain in its operation, nor open at all times to the subjects of the realm; and it was of a kind utterly anomalous in the constitution.

The difficulties arising from this undefined and irregular authority in the arrest and transmission of traitors and felons from one kingdom to another, had been long felt and often complained of, and well deserved to be removed by statutable provision—such provision had been for centuries as necessary as now, but evils have frequently a long reign before legislative remedies are applied. The state of things, therefore, as I have here detailed them, fully accounts for the recital, that “there was no sufficient provision for the arrest and transmission of offenders,” even supposing the act confined to cases not bailable of right.

Let us now see, if the terms made use of in this act give any additional force to the opinion, that it ought to be confined to the majora crimina. The mischief recited in the section now under consideration is, “The escape of felons and other malefactors from one kingdom to another, whereby their offences frequently remain unpunished.”—It may not be immaterial just to remark here, that if it had been intended to include persons guilty of mere misdemeanors in this description, the recital, as to them, ought to have been, “that by escape from one kingdom to another their offences always remained unpunished,” unless a voluntary desertion of their country were considered (as perhaps in a municipal view it ought to be), as a sufficient punishment for any offence of that nature of which they could be guilty. In truth, the phrase felons and malefactors, used by the legislature, gives considerable colour to the inference I am endeavouring to draw. I admit, from the words felons and other malefactors, you must understand felons, and malefactors other than felons. Still I think it reasonable to suppose, that the legislature intended felonies and other crimes of the same stamp; or, in other words, the majora crimina; such as are not bailable by the ordinary authorities. Many such crimes, not felonies, may be found by a slight examination of the criminal code of England.

But there existed a still farther necessity for the use of some term beside felons. The act relates not only to England, but to Scotland. The word felons would not answer for this purpose; it is not descriptive, as I believe, of any class of offenders in the Scottish law. The word malefactors, therefore, being free from the rigid interpretation which a term merely technical must always receive, and being, in ordinary speech, descriptive of the higher classes of offenders, was used to take in such of this description in England as the word felons would not extend to, and to include all offenders in Scotland of a like kind. If the word malefactors had been used for the purpose of including offenders of every description, the introduction of the word felons was not only useless, but productive of confusion and uncertainty in a description, which, without it, would be perfectly clear.

But this will appear more manifest from a short review of the different acts heretofore passed in England on this subject, comparing them, as far as is necessary for this part of the question, with the act now before you. The acts I allude to are the 23rd of George 2nd, c. 26, s. 11; the 24th of George 2nd, c. 55, s. 1; and the 13th of George 3rd, c. 31. The two first acts relate to the arrest and transmission of offenders from county to county within England, and the last to the arrest and transmission of felons and other malefactors from England to Scotland, and vice versâ. The present act is, in truth, compounded, mutatis mutandis, of these several acts. It is contended on the other side, that the mischief recited by those acts, and the remedy provided for that mischief, between kingdom and kingdom, and county and county, are exactly commensurate; that is, that they equally extend to all offenders:—now, it is remarkable, that in the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, and the 24th of Geo. 2nd, and the first part of the present act, all of which relate to arrest and transmission between county and county, within the same kingdom, one uniform preamble is adopted of the description of persons within the purview of these acts, viz. all persons against whom a warrant shall be issued; but, in the acts which relate to arrest and transmission from kingdom to kingdom, the legislature, expressly rejecting the preamble which was before them in the acts relating to county and county, adopt a new and different preamble in the act of 1773, i. e. stat. 13th Geo. 3rd, and, instead of the words, "all persons against whom a warrant shall be issued," the description is "felons and other malefactors, making their escape, &c."—This distinction in the description of the persons intended to be affected by those acts respectively is studiously preserved in the act now before you, and remarkably preserved, because this one act includes and embodies the provisions of all the rest; and if the construction now insisted on by the counsel for the Crown be the true one, the description "all persons against whom a warrant shall have been issued," would have been the true description to have adopted in the preamble, not only to the regulations relating to county and county within the same kingdom, but to the regulations for the arrest and transmission of offenders between kingdom and kingdom. Does this variance of language in the same instrument induce no variance of construction? and can we suppose the legislature used it for the mere purpose of perplexing what would be plain and explicit without it?

It follows from what I have said, that if you extend the operation of this act to offences not bailable, or, in other words, to misdemeanors of every description, you, in effect, repeal the Habeas Corpus acts of both countries. It would have been a strong measure in the legislature to have repealed those acts even by express words, but I will venture to say, it would be a still bolder measure in any court of justice to do so, by the construction of a law, which, by the ordinary rules of construction, may be construed otherwise.

I have stated it to be the common law right of every subject of this realm to be bailed for a bailable offence (if he tender sufficient bail), on the spot where he is arrested. The act before you studiously provides for this, in case of arrest in one county for an offence committed in another; the party must be bailed on the spot where he is arrested. Yet it is contended, that if the warrant has issued in Great Britain for the pettiest offence known to the law, the individual arrested may be carried from the remotest corner of this part of the united kingdom to England or Scotland, as the case may be, to look for bail, not where his connexions live, not where he is known, but in a place where perhaps he has never set his foot, where his name has never been heard of, nor even his language understood. Can the mighty power of a state be called into action to work so foul a wrong as this, and in a case so disproportionate to its efforts, and so far beneath its care? If the construction now contended for be true with respect to this country, it must be equally true with respect to England and Scotland. There is a provision in the Habeas Corpus act of England, that no inhabitant of England should be sent prisoner into Ireland, &c.; and every such imprisonment is adjudged illegal; an action of false imprisonment is given to the party aggrieved, and the penalties of a premunire denounced against the offender; and he is rendered incapable of a pardon from the crown—31st Charles 2nd, c. 2, s. 12. This security to the subject against the strong hand of power, by whomsoever exercised, is confined to cases either where no offence is alleged against the party so taken and imprisoned, or where he is charged with an offence not capital. It of course excludes the possibility, if it be not repealed by the present law, of arresting and transmitting an inhabitant of England to this country for any alleged misdemeanor; but the construction now contended for renders its provisions absolutely nugatory, and the proudest subject in England may be sent here, without the possibility of bail in England, upon the most groundless and wanton accusation that malice ever framed, and for the lowest and most trivial offence known in the criminal code.

I have said thus much to show, that you ought not to extend this law by construction to cases bailable of common right, because by doing so, you would impute to the legislature as foul a wrong as could be worked in a country having any pretensions to a free constitution. On this head of argument, however, I will not trouble the Court farther. It is my intention to argue this question with the most perfect candour, and I have no hesitation in declaring, that this is not the part of the case on which I mean confidently to rest the cause of my client.

I proceed, therefore, to the second head of the argument:

My position is, that this act is confined to persons who having by actual presence committed an offence in a particular jurisdiction, avoid, by removal out of that jurisdiction after the offence committed, the ready process of the law issuing within it, whereby, in the words of the act, "their offences often remain unpunished."—I shall be content to depart from this hall a proscribed driveller, if, upon this part of the case, I leave the smallest doubt upon any unprejudiced legal mind. The act of the 44th of the king, upon which the present question arises, is founded upon three previous acts, passed in England in pari materia, and, if I may so speak, embodies them all. The title corresponds with this origin, and bespeaks directly its parentage. It is "An act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from county to county." Its regulations are internal and external. The provisions as to the first are taken in terms from the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd in England, which I have already mentioned, and as to the latter, from the 13th of the present king in England. The 11th section of the first of those acts contains all that relates to the present question, and the preamble of that section states, that "persons against whom warrants are granted by justices of the peace for the several counties within this kingdom, escape into other counties out of the jurisdiction of the justices granting such warrants, and thereby avoid being punished for the offences wherewith they are charged;" and it enacts, "that in case any person against whom a legal warrant shall be issued by any justice or justices of the peace for any county, &c. shall escape, it shall be lawful for any justice, &c. for any county, &c. to which such person shall have gone or escaped, to endorse such warrant, &c. and to cause such person to be apprehended, and sent to the justice or justices granting such warrant, or to some other justice or justices of the county, &c. from whence such person shall have gone or escaped, to be dealt with according to law," &c.

The slightest perusal of this clause shows the description of persons who were the objects of this law—"persons against whom warrants are granted, escaping, &c." The issuing of a warrant is a precedent fact, and the words, "against whom warrants are granted," designate and mark out the individuals, who, coming under this description, may, by escaping, become the objects of the law. They must be persons against whom a warrant has issued, and the provision in the enacting part is, that "it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county, &c. to which such person shall have gone or escaped," that is, a person against whom a warrant has issued. Thus then the preamble reciting the mischief, and the clause providing the remedy, attach solely upon individuals, who "being persons against whom warrants have issued," shall escape: that is, the mischief recited and remedy applied, are expressly confined to the escape of persons against whom warrants have issued; in other words, to escape, after warrant issued: and in truth, in a legal technical sense, such persons alone can be guilty of an escape. Now, assuming for a moment, what indeed is pretty clear, that the object of the law was the apprehension of persons committing a breach of the peace by actual presence, it is manifest that the provisions of this act were extremely defective. No person quitting the jurisdiction after the offence committed, and BEFORE warrant granted, could be affected by the provisions of it, so that if the conscience of the offender took the alarm before any process issued for his apprehension, this law as to him was a dead letter.

This imperfection was soon felt, for in the very next year, the 24th of Geo. 2nd, c. 55 was passed for the express purpose of doing it away. Its only title is, "An act for amending and making more effectual the former act." It recites the entire enacting clause of the former act, and then goes on in the following words, "And whereas such offender or offenders may reside and be in some other county, &c.

out of the jurisdiction of the justice or justices granting such warrant as aforesaid, before the granting such warrant, and without escaping or going out of the county &c. after such warrant granted." Now it is remarkable, that the word offender does not occur in any part of the enacting clause of the 11th section of the 23rd Geo. 2nd, recited in the 24th. To whom then does the word such offender used in the preamble of this act, relate? It must relate to some description of person mentioned in the 23rd Geo. 2nd, as it follows immediately the recital of that act—it manifestly refers to the description of persons about whom alone that act was conversant, that is, persons escaping out of their jurisdiction.—Now, why does the act call such persons offenders? Because escape was, of itself, and, without any other guilt whatsoever, an high offence at the common law, and attended with a forfeiture of goods and chattels, even though the person escaping was afterwards acquitted of the charge for which he fled; and the formal direction to juries at this day upon criminal trials, to inquire if the culprit fled for the same or not, shows what the law is upon this subject.

In legal contemplation it is in this sense alone that the persons described in the 23rd Geo. 2nd, can be called offenders. Let us therefore substitute the terms of the definition in the room of the term defined, and the recital of the 24th Geo. 2nd will run thus, "And whereas persons escaping may reside and be in some other county, &c. before the granting of such warrant, and without escaping out of the county, &c. after the granting of such warrant." If the act had not meant to confine itself to offenders escaping, its language would have been very different; it would have recited the mischief thus, "Whereas persons committing offences, or procuring offences to be committed in one county, may reside and be in another county, &c." Now, the words "and without escaping after warrant granted," are the same as "not having escaped after warrant granted," and are as complete a negative pregnant as can occur in any form of speech whatsoever, and directly imply escape before warrant granted. I therefore consider this as a full and legislative declaration of the description of persons to whom those acts are to apply, and on what kind of persons residing or being in another county, out of the jurisdiction of the justice granting the warrant, it meant to attach its provisions. The first act expressly relates to persons escaping only. The second directly refers to that description under the words "such offenders." The first is confined to escape after warrant granted; the second extends to escape before or after; and both are confined to offenders escaping.

But this will be still more manifest if you consider what is the ultimate evil stated by the 23rd Geo. 2nd, against which it was necessary to provide a legislative remedy; it is that thereby, that is, by escaping, such persons avoid being punished: impunity of offence by escape or removal out of one jurisdiction into another is the public grievance; no new or other mischief is recited by the statute of the 24th Geo. 2nd. Is it then unfair to conclude, or rather must we not necessarily do so, that the mischief intended to be guarded against by both these acts, and fully and clearly expressed in the first, is the same; but that the remedy provided by the first was not co-extensive as it ought to be with the evil? The second act therefore was passed, and was intended to embrace all persons who manifested their guilt by flight; the first having preposterously confined its operation to this manifestation taking place after warrant, though in truth the consciousness of crime, which is always coeval with the act, was likely in most instances to produce this manifestation long before. It follows, from the view I have taken of these acts, that actual violators of the public peace escaping or removing out of the jurisdiction where they had committed the offence, and thereby avoiding the punishment due to their offence, are the objects of this law—none others are within the mischief—none others ought to be within the remedy.

Any difficulty or embarrassment in the construction of those acts arises from the legal fiction, that in misdemeanors all are principals. In any higher species of crimes, in which the distinction between principal and accessory is preserved, it could never have occurred to any man, that the accessorial offender remaining quietly where he had been guilty of the accessorial offence, and in which place alone by the law of England he must be tried, if tried at all, could, under the operation of this law, be taken under a warrant issued where the principal offence was committed, and endorsed, according to the provisions of the law now under examination.

Now let us apply these acts, both with respect to the mischief recited in them and the remedy provided by them, to persons charged with misdemeanors procured by them to be committed in another jurisdiction than that in which they live, and who have never removed from the place in which the act of procurement was committed. For the sake of a short expression and one sufficiently clear I will describe such persons as persons charged with a constructive misdemeanor. The expression though not strictly accurate is sufficiently so for the present purpose, it being understood that I mean thereby persons who, by advice or other procurement, effect the commission of a misdemeanor in another county than that in which they reside, and are therefore in law, if resident within the realm of England at the time of such procurement, principals in the misdemeanor so advised or procured to be committed within another county of the same realm—my reason for thus confining the accessorial and principal offence to the same part of the United Kingdom will be seen hereafter. The fundamental mischief to be provided against by those acts is the avoiding punishment by offenders, and that in truth by the only way in which punishment can be avoided, by some agency on the part of the offender.—Now by what process of reasoning can this apply to a man who never stirs from the usual place of his abode, who lives in the scene of every act of his life, and can be reached without difficulty or delay by any legal process issuing within the jurisdiction in which he lives?—has such a man done any act whereby he can avoid punishment?—is he not ex hypothesi so far from avoiding legal process, and thereby avoiding punishment, amenable to the authority of every justice within the county in which he lives?—The offence, in which in legal contemplation he is considered as a principal, being committed elsewhere makes no difference—any justice of the peace may commit an offender within his jurisdiction though for an offence committed out of it. This is fully laid down in Comyns, title Justices of the Peace; and indeed in every book of authority treating of the duty of justices of the peace.—What reason then, for any purpose of public justice, can there be for giving the celerity of a courier to legal process against a man who has never removed from the jurisdiction to whose authority he was subject every hour of his life, who has furnished no conclusion of guilt by flight, and who, so far from avoiding punishment by any act of his, remains within the level of that authority which is always pointed at offenders within its jurisdiction?

In cases of escape the remedy must be quick or it would be abortive. The simple act of endorsement by a justice is therefore made sufficient to give efficacy to a warrant brought against an escaping offender. What reason can there be for adopting this remedy against a man who remains at his post?—show me the possibility of such a man not being amenable to the law, or by any act of his avoiding punishment, and I will give up the question.

Let us now proceed to the 13th of the King, c. 31.—The mischief recited in its preamble is the escape of felons and other malefactors, whereby their offences remain unpunished. I will not now argue upon the import of these words as descriptive of a certain class of offenders only. I do however no violence to language in referring the whole description to the perpetrators of crimes by actual presence escaping or removing, in opposition to persons charged with constructive misdemeanors who have never escaped or removed at all. The enacting part of this statute of the 13th of the King is the same mutatis mutandis with the enacting part of the 24th of Geo. 2nd, except in one particular, which not relating to the present part of the argument I shall not now notice, but to which I mean hereafter to solicit the attention of the Court. The clauses however being thus similar, it is manifest that every observation I have made upon the 24th of Geo. 2nd, apply at least with equal strength to the 13th of the King. This law has been in force above thirty years between England and Scotland, and not a single instance is produced of its ever having been applied to any other than cases of escape.

I have now, my lord, come in order to the act upon which the present questions arise. It affects to embody the several acts to which I have already called the attention of the Court, and to give to this country the benefit of similar provisions. The framers of it had before them all the preceding acts, and at one view could see the objects, mischief, and remedy. With these before their eyes they framed the title of the present act. What is it? it is entitled, "An act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the united kingdom to the other and from one county to the other." Before I proceed, allow me, my lords, to recall to the recollection of the Court a few of the leading rules adopted by wisdom and experience in the construction of acts of parliament. My lord Coke says, "optima statuti interpretratrix est ipsum statutum, et injustum, nisi totâ legē inspectâ, una aliqua ejus particula judicare vel respondere." Every statute* ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the intent, and a case out of the mischief intended to be remedied should be construed to be out of the purview, though it be within the words of the statute. That the title, and much more the preamble, are things to be resorted to, to explain the meaning of the legislature. The mischief recited in that part of this act regulating the arrest and transmission of offenders from one part of the united kingdom to the other, is, "That felons and other malefactors in one part of the united kingdom make their escape into the other, whereby their offences often remain unpunished."—Now, though you should not confine the operation of this act to cases of possible impunity by escape, yet still you must refer it to cases of impunity by some act or agency of the offender. You can by no reasonable construction refer it to the case of a man who never leaves the jurisdiction within which he was born; who betrays no disposition to evade the law, and manifests no sense of guilt by flight. Show me the possibility of a man, if this act had never existed, not being amenable to the law, who remains where he has done any act, capable of proof, either constituting an offence in itself, or leading to the commission of one elsewhere, and I will give up the question.

I beg here to apply the observation of one of your lordships to the question now before you—My lord said, in one part of this argument, "It would be an odd way to get at the sense of an act of parliament by getting rid of the words of it."—I am ready to determine this question by the rule to be collected from your lordship's observation, which I presume to be, that in the construction of an act of parliament, all the words used in it are to be considered. It is insisted on by the counsel for the prosecution, that it avails not in what part of the united kingdom the individual who is the object of prosecution resided at the time of the commission of the alleged offence, whether within that part of the united kingdom where the offence is charged to have been committed, or in a totally distinct part of it, or, which in truth is the same matter in effect, whether he ever removed from the jurisdiction in which he is charged to have offended. Now, under this construction, I should be glad to know of what imaginable import are the words "escape and go into." The first of these words you find usurping a very important place in the title of the act, and one not less so in the preamble, where the mischief to be guarded against is recited, and you have them all in full array in the enacting clause: yet under the construction now insisted upon, they are not merely nugatory and useless, but occasion doubt and perplexity in a motive, which, without them, would admit of neither one nor the other.

It may sometimes be a good way to convince the understanding through the medium of the senses. Let us see, therefore, how this act will read, leaving out the words "escape and go into," and confining it to the all-comprehensive words relied upon by the other side, reside and be. The title, as far as relates to the present question, would run thus: "An act to render more easy the apprehending and bringing to trial offenders against whom warrants shall be issued in one part of the United Kingdom, residing, or being in the other:"—The preamble will run thus—"And whereas it may frequently happen, that felons and other malefactors in that part of the united kingdom, called England, may reside or be in that part of the united kingdom called Ireland, whereby their offences often remain unpunished:"—And the enacting part thus—"For remedy whereof, be it enacted, if any person or persons against whom a warrant shall be issued by any of the judges of his majesty's court of King's-bench, &c. or other persons having authority to issue the same within England or Scotland respectively, for any offence against the laws of England and Scotland respectively, shall reside or be in any place of that part of the united kingdom called Ireland, it shall or may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county or place in Ireland, where such persons shall reside or be, to endorse his name on such warrant, &c."

Thus, it is manifest, that in every part of the act as it now stands, the words "escape and go into" may be left out, and the words "reside or be" will be all-sufficient for the construction insisted on by counsel for the prosecution, with this manifest advantage, that no doubt whatever could then be entertained of the meaning of the legislature; and whatever might be the consequences to the hitherto established principles of law and liberty, the Court would be bound to give effect to a meaning so unequivocally expressed; thus we see that the words "escape and go into" are not merely idle and nugatory, but in the construction contended for their introduction gives doubt and perplexity to what would be perfectly explicit without them.

It has been said (for what is too bold for assertion?) that the words "reside or be" are idle and nugatory, according to the construction I am endeavouring to support. This may be determined in a moment, by seeing how the act would stand without them. It would be subject to precisely the same defect under which the act of the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, on which I have already observed, labours; that is, it would only apply to persons who had escaped after warrant issued; and to remedy which, the act of the 24th of Geo. 2nd was passed in the ensuing year. Leaving out the words "reside or be," the enacting clause in the act now before you will be, as to this head of the argument, precisely similar, mutatis mutandis, with the act of the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, and therefore subject to the defect under which that act laboured, of being confined to escapes after warrant issued. The act now before you, however, following the act of the 13th of the King, between England and Scotland, does, as that had done before, by the use of the words "reside or be," prevent what without them would have been a defect, and extends the provisions of the law, as the 24th of Geo. 2nd had done as to the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, to cases where the party had not escaped after warrant granted. The legislative decision, therefore, as to the defect of the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, shows what this act would be without the words "reside or be;" and also shows the necessity of using them to extend the provisions of the law to cases of escape or removal before warrant granted. Every word, therefore, in the act as it now stands has, according to my construction, a full and appropriate meaning; and the words "escape and go into," though the first of them in fact gives title to the act and designates the mischief in the preamble, and though both occupy a prominent place in the enacting clause, may be altogether rejected upon their's as idle and nugatory; or, indeed, ought rather to be rejected as perplexing what would be clear and explicit without them.

But the most important part of this argument yet remains to be stated. I have said, that the legislature, in the act before you, could only have escaping offenders in their contemplation; and for this plain and obvious reason, that except in treason (which case stands on peculiar grounds, as I will hereafter show), no person, not being a native or resident of England at the time he does any act by which he may have procured others to commit offences against the laws of England, can himself be an offender against the laws of England, or upon any principle of known jurisprudence subject to their animadversion. As this act, therefore, creates no new offence, to extend it to such persons would be brutum fulmen, and an absurdity of such weakness and folly as you cannot attribute to the legislature. I mentioned before, that there were words in the act now before you, and in the 13th of the king in England, which are not to be found in the acts of the 23rd and 24th of George 2nd. The words are: "for offences against the law of England." Why those words were introduced into the latter acts and omitted in the former I will not stop to inquire. They show, however, manifestly, if it were not otherwise clear from good sense and right reason, that none but offenders against the laws of England can be the objects of this law; and in that point of view, I trust, I shall demonstrate, that it of necessity can apply only to persons escaping or removing out of the realm of England.

Before I proceed with this part of the argument, I will just observe, that the Union between England and Ireland, which has lately taken place, has produced no alteration in the question I am about to examine. The countries are still governed by their own proper laws and statutes; and all their municipal jurisdictions, with the exception of the House of Lords on appeals, or writs of error, are as distinct as ever: no English law, as such, is binding in this country, or vice versa. The laws of each country have the authority they ever had rightfully, and no other.

Crimes are of three classes, natural, moral, and municipal. The avoidance of crimes natural or moral, as such, is the duty of every man, under whatever government he is born, or in whatever part of the world he resides. Many crimes, natural and moral, are also municipal; but many are not. What distinguishes municipal crimes from natural and moral crimes which are not municipal, is the temporal sanction which always attends the violation of the former. The obligation to observe the latter is eternal and immutable by time or place: its sanction, however, is not of this world—not so of mala prohibita whether they be mala in se or not. Temporal sanction is their peculiar characteristic. With respect to them, the liability to the penalty and the duty of observance are exactly commensurate. What does it arise from?—It arises either from being a subject of the particular community whose law is in question, or an occasional sojourner there at the time of the alleged breach of the law. It is unnecessary to trouble this Court with the reasons which make these circumstances the sources of municipal obligation. A municipal offence may, therefore, be defined to be "an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law forbidding or commanding it, by a person bound to obey that law."

Authority, I mean rightful authority, and obedience, are of necessity commensurate; and as far as the first extends and is lawful, so far is the other to be enforced and due; I know authority often extends where it is not lawful, and obedience is enforced where it is not due, I am at present, however, talking of the legitimate boundaries of each. To constitute, then, a municipal offence, three things must concur:—first, a public law—secondly, a fact prohibited by that law done within the limits of municipal jurisdiction—thirdly, that fact committed by a person bound at the time of the commission of it to obey that law. Let us examine this by a familiar instance:—Many acts prohibited by the revenue laws constitute misdemeanors, for which the person offending may be indicted. I choose such an instance as this, because such matters are in general merely mala prohibita, and nothing more. Suppose, then, a native and resident of France, acquainted or unacquainted, which you please, with the revenue regulations of England, wrote a letter to his correspondent there, giving certain directions, which, if complied with, would effect a breach of that law in the person so complying; as in misdemeanors all are principals, such a person, if bound by the law, would be a principal offender. Now, I ask any one above the rank of an idiot, if such a man should afterwards come into England, could he be tried for that imputed offence upon any principles of known jurisprudence? Let us ascend then a little higher in the scale of municipal offences:—Suppose a native and resident of France procures a robbery to be committed within the realm of England: if the person procuring such an act to be done resided within the realm of England, he would be an accessory before the fact in felony, and as such might be tried and punished. If the procurement, however, were out of the realm, as it would be in the case supposed, he would have committed no offence against the laws of England. He will fall into great error on such subjects who confounds municipal with moral guilt. The latter, as such, is no subject of municipal cognizance; therefore, by the common law of England, if two Englishmen go into a foreign country, and fight there, and the one murders the other, the lex terræ extended not thereto; and in the case supposed, of a felony procured by a native and resident of another country, to be committed within the realm of England, there is no form of proceeding known to the law of England by which such a person, even arriving afterwards within the jurisdiction, could be proceeded against or punished. If any man doubts as to this position, I would ask him, what grand jury of England could indict for this alleged offence? Not the grand jury of the county where the principal felony was committed; for the party had done no act there which could give them authority to present.* At common law, where the person procuring the felony to be committed resided in a different county from that in which the felony was committed, it was extremely doubtful whether he could be prosecuted at all. This, however, as to accessorial offences in felony committed within the realm, was remedied by the 2nd and 3rd of Edward 6th, whereby it is provided, that accessories in murder and felony may be indicted in the county where the accessorial offence was committed, though the principal felony was committed elsewhere; and it provides for procuring a certificate of the attainder of the principal, without which the accessory could not be tried. In the provisions of this law, we perceive how scrupulous our ancestors were in adhering to the common law principle, ubi deliquit ibi puniatur. If A. residing in Cornwall, procured a murder to be committed in Middlesex, he could not be proceeded against in the latter county, but must be tried where he had done the act, from which a felony had resulted elsewhere. There is no law in England by which any crime, under treason or murder, committed abroad by a subject of England, or by which any felony procured to be committed within the realm of England by a person resident abroad, can be prosecuted or tried in England. Treason and murder are exceptions to this rule, and for reasons that extend not to other offences. Treason is a personal contract, if I may so speak, with the sovereign, that follows the individual into whatever parts of the world he may go—on the banks of the Thames, or the banks of the Ganges, he is equally a subject, and responsible for his duty to his prince. This duty is attached upon him at his birth, and nothing but death can set him free. But even with respect to treason committed out of the realm, the common law principle I have mentioned was found too stubborn to bend; and therefore the 35th of Henry 8th makes treason, misprision and concealment thereof, done out of the realm of England, triable by the King's-bench, wherever it shall sit, or by commissioners to be appointed by the king. As to murder, it is not more an offence against the particular community than against human kind at large; it is, as it were, treason against humanity: God himself has denounced the offender, and all mankind have his licence to pursue the murderer; and such was the opinion of Cain when he said, whoever should find him would slay him. Therefore the 33rd of Henry 8th, c. 23, which, as to murder, is not repealed, gives power to try murders committed out of the realm to commissioners appointed pur-law of England. I admit the statute of the 10th of Charles 1st, in this country, renders a person resident out of the realm, and procuring a felony to be committed within it, liable to be tried where the principal offence is committed. This, however, is only another exception, by statute, to the common law rule."—Orig. Ed.

* "The reasoning here is grounded on the suant to that act. It is however held, that this act does not extend to accessories, 2nd Hawk. 569, 6th ed. These acts, extending the arm of municipal authority out of the realm, in the extraordinary cases of treason and murder, to which, by the received principles of common law, it could not reach, show in the most striking manner the boundary by which the municipal law of England is limited.

From the same limitation, in point of principle, of the common law of England, it was found necessary to provide, by particular statute, for the trial of treasons and felony committed on the high seas; and this was done by the 28th of Henry 8th, c. 15.

Thus we see, that the common law of England could not travel an inch beyond its shores; and wherever it was necessary to extend the authority of the law of England beyond that limit, it was necessary to have recourse to what my lord Coke calls the omnipotence of an act of parliament; and that even those acts have never ventured to embrace any offences abroad but treason and murder, and felony upon the seas. The statute of George 1st, providing for the trial of offenders in murder, where the stroke or poisoning happens abroad and the death in England, and vice versa, is of the same description.

From a review of these statutes it is manifest, that where a felony is committed in England, by the procurement of a person not resident there, such procurer cannot be tried by any known principle of law, or by any particular statute. I shall not be contradicted when I assert, that in such case there can be no offence against the law of England; that there does not exist an appointed mode for trying the offender; and if I can show an act that, physical impediments being removed, cannot be tried by the law of England, I show an act that is no offence against the laws of England.

The prohibition of unwritten, as well as of written law, may be reduced to precise terms. When the law, whether common or statute, prohibits any particular thing to be done, its language is, "if any person or persons," &c. And whom does it mean by these words? Not all the world; it would be ridiculous nonsense, and mere brutum fulmen—it means subject or resident. Extended beyond that meaning (with some exceptions perhaps, as piracy, warranted by the law of nations) it would be a law of force and tyranny. The principles I have laid down apply to all offences against the laws of England. Let us, however, consider them a little more particularly with regard to misdemeanors:—In all felonies not capital at common law, and in all criminal trespasses, there are no accessories. This rule is adopted in such cases, on account of the exility of the offence, quia de minimis non curat lex. Any person who would be an accessory before the fact in felony, would, if the principal offence were a misdemeanor, be himself a principal offender; and, vice versa, any person who procures a misdemeanor to be committed, would, if that misdemeanor were a felony, be an accessory before the fact; and no person procuring a misdemeanor to be committed, could be punished as a principal offender, if that person would not be, upon the supposition that the offence were a felony, an accessory before the fact, and triable as such.

Let us suppose then, for a moment, that the publication of a seditious libel, were a capital felony by the law of England—it is manifest, that, if there be any foundation whatever in the charge against the gentleman now before you, it must be for acts done by him here procuring the publication in London, that is, for acts done by him, which, if done within the realm of England, would make him, in case the offence amounted to felony, an accessory before the fact to the crime in England. Those acts, however, be they what they may, if done at all, took place out of the realm of England, and beyond the sphere of its municipal jurisdiction. As the law of England stands, I should be glad to know if the principal offence were a felony, where the party accused of such act of procurement could be indicted?—The argument, therefore, on the other side, is this, that if a person, not a subject of the municipal law of England, and resident out of the realm, were to procure the city of York to be consumed by fire, and were to land the next day in England, he could not be tried for any known offence against the laws of England,* for an offence without means of trial or punishment is nonsense; but if the same individual, under the same circumstances, had procured any person to kick a scoundrel in England who had insulted him, the mighty powers of the state are all to be set in motion, and if he were a native and resident of Ireland, he might be dragged from Donegal to London, there to expiate his crime by a fine of a mark; or if he were a native and resident in any other country, and should, at any future period of his life set his foot in England, he might be indicted and tried for an act, for which, if it had procured the commission of a felony, he could not be tried at all.

But it will be asked, shall offences instigated by persons resident without the realm to be committed within it, go unpunished? Let us recollect, that we are now talking of municipal offences, which, merely as such, have nothing to do with moral guilt. If by the word offence is meant the act done by the person resident out of England, it is begging the question to call it an offence against the law of England: but if the question be, shall the fact committed in England be committed with impunity? I answer, no. In the case of a libel, for instance, procured to be published in England, every person guilty there of publishing may be punished to the utmost satiety of revenge; fine, imprisonment, pillory, and whipping, form the ghastly train of the chief informer of the crown---that he should be able to travel with these in his rear from the English Channel to Solway Frith, and from the German Ocean to the Irish Sea, might, one would think, satisfy his appetite for power. Could it have been the intention of the law, in destroying the distinction of principal and accessory in misdemeanors, to give a wider sphere of power to municipal law in misdemeanors than it has in cases of felony, and that there should be a sort of magic in the pettiest offences that will bring an individual, residing in a realm utterly foreign as to municipal law and municipal jurisdiction, procuring a misdemeanor to be committed in another country within the pale of an authority, which, if he had procured a murder to be committed within it, could not reach him?

What is the true principle in all such cases? Why, that subject or resident are the true boundaries of municipal jurisdiction---the one a duty cast upon us at our birth; the other imposed upon us by our own act for a time: that, in either case, our obligation to obey, and, of course, the right of the state to punish, arises from* our own consent, either actual or necessarily implied: that there is a marked distinction between being subject to the king, and subject to the laws of England. In the former case, we may commit treason any where; in the latter, we can only offend as an original subject, or a temporary resident; and that, in all cases, legitimate authority and legitimate obedience are exactly commensurate, and that to extend either beyond their true bounds, would be force and tyranny, and not law.†

But let us consider, for a moment, what object is answered, or intended to be answered, by putting this construction upon the present act of parliament---a law which, let the construction of it be what it may, it is admitted on all sides, was passed to prevent offences remaining unpunished. It now appears, that not only previous to the existence, but previous to the possible existence of this alleged libel, the gentleman now brought before you was in Ireland, and has been a continuing resident therein from that time to the present. It is sworn, and not denied, that the paper containing those supposed libels, was first actually published in London. If therefore the defendant be guilty of that or any subsequent publication there, it must be by procurement, and the act of procurement must have been committed here. That act of procurement must be given in evidence wherever the trial shall be had, if there exist any hope of an effectual prosecution. Now, whether that act of procurement (if any act of procurement ever existed) consisted in writing the libel himself in this country, or copying it if written by another, or sending it whether written by himself or another to England for publication, there is no imaginable act by which the publication in London could be procured, that, if done by the defendant, must not have been done here. If done here, the witnesses to that act of procurement, whether by writing, copying, or sending, must reside here. Wherever the trial is had, that fact, be it of which of those enumerated descriptions it may, must be proved. It is sworn, and not denied, that the indictment stated in the warrant of the chief justice of England, has been found on the information of persons resident in this city. It is also sworn, and not denied, that the papers containing the alleged libels have been publicly sold in the city of Dublin, and are now offered, and to be had there for sale. It stands therefore admitted, that if any evidence whatever exists, either of procurement or publication, which can at all apply to the defendant, such evidence can be given in the city of Dublin. It is sworn, and not denied, that the circumstances about which the papers containing the alleged libels treat took place in Ireland, and it appears from the return, that the persons supposed to be attacked are resident here---so that if the offence complained of have any existence at all, and is proveable any where, it took place and is proveable in Ireland. The matters about which the papers alleged to contain the libel in question are conversant relate exclusively to Ireland, and the persons complaining of any imputations cast upon them are resident here. The alleged offence took place here, the alleged offender is on the spot, the persons complaining reside here, the matters in question relate to this country, and the evidence, if any can be had to affect the gentleman now before you, exists within the limits of this metropolis; yet it is sought to try this question at a distance of 400 miles, where the accused can have no witnesses, and where the transactions upon which the question of libel or no libel must turn are utterly unknown.

Now the real and exact truth of any particular transaction forms but one, opposed to the thousand combinations of circumstances which prejudice, ignorance, malice, or corruption may put together as representing it; and

† "No legal mind will confound the reasonings here on the principles of the criminal law of England with what takes place in transitory civil actions, which, if the parties come to reside in England, may be tried there, though the cause of action arose out of the realm. In such the obligation, upon which the action is founded, is of no place, and follows the person; but, even in such case, the contract must be tried by the law of the place where it arose, if different from the law of England." Orig. Ed.

the farther you remove from the scene of action, the more the chances are diminished that this real and exact truth will appear. The motives, therefore, for subjecting the investigation of this business to a foreign tribunal, can scarcely escape the dullest apprehension.

In the course of this discussion, I have heard a strange doctrine stated, that the pax regis in Ireland and the pax regis in England were altogether distinct, and that the same act might be a violation of each, and therefore punishable by distinct prosecutions. No doubt this is a convenient doctrine for a law officer of the crown; it is, however, a new one, and deserves to hold a distinguished place in modern discoveries. With respect to the king, I thought his subjects were not Irish subjects, or Scottish subjects, or English subjects, but subjects merely of one common king, and that the pax regis was the same in every corner of the United Kingdom, though the protection of it was meted out to distinct jurisdictions and authorities, and regulated by distinct laws. Ireland and England have been connected about 800 years, and England and Scotland about 200. About four years have elapsed since the two first were united, and near a century since the union took place between the two last. The relation either of Scots or Irish to the king has been no way affected by these unions. Why then was this discovery of the distinct peace of the king, or rather of the effects flowing from it, reserved for these times? Though the grounds upon which this discovery rests are concealed, the object of it at least is candidly avowed—it is to try the gentleman now before you in each part of the United Kingdom to which the publication charged upon him as an offence has reached; and the first experiment is to be made where he can make no possible defence. Is it that gentlemen deceive themselves, or that they hope to deceive others? If the latter, I am inclined to give them as little credit in point of sagacity, as I am disposed to allow them their full share for an ingenious refinement in the law of pains and penalties, that had escaped all their predecessors. But, so long as the principles of the law of England are cherished and adhered to, allow me to say, that if there had been ten thousand publications of the libel (if it be one) in question, and that such publication took place in every district of the wide extended dominions of our sovereign, and that you could prove but one act of procurement or of publication against the defendant, you could never try him but once as long as any respect remains for the principles of our law.

But let us return, my lords, to the statute now before you.—I can imagine, if you will, an act, loose and ambiguous in its terms, passing the legislature: I can imagine (for who that reads the history of these countries can avoid it?) the persons employed in a crown prosecution wishing to make an oppressive use of an act so worded: but I cannot imagine a constitutional court of law, where two opposite constructions are supported by such arguments as you have heard, adopting that which gives a mortal wound to private right and public liberty.—I cannot account for the bold hope which has supported those whose arguments lead to such violations—for the daring expectation, that in this place they would find the means of accomplishing the ruin of the constitution; that, not content with consuming the awful temple of our liberty, they are rash enough to drag for this purpose the fire from its altars.

In the desire, then, to remand this gentleman, let us see, my lords, in a few words, what you are called upon to do:—you are called upon in a case, bailable ex debito justitiæ, to consign him to imprisonment in the country which gave him birth, and where his connexions lie.

You are called upon to send him, with an insulting mockery, to look for bail in a country where he may have no acquaintance, much less a friend.

You are called upon under an act, passed, as it expressly imports, for the apprehension of offenders who escape, and whose offences thereby remain unpunished, to transmit to a foreign country (foreign as to laws and jurisdiction) a person who never escaped, and whose offence, if any, can be punished where he is.

You are called upon, under the magic of a legal fiction, to send a man to be tried 400 miles from the place where he could have done any personal act whatsoever, and under such circumstances, as that, if the offence he is alleged to have procured were a felony, you could not reach him.

You are called upon, to send him to be tried by a jurisdiction, and under a system of laws, to him, in a municipal sense, perfectly foreign; and that in a case in which, if he has been guilty of any offence at all, his offence is complete in his own country.

You are called upon in an avowed state prosecution, to send him out of his own country, with the public purse in the hands of his prosecutors, to be made use of for all purposes which may be deemed expedient to establish the crime against him, without any possible means, on his part, of rebutting it by proof.

And you are called upon to do all this, to enable the party complaining to avoid a trial on the merits; and, by the same decision by which you strengthen the hands of the prosecutor, to strip the accused of all possible means of defence, and that in a case of acknowledged doubt upon the construction of an act of parliament.

You are called upon to run the chance of doing wrong (I do not surely state it strongly, when even among the learned judges of the land there exists strong difference of opinion), in favour of avowed oppression, of undisguised hardship:—and to what end?—To give security to an abuse of power, and to strip the accused of the right (for right without means is mockery) of defence.

For my part (let others enjoy their triumphs), I shall feel a satisfaction to the end of my life in having made a struggle, however ineffectual, to uphold the acknowledged maxims of our law, the eternal principles of justice, and the common rights of humanity!

I know I shall have the sympathy of the good—I look to the gibes of the unfeeling.—Welcome both—in resisting “the oppressor’s wrong,” I may expect “the proud man’s contumely.”—I shall feel, however, what he never can, that peace of mind, which, like the peace of God, passes the understanding of the wicked.

Mr. Prime Sergeant.—The gentlemen to whom I am opposed, seem fairly to have divided the subject between them. One has taken the argument, the other the eloquence: one the reasoning, the other the wit. As to eloquence it is beyond my reach, and in my humble conception misplaced on a mere legal question; as to jokes, I am a bad jester, and therefore I shall beg leave to reply to the argument.

I have however the greatest respect for the extraordinary talents of the learned gentleman whose oratory has produced such a vast effect, for the uncommon resources of his mind and quickness of his genius, always able at the instant (to use his own phrase) to draw at sight upon those resources; but I cannot avoid thinking, that in the alembick of his imagination, the argument often evaporates, and we are to search for any residue of reasoning, not in a bushel of chaff, but in an ocean of fancy. When I heard my learned friend, on the interpretation of an act of parliament, say he would not submit to the drudgery of verbal criticism, I could not but smile; and when after a most beautiful declamation of an hour he said, but now let us come to the subject, it reminded me of the famous lines,

“To serious council let’s advance;

“But first let’s have a dance.”

The argument which I am to answer is twofold; first, that the act of the 44th of the King, ch. 92, doth not extend to libels or any inferior crimes; secondly, that if it doth, it at most extends only to persons who, having been guilty or charged with such offences, and warrants thereupon being issued, escape from one country into the other.

To answer these objections, we must endeavour first to find out the object of the act, and secondly to examine its words and its provisions.

The object I conceive was, to put Ireland, after the Union, on the same footing with respect to England that one county in England had formerly been to any other county in England, as far as circumstances could possibly admit: what else could be the object? Could it be merely to empower a justice of the peace to back warrants? Can I believe, that an enlightened legislature meant to reserve to any offender in Ireland the liberty of diffusing mental pain and misery over the empire, like a baneful comet, and then shelter himself in the nucleus of this our little residence—could this be the intention? It would be a proclamation for abuse, an avowed indemnity for scandal, a premium of security for malice and revenge; and every man in England might fully vent his spite against his neighbour through the medium of his friend or acquaintance in Ireland.

From the monstrous absurdity of such a construction I proceed to show the real meaning and object of this law, from a consideration and review of the acts upon which it was founded, and of which it was composed; these are the 23rd of Geo. 2nd, ch. 26; 24th Geo. 2nd, ch. 55, and 13th Geo. 3rd, ch. 31.

By the common law, the power of finding an indictment for an offence in any county being confined to the grand jury of that county, and the power of justices of the peace confined to their respective counties, if an offender escaped from one county into another, he could not there be arrested without a fresh warrant from a magistrate of that county into which he had escaped, who had no power of admitting him to bail, but could merely remit him to his proper county. To remedy this inconvenience in part, an illegal custom had been introduced of backing warrants, the magistrate of one county indorsing the warrant of the magistrate of the other. To legalize this practice, the statute 23 Geo. 2nd, ch. 26, was made.

But as this extended only to persons escaping, and also omitted to give a power of bailing to the second magistrate, the legislature, considering that crimes might issue as it were from one county, and be propagated into another, and there take and complete their sole or full effect, where, perhaps, the offender in person might never have been, added to the words of the former act, which provided for the arrest of persons escaping or going into another country, the words or who should there reside or be; all this will appear by reference to the words of the acts themselves.

Thus matters stood when it was observed, that still the case of a person escaping, going into, residing, or being in Scotland, and having committed in person, or by transmission of his crime, an offence in England, was not provided for, though Scotland had been united with England: the statute 13 Geo. 3rd, ch. 31 was therefore made, providing for that case as well as for the mutual event of persons committing offences in Scotland escaping, going into, residing, or being in England; the power of bailing the person arrested, however, was not given, for this plain reason, that the law would not entrust a common magistrate in Scotland with the power of determining or judging, whether an offence was bailable in England, or vice versa; nor if it had entrusted to him such power, can it be imagined, where or how the recognizance of bail could be returned.

From these several statutes, the present statute 44th of the king was formed; and surely knowing the objects and intentions of those statutes and its component parts, we cannot be at a loss to know the object, the scope, and the nature of the composition; it was to put Ireland and England on the same footing and relation with respect to each other that any one county in England had been to every other, as far as the nature of things would admit, which was found, as in the case of Scotland, not to extend to the admission to bail of persons charged with offences, until they had been transmitted to the country where they were to be tried.

Having thus far argued from the intention and scope of the legislature, and the acts from which the present is derived, I proceed to support my construction of this statute:—from the very plain words which it contains, it puts four cases—escaping, going, residing, being; the words are, if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued, as therein, for any crime or offence against the crown of England or Scotland respectively, shall escape, go into, reside, or be in any place of that part of the united kingdom called Ireland. The legislature meaning by the first case, an escape by a person conusant of the warrant having issued; by the second, his going into the other country on account of business, or pleasure, not acquainted with the issuing of the warrant, nor flying from it; the third, the case of a person resident in Ireland, who might, or might not, have been at same time previous in England; and, fourthly, the legislature recollecting, that a person neither escaping nor going from England, or Scotland, nor a regular resident, nor having a fixed domicile in Ireland, might happen to be there, included this case also; and thus all the words of the statute have their plain and respective distinct meanings. The two latter words, therefore, reside, or be, are not superfluous: but it is said, according to our construction, the two former would be so; we may retort the argument and say, according to your construction, the two latter would be so.

But it is said the two latter words refer to the case of going from one country to the other before warrant issued, the two former to going after warrant; admitting, that they refer to a case before warrant issued it is not confined to persons going to, but in general to persons residing and being in the other country before warrant issued. According to this construction, therefore, the latter words are not superfluous; but even, if according to our construction, the word reside, or the word be, would have been sufficient, no staple argument can hence be drawn, inasmuch as it would only follow, that the legislature had too servily copied the language of former acts, and distinguished what needed no distinction: and as to the supposition of a distinction between cases before and after warrant, those words though used in the English acts of Geo. 2nd, are in the present act totally omitted, and cannot apply. If the words then are plain, what is to check or control them? Why, it is said, the word ESCAPE only is used. It may be observed, that this argument excludes persons going into, and who could not properly be said, to escape; and it might be answered, that escape might here have been used, and in its vulgar sense, and in the language of conversation, for any evading of justice, though not by actual flight; and that if we look to preambles, we should look to the general preamble of the whole statute, and not to particular clauses. But the better answer is, that it is a well known rule of law, that however a preamble may tend to illustrate doubtful words, it never can control or alter an enacting clause, couched in plain terms; and such I insist this to be. This principle of law is most clearly laid down by the greatest judges—by lord Hardwicke, in the case of Basset v. Basset, 3 Atkyns, p. 205, where he says, that if enacting words can take in the mischief intended to be remedied, they shall be extended to it, though the preamble doth not warrant it; and in Robinson's case, 2nd East's P. C. pages 1110 and 1113, judge Buller says, "Where the enacting clause of a statute refers to such offences only as are contained in the preamble, it may be restrained by the preamble; but in this case it would be doing violence to very plain words, and repealing some of the obvious provisions if it were so restrained." So I say here; judge Buller truly adds, "It is no uncommon thing for the preamble of a statute to recite a particular mischief, as the cause of making it, and yet for the enacting part to embrace more general objects, and to extend to other cases, which the legislature thought within equal mischief."*

But it is said, that even supposing that the statute is not limited to escapes, it doth not reach offenders inferior to felons; that this statute speaks only of felons and other malefactors, and that the author of a libel is not a malefactor in the legal sense. Mr. Curran has defined a malefactor to be a man who commits some gross violation of public duty: is not a libeller such a man? but I define it an evil-doer; it is the literal English of the word, and includes all offenders; and accordingly Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the 4th volume of his Commentaries, ch. 21, p. 292, translates it by the word OFFENDERS, when speaking of the act, 13th of the King, relative to Scotland, above-mentioned; and I add, that unless it be so construed it is useless, and the word felons would do; whereas it is plainly used in contra-distinction to felons: let me here observe too, that the statute is said not to extend to constructive offences. This is not a constructive offence.

The next argument is, that according to our construction of this act, it repeals the Habeas Corpus act; which never would have been intended, and therefore our construction is false. To try this argument and the truth of it, trace and examine the origin and progress of the Habeas Corpus act, and the mischief it was intended to remedy, and it will immediately appear how totally inapplicable the facts relative thereto are to the present case; we shall find the mischief recited so early as the reign of queen Elizabeth, when the judges addressed the chancellor and treasurer, stating, that divers persons had been imprisoned for suing ordinary actions, and when writs were directed to the persons imprisoning them, have been removed to secret prisons, so that the Court could not learn to whom to direct the writs.

In the reign of Charles the first, the evil had grown to an enormous height. Mr. Stroud, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and other men of justly celebrated fame, were imprisoned for freedom of speech in parliament; they applied for a Habeas Corpus, and the judges of the King's-bench were of opinion to grant it; when, behold, they could not be found! the king had removed them to the Tower by his own authority; and, when the Court applied to him to know what was become of them, the king answered, that having been very impertinent to him, and also, as he understood, to their lordships, he had thought proper to prevent their having the benefit of the Habeas Corpus, a privilege founded on Magna Charta.—See Stroud's case, 7 State Trials.* These crying grievances called first for the Petition of Right, and afterwards for the famous Habeas Corpus act, 31 Car. ch. 2, which enacts, "that for preventing illegal imprisonments beyond the seas, no subject shall or may be sent to Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, &c. &c. provided always, that if any person or persons, at any time resident in this realm, shall have committed any capital offence in Scotland or Ireland, or in any foreign plantation, where he ought to be tried, such person may be sent to such place to receive his trial, in the same manner as might have been used before the making of this act."

What was the evident intention of this act? Not to skreen crimes; not to give general impunity for offences; not to encourage any man to do wrong, or to injure his neighbour; not to promote licentiousness; but to protect real liberty, and to prevent illegal imprisonment. Who were the framers of this act? The most true and real patriots who ever were in England; the men who first and vigorously opposed the encroachments of Charles the first; and when they found the king complying with reason, and willing to sacrifice all his prejudices to the truth of the constitution, fought and bled in his defence, against the violence of republicanism. Such was lord Falkland, and such was lord Clarendon. And were all these noble struggles for the glorious liberty of doing mischief? How would these illustrious men have spurned at such an explanation! How would they have repelled such an insinuation! How would they have lamented this perversion of liberty, and of its most adored instrument, the Habeas Corpus act! How would they have exclaimed, Did we sacrifice our time, our peace, our property, our lives, in support of the constitution, to be quoted as the instruments of licentiousness, and the patrons of violence and of wrong?—Away with such idle fancies, such sophistical abuse of words! They did not insert misdemeanors in the act, because they did not think of excepting in the Habeas Corpus act such a case. Will you believe, that if they had reflected on the possibility of such a case as this, they would not have included it in the proviso?—The present act includes misdemeanors, and, in so doing, it doth not repeal the Habeas Corpus act; it only elucidates, and explains, and extends the real spirit of it—the name of the Habeas Corpus act is introduced in fallacy, to captivate the ear of liberty, and catch popularity in the lures of injustice.

The next arguments suggested are, ab inconvenienti; the party cannot be bailed until he lands on the shore of the other country; and therefore it is impossible the law should extend to misdemeanors. The premises I admit, the consequences I deny. I admit that the power of bailing in the county where arrested is omitted, and omitted advisedly, and upon consideration; but deny that, therefore, misdemeanors were not intended to be reached and included; an inference which might be fair, if the power of bailing were possible; but until it can be shown to me where or how a recognizance of bail could be taken before transmission of the prisoner, or how it could be returned, I must insist upon its impossibility. Suppose the libel published in Cumberland, and the libeller resident in Ireland, who is to take the bail, or in what manner is he to return the recognizance? Is he to send it by post to Cumberland? Is he to go with it himself? Who is the officer to carry it?—And, if it were carried, who is the person, what the office there to receive it? The framers of the act considered the feasibility of this provision; the objectors to the act well know its impracticability.

It is observable, that the argument that this law doth not extend toailable offences, is overturned by an understood provision in the act, that the party shall beailable the moment he lands in England; and the hardship is mutual; for the Englishman, arrested for a libel published in Ireland, could not be bailed until he landed here; and, even if this omission of bailing in the country where arrested, were owing to accident and not to design, we must obey the law until corrected. Arguments from inconvenience cannot subvert positive law. But what hardship, or what inconvenience, can the defendant here complain of? An offer was made to him, and he was even requested to give bail, with an earnestness to accommodate him, perhaps not altogether supported by the powers of the act; but if it was an excess, it was an excess of benignity, of which surely the person favoured cannot complain.

But, say my learned opponents, what a grievance is this! They declaim with infinite pathos on the hardships thus imposed upon the offender; but doth he not bring this hardship upon himself? Can he complain of mischiefs of his own creating? Had he kept his tongue from evil speaking, quietness and peace would attend his habitation, and spread the curtain of security over his dwelling.— Shall the man who sends forth his poisoned arrow be angry if it rebound and wound himself? Shall he who troubles the waters complain that he is swallowed in a vortex of his own creation? or shall we pity the man, who, from his rocky promontory, aiming a deadly blow at one who never offended him, loses his balance, and is hurled into an ocean of distress? He pitied not others, shall he himself have pity? I speak not of the present case—I speak not of any particular case—I argue on possibilities, on general reasoning, on notorious and analogous facts.— This hardship, which is said to render our construction impossible, actually existed between Cumberland and Cornwall, between any two counties in England, down to the 24th year of the reign of George the 2nd.

The powerful oratory of my opponents still rests on the imagined case of a man dragged to Scotland, a country governed by different laws, by laws of uncommon severity, by laws to him unknown. Hard it may be—but let him then, if the laws of Scotland be additionally severe, be more particularly careful not to invade them; let him remember the motto of the country—Nemo me impune lacessit; and let him reflect on his argument and his claims. What is it? Give me free liberty to offend in Scotland; permit me to set every man in Edinburgh against his neighbour; allow me to disturb the peace of all the families in Scotland whom I choose to devote to unprovoked insult and abuse, because, forsooth, the law of Scotland is severe and unknown to me; and let me proclaim to every malicious man in that country, that he may with impunity attack any of his countrymen, by coming to reside at Belfast.

The next cry, addressed by deception to ignorance, is, that this is an ex post facto law. For lawyers, surely, it cannot be intended.— Is any legal man ignorant that an ex post facto law is that which punishes for a deed previously committed, and only made criminal by the law itself? Doth the present act, for the first time, make libel a crime? It alters and regulates the mode of apprehending the criminal. And what says the person charged—“Really I am injured; for, though I may have committed the offence, I relied upon it that I could not be caught; and, indeed, you have done me a mighty grievance by pointing out a new method of getting me. It is not fair! Why did not you tell me of this before?”—Is not this too ridiculous to require an answer?

Mr. Johnson has superadded to the arguments advanced by other gentlemen, others more ingenious than substantial. Without dwelling on the specious subtlety, that the words “no sufficient provision” show, that the act was not intended for a case for which there had been no provision (a technical objection which would scarcely occur but to lawyers—often as apt to smile inwardly at their own inventions as to produce them), I hasten to his assertion, that no man can be affected for any offence against the laws of a country in which he never resided. Your lordships have desired me not to lose time on this position, intimating, that it hath not weighed with you; yet I cannot help putting this case:— Suppose a man in Ireland contrived, by the intervention of an innocent person, ignorant of the contents, to send a box of poison to his private enemy, a Frenchman, at Bourdeaux, to whom his hatred had commenced in Ireland, he himself never having been in France, would he not be tried for murder here? or if untried, he should be afterwards found in France, could he not be tried for murder there? He is evidently a principal—not an accessory. Is he never to be accountable, except to the tribunal of heaven?

But, saith the learned counsel, an accessory to a felony could not be tried in England; and, a fortiori, when such a strong case is omitted, petty misdemeanors we never can believe to be included. The legal doctrine as to offences committed out of the realm, and as to accessories, must be traced through the different acts: by stat. 33rd Henry 8th, ch. 23, in England, murder committed out of the realm might be tried there; the 35th Henry 8th provided as to treason committed out of the realm (see 2 Hawkins, 569, and 1st East's Criminal Law, page 369). The 2nd and 3rd Edward 6th, English, and 10th Charles 1st, chap. 19, Irish, provided for a wound at home and death ensuing from it abroad; as it doth also, for the trial of accessories at home to offences committed abroad. Upon the whole, it is true, that an accessory in Ireland to a felony in England, who had never been there, could not there be tried; though by the Irish statute, 10th Charles 1st, chap. 19, he may be tried here. But how doth this apply to the present case? This hath been called an accessorial offence. In misdemeanors there can be no accessories; but if there could, I should be glad to know who is the principal here? Was it the post-rider, the mail-driver, or the friend who may have carried the libel to England? Is it not evident that there can be no accessory here distinct from the principal? The reason, says the learned counsel, why the accessory in Ireland to a felony committed in England cannot be tried in England is, because he never was subject to the jurisdiction of England. No, that is not the reason: the reason is, because he never committed any offence in England; the principal offended in England, but the accessorial offence was committed in Ireland, and there only. But how doth that apply to the present case? The offender here is a principal, and the offence, viz. the publication of the libel, was committed in England.

And here I cannot but smile at a minor argument which has been hazarded; that as the prisoner must be either remanded or discharged, if you have any doubt, he must be discharged; for that it cannot be said to be a decision per legem terræ, if you have any doubt. Do my learned friends mean, that every judicial decision which is alloyed by the smallest grain of doubt is void by the lex terræ? What infallible judges do they look for! What infallibility do they promise if they should ever be in that situation! What happy dogmatism! What undoubting confidence do they suppose in the judges of the land! How disgraceful to lord Mansfield and lord Hardwicke to have doubted so often as they did!—It reminds me of the happy satisfaction in his own knowledge enjoyed by a foreign priest, who, to a friend of mine discoursing with him on free-will, fixed fate, foreknowledge-absolute, answered, hæc omnia tibi facillimè explicabo; but my friend declined his kindness.

I have now discussed all the arguments of my learned opponents which I find on my paper; and they are too well used to laugh themselves, to be angry with me for a little risibility, when I review the remainder of my abstract of what they have said (somewhat resembling the broken memorandums which Addison hath given us in the Spectator, of projected essays); bishops and petticoats, valets and ministers, maxima quæque domus, and nil admirari, together with a splendid declamation on the abuse of time, are short specimens of topics which have amused the ear, without being even intended to affect the judgment.

Quotations indeed from the classics—rich and abundant quotations from the classics I do find, possibly rather too thickly larded; and, perhaps, I might say, Io anche sono pittore; but were I a college man, in my turn to cap verses, I should be said, as Smollet says of Addison, to come down with my satchel on my back; and I could not boast like my learned friend, omnis Aristippum decuit.

Before I conclude I must remark the hardship which has been put upon the replyer by the varying and fugitive nature of the defence. In another court, the learned judge who gave his opinion so ably in favour of the defendant, relied upon the statute relating only to escapes, but rejected with decided slight the argument, that it did not extend to misdemeanors; and in this court no two gentlemen seem to have agreed upon the same grounds, nor any one to have adhered long to that which he originally chose for himself: one says, that it doth extend to persons guilty of misdemeanors if fugitive, not otherwise; another, that it doth not extend to misdemeanors at all; and a third, who began the contest, admits, that the literal sense of the words includes this case, but that the sound construction of the statute excludes it, and that locality of person, not of offence, gives jurisdiction (a doctrine certainly perfectly new), and that his offence may be transmitted innocently if not accompanied by himself.

Much has been said of the origin of warrants by secretaries of state, and lord Camden's argument in Entick v. Carrington, and of lord Sanquaire's case, 9th Coke; how they apply to the present case it is not easy to conceive. I shall only note the Irish act, 6th Geo. 1st, chap. 12, in which the warrant of any judge of the King's-bench in England to apprehend an English felon in Ireland, backed by the authority of the lord lieutenant here, is recognised as legal; and as to Wilkes's case, there never was such a perversion of an authority, ad captandum Vulgus. Wilkes, a member of parliament, was called upon, not to stand a trial, nor to give bail to stand a trial for a libel, but to give securities for keeping the peace; and it was determined, that a libel not being a direct breach of the peace, he was not bound to give such sureties; and hence it has been most sagely argued, that no bail is required for a misdemeanor. Need I be more diffuse on this topic? verbum sapienti.

I come, in the last place, to the affidavits which have been made upon this occasion, and properly made, as they do not controvert the return:—It is observable, in the first place, that they do not swear to innocence, but chiefly insist that the trial for the libel might have been in Dublin: it is observable, also, that they do not identify the libel published here to have been the same which was published in London. But supposing that it was the same, and that it might have been tried here, without dwelling on a severe, but true remark, that this would be sheltering a man under the multiplicity of his offences, I ask, is the offender, where he may be tried in two places, to select which he chooses? is he, perhaps, to select that in which he cannot be convicted? and is he to determine in what manner the prosecution shall proceed with least hopes of success? The publication in England is easily proved; the fact of putting it in the post-office, or otherwise transmitting it from Ireland, it may be impossible to prove. The publication in England must have been voluntary—the republication in Ireland may have been against the will of the writer.

I have thus, my lords, endeavoured to do my duty, certainly a very painful one, to the best of my power. I am fully sensible, however this business may terminate, that the bench and the bar of Ireland will long have cause to rue it. I have endeavoured to abstract the case from the individual, and to argue it as an abstract point of law. The learned judge must know, that I can bear no personal hostility to him—we have been long neighbours and acquaintances—his family and relatives and mine are in habits of intimacy and friendship; I sincerely hope he is innocent of a libel, which I must call abominable and atrocious, on the first, most illustrious, and most amiable character in the land. I sincerely hope, that it is impossible he should, in his high situation, unprovoked, compose so scandalous a libel; and with the benignity of the law, I have a right to consider him as innocent until he be found guilty.

Considering, then, the question as an abstract and general one, and removing entirely from the mind the consideration of the individual, let me conjure your lordships to consider the consequences of such an exposition of the statute as that for which the defendant's counsel contend—let me entreat you not to elevate a signal of impunity to offenders—to make Ireland a receptacle of crimes. Do not make this country like one of the cities of refuge of the children of Israel—the haven and harbour to which iniquity shall fly for protection—and the favourite residence of malice and revenge. Do not make this court the altar and the sanctuary to which criminals may cling, as of old they were impiously suffered to do to the altar of Heaven! Do not convert this island of saints into an island of sinners; nor suffer it to be said, that it contains no venom but that of man! Remember the sacred dictate, Thou shalt keep thy tongue from evil speaking and slandering;—and do not, like the careless editor of the Bible, invert the sacred commandment and proclaim, Thou shalt scandalize thy neighbour—thou shalt do it with impunity—and thou shalt be sheltered under the canopy of the law.

[Here the arguments of counsel closed on both sides.]

Court of Exchequer, Dublin, Thursday, February 7th, 1805.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT.

Mr. Baron Maclelland.—As there exists in the court a difference of opinion upon this question, it falls to my lot to begin, and in the first instance to state my reasons for the judgment I shall give.

In this case a writ of Habeas Corpus has been issued out of this court, to which a return has been made; and two affidavits have been sworn on the part of the prisoner: upon these documents taken together, he has by his counsel moved to be discharged from custody.

[Here his lordship stated the writ, the return, and the affidavits at considerable length.]

On these documents which I have stated, the motion for the discharge of Mr. Justice Johnson is founded, and on his behalf it has been contended, that upon the facts thus disclosed this arrest is illegal, as his case does not fall within the scope of the act of 44th Geo. 3, c. 92. The question therefore to be decided by the Court, viz. the legality or illegality of the arrest and imprisonment, must depend upon the construction of that act of parliament.

On behalf of the prisoner, it has been contended, that on the true construction of this act, it cannot justify the present arrest, on two grounds,—first, that the act does not extend the power of arrest to cases of misdemeanors,—secondly, that even supposing it to extend to misdemeanors, yet it only authorizes an arrest in cases where the person accused has been corporally within the jurisdiction of the court where the trial is to be had, and has from thence escaped; but not to a case like the present, where the prisoner never was within the jurisdiction, except constructively.

The first point, namely, that the act does not extend the power of arrest to the case of misdemeanors, has been supported by a construction given to the particular words, in the third section of this act, and by arguments pointing out the hardships and inconvenience which would arise from extending its provisions to misdemeanors: for this purpose, that part of the preamble to that section is relied upon, in which it is stated, that felons and other malefactors “may make their escape;” these words are, it is contended, to apply to felons only; and it is insisted, that in the enacting clause, the word of reference such ought to be introduced, and made to refer to the words felons and malefactors, as synonymous terms, and thereby to confine the operation of the enacting clause to cases of felony.

To this argument there are two decisive objections,—first, that the preamble does not warrant such a construction; and, secondly, that if it did, the preamble could not control the enacting clause, which, as to this point, is clear and explicit.

It has been said, that the word malefactors is used in this statute as synonymous with “felons,” but, in my opinion, the legislature, by the word malefactors, intended to include all persons guilty of offences less than felony, and by the word felons, intended to include persons guilty of felony and the highest offences. And, in this opinion I am confirmed by recurring to the legal meaning of the word malefactor in the old statutes—it is there synonymous with trespassers; and it is a settled rule of construction, that when the sense and meaning of words and statutes have been ascertained, they are to be understood in the same sense, when used in a subsequent statute.

The statute de malefactoribus in parvis, 21st Edward 1st, and the construction it has received, show that malefactors and trespassers are synonymous; therefore, in my opinion, the preamble does extend to misdemeanors, and is not confined to cases of felony, as has been contended for the prisoner.

But if there were any doubt of the meaning of the preamble, or if it even mentioned only "felons," still the words of the enacting clause are so clear as to render it impossible to entertain a doubt upon them. The words are, "If any person against whom a warrant shall be issued for any crime or offence against the laws of Ireland, &c." Try the meaning of these words by this test, which I shall mention:—Suppose it were thought necessary to make a new act to include misdemeanors, what other words could be used to express that intention more strongly than the words "any crime or offence," thus including every possible description of a violation of the law? These words are in fact as comprehensive as if every offence in the criminal code had been enumerated.

Looking therefore to the words of the third and fourth sections of this act, and applying to them the ordinary rules of construction, I am clearly of opinion, that by these sections, the power of arrest is extended to the case of misdemeanors. And this will appear still more clearly, if we consider how the law stood before the passing of the act, what was the mischief to be guarded against, and what the remedy provided. At common law, no person could be legally transmitted from England to Ireland, or vice versa, for trial, unless charged with a capital offence. In such a case, the offender might legally be transmitted. This appears from the sixteenth section of the English Habeas Corpus act, which declares, that such persons might be transmitted, as might have been prior to the act. The legislature thereby declaring, that such transmitting of capital offenders was legal prior to that act, and was not to be affected thereby.

Such construction of the Habeas Corpus act is recognised by all the judges of England in colonel Lundy's case, reported in 2nd Ventris, 314; and in the case of the King v. Kimberly, 2nd Strange, 848. So, at common law, a magistrate could not transmit a person from one county to another for an offence committed out of his jurisdiction, though upon examinations made before him, he might arrest such a person.

From this view of the subject it appears, that at common law, considerable difficulties existed as to the arresting and transmitting offenders for trial from county to county, and from kingdom to kingdom. In the first, the arrest was attended with inconvenience to the prosecutor, and the mode of transmitting was tedious, circuitous, and expensive; in the latter, the power of arrest and transmitting was confined to capital cases; and there was no power of arresting or transmitting an offender charged with a misdemeanor from one kingdom to another. These defects in the criminal code called for legislative interference, and accordingly these defects were remedied between county and county, in England, by the 23rd and 24th of Geo. 2nd, in which it is admitted that misdemeanors are included. The legislature then went on to remedy, as between England and Scotland, that defect which had before existed between county and county. In England, good policy required, that the two countries united into one kingdom should bear the same relation to each other as the counties of the same kingdom did, and this was effected by the 13th Geo. 3rd, which gave, as between the two kingdoms the like remedy as had been before given to two different counties. According then to the rule of law, which obliges us to expound similarly all statutes made in pari materia, these statutes should be construed all together; and as the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd unequivocally extend to misdemeanors, so must the 13th Geo. 3rd be held to extend to similar offences; and in this opinion I am strengthened by the direction of the 13th Geo. 3rd, that when a person is brought from Scotland into England, he shall be taken before a justice in the first English county, there to be dealt with according to the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd, that is to say, he shall be bailed if his offence be bailable, and if not bailable, he shall be transmitted to the prison of his proper county; thus clearly including offences under felony, for which only bail may be taken. And from this, it is clear, that the object of the 13th Geo. 3rd was, as I have stated, to extend as between kingdom and kingdom the advantages of the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd. The act now under consideration, the 44th Geo. 3rd, ch. 92, incorporated all these acts—the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd, by its first and second sections—the 13th Geo. 3rd, by its 3rd and 4th—and from the principle which I have laid down, must embrace the same classes of offenders with the acts from which it is clearly copied.

But in order to get rid of this irresistible deduction, it is said, that though the remedy is given between county and county in Ireland with respect to misdemeanors, no such remedy is given between kingdom and kingdom; and upon this extraordinary principle, that such offences are below the notice of her legislature. Shall it then be urged, that the felon who commits the pettiest offence of larceny, is an object for the interference of the legislature, and that the foulest perjury, the most mischievous swindling, or the most seditious libel, shall be below its notice, because those crimes, even though the latter should approach the boundary of treason, are only punishable as misdemeanors? Can it be supposed of the legislature, that it could design to give impunity to such offenders? But so far from this argument being in favour of the prisoner, I think it powerfully against him; for if it be admitted (as it must) that the interference of the legislature was necessary for the arrest of persons guilty of misdemeanors flying from one county to another, it follows, that such interference, as between kingdom and kingdom, was necessary a multo fortiori—for there was at common law a remedy, though defective, between county and county, inasmuch as a magistrate might arrest, though he could not transmit or remove but by Habeas Corpus, while between kingdom and kingdom there existed no remedy whatever.

By the 13th Geo. 3rd, the legislature placed England and Scotland on the same footing as to the arrest of all offenders as two English counties were by the 24th Geo. 2nd, excepting as to the right of giving bail; and so, in my opinion, does the 44th Geo. 3rd place the three districts of the United Kingdom on the same footing on which Scotland and England stood under the 13th Geo. 3rd. It has been greatly relied upon at the bar, that the want of a provision to bail in this act is a proof, that it was not intended to extend to cases where the subject is entitled to bail at common law. It is true, that no such provision is made by the act; and if I could admit, that the enacting clause was doubtful or obscure, and that the omission of such a provision caused the intolerable hardships which have been stated at the bar, perhaps I might yield to the construction desired; but when the language of the act is as clear as language can be, when the words are for "any crime or offence against the laws of England or Ireland respectively," I am bound to consider misdemeanors to be included, even though such hardships should follow; for I am bound as a judge, to construe the law as it is, and not as I might think it ought to be.

Let us consider what was the relative situation of England and Scotland, as to criminal jurisprudence, when the act of 13th Geo. 3rd was passed—the criminal code in each varying in almost every essential particular, so much so, that even the professors of the law in one country could not pronounce an opinion on the criminal law of the other. Could then a prudent legislature conceive, that an English justice of the peace could be endowed with such knowledge of the law of Scotland, as to decide whether a man was to be bailed or not, when if he asked the chief justice of England for advice, he would probably answer, he could not give an opinion on the point? or would the English legislature trust the power of bailing to a Scottish magistrate, instructed only in a criminal code, arbitrary and severe, compared to the English code? Might not the legislature fairly presume, that a Scottish magistrate might refuse to bail in a case where bail might be taken, and thus might have sent a man a prisoner from Scotland to Cornwall; whereas, if the power of bailing were reserved for the English magistrate (as it is by the act) he would be bailed in the first English county he would reach—Cumberland or Northumberland? Thus, by deferring the time of giving bail, until the arrival of the prisoner in the county, against whose laws he had offended, and before magistrates acquainted with those laws, all these ill consequences are avoided.

If this view of the subject be considered, I think it will appear, that the legislature could not have readily given the power of bail by the 13th Geo. 3rd, otherwise than they have done; and on thirty years experience no change has been thought necessary. When the legislature came, in the 44th Geo. 3rd, to extend this act to Ireland, and to make its benefits co-extensive with the three districts of the empire, the same reason still applied as to Scotland; and therefore, as between Ireland and Scotland the same impossibility of rationally giving the power of bail continued. The same reason as between England and Ireland does not prevail; but as thirty years experience had not furnished an objection to the practice under the 13th Geo. 3rd, it is not unreasonable to suppose the legislature thought the same rule a wise and a safe one as to England and Ireland, and that no great indulgence was due to an offender who had either fled from justice, or who had committed a crime by secret agency within a jurisdiction, and yet kept himself aloof from its ordinary process. But it has been urged, that while the legislature supposed such an ignorance of the laws of the different countries in the magistrates of each, it is hard to believe that it would subject to the laws of the other country a person resident in his own, and consequently ignorant of the laws of that jurisdiction against which he should offend: to which I answer, where a man offends by his corporal presence, there can be no doubt that he is bound to obey the laws which protect him; and when he offends by agency, from the moment that his misconduct passes the threshold of the other country, the well-known principle of the law, ignorantia legis non excusat, attaches upon him.

But the climax of this objection is, that by this construction, the 44th Geo. 3rd repeals the Habeas Corpus act. When I first heard this observation I own I was startled, as I felt that it was not an ordinary question, but one of vital importance to the law and constitution. However, in my mind, the most satisfactory answer can be given to it:—In the first place, even if it did virtually repeal that act, I should feel myself bound by the clear, explicit, and unequivocal wording of this act, to persevere in my construction. But I am happy that I am not called upon to perform so painful a task as to decide, that the Habeas Corpus act is repealed or materially affected by this act.

The two great evils which the Habeas Corpus act sought to remedy were, first, the delay of returns to writs of Habeas Corpus, whereby the king's subjects were unjustly detained in prison for illegal causes—and, secondly, where persons were illegally arrested and sent into prisons beyond the seas. It cannot be pretended, that this case falls within the first class of cases remedied by the Habeas Corpus act: here there is no delay of return of this writ; and the party has had the opportunity of instantly and amply discussing the legality of his arrest.—But we cannot bail him:—true, but the moment when he shall arrive in England he will be entitled to give bail for any misdemeanor charged against him by the laws of England, and there he will have the benefit of the English Habeas Corpus act. But is he in a worse situation thereby than a person arrested under the 23rd Geo. 2nd, would have been, that act having made no provision for bailing between county and county?—yet that act never was held to be a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act.

Under the 23rd Geo. 2nd, or prior thereto, a magistrate could not bail a person arrested in his county for a misdemeanor committed in another county. Under the 23rd Geo. 2nd, the person arrested for the misdemeanor, was transmitted by the magistrate to the proper county, and prior to that statute he was transmitted by Habeas Corpus. Was there any alarm or outcry against this kind of imprisonment from the year 1679, when the English Habeas Corpus act was passed, until the year 1750, when the 24th Geo. 2nd was enacted? or did it enter into the head of any man during that period to contend, that the Habeas Corpus act was infringed, by the arrest of a man for a misdemeanor, by a magistrate who could not bail, and transmittal of him to a county where he could be bailed? And yet what is this case but transmitting from district to district, instead of from county to county? and if any delay should occur in such progress, the party arrested could be relieved by writ of Habeas Corpus, as appears by the case I have already quoted from Strange's Reports. And I think it equally clearly appears, that this case does not fall within the second class of grievances remedied by the Habeas Corpus act. The preamble of the 12th section of the English Habeas Corpus act states as the evil to be thereby guarded against, "the illegal imprisonments of persons in prisons beyond the seas." Now can it be seriously contended, that sending a person for the purpose of trial, to a place where, under this very act, he must be bailed, is a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act?

On the whole, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that this act, the 44th Geo. 3rd, in the 3rd and 4th sections, extends the power of arrest to cases of misdemeanors. And this opinion I form, not merely from the clear and explicit words of the sections, but also from the spirit, intent, and object of the act. And in this part of the case I understand I am fortified by the unanimous opinion of the court of King's-bench.

I now come to the second objection made to the legality of this arrest, viz. "That the 44th Geo. 3rd (supposing it to extend to misdemeanors) is confined to breaches of the peace by actual presence, and where the person by quitting the jurisdiction evades punishment;" and this construction is contended for, as well in the case between county and county as between kingdoms, or to speak more correctly, between district and district. It therefore becomes necessary to take a review of the acts relating to counties, as well as those relating to distinct kingdoms:—the first act is the 23rd Geo. 2nd, cap. 26, sect. 11.

I am willing to admit, that this act confined the power of arrest to cases where the offender had changed his situation from one county to another, which is expressed by the words "escape and go into;" the one meaning a flight to avoid arrest---the other a change of place without any such intention; and this shows, that even in this act the enacting clause extended beyond the preamble, which is confined to the case of escape only.

The first view of this act shows it was inadequate to remedy the defects existing. What were these defects in the criminal code as to this point? By the limited jurisdiction of justices of the peace, their powers were confined to the limits of their counties: the criminal, if beyond such limits, was not within their reach. If the magistrate of the county where the criminal might happen to be was called on to act, with respect to an offence committed in another county, it must have been on informations sworn before him, which was grievous to the prosecutor, as it required him to travel to, perhaps, a distant county; and when by such examinations the magistrate was empowered to act, he could arrest the person; but in misdemeanors he could not bail.

How were these obstacles to public justice to be removed? By giving the magistrate the same power and authority in all cases over an offender found in his county, as if the crime had been committed in that county. I say in all cases, as well where the criminal had never changed his situation as where he had; for no man can seriously conceive, that the object of the legislature was (as has been contended) to punish the crime of flight---no; the object was to punish the offender for the original crime charged against him.—Besides, it is admitted, that a man who left a county, ignorant of any charge against him, may be legally arrested in any other county. Now, I would ask, is it not equally within the object of these acts to have the power of bringing to justice a man who has never changed his residence, and who may yet have been, by secret agency, guilty of the foulest crimes in a distant county, as to have the power of arresting a man in a distant county, who may have gone there on his lawful occasions, totally ignorant of any charge existing against him in the county which he has left? And, therefore, if the words of the 24th Geo. 2nd, and the two subsequent acts, viz. the 13th and 44th Geo. 3rd, will bear such a construction, I am bound to give them such construction; as by so doing, the attainment of justice is effected, and the defects of our criminal code removed which prevented the trial of offenders and granted impunity to criminals.

Let us now see how far the 24th Geo. 2nd, cap. 55, effected this purpose.

[Here his lordship stated the said act at large.]

Now, in my opinion, the enacting clause is clear and explicit, and sufficient to remedy all these defects which I have pointed out.—In the first place, the words, “any person or persons against whom a warrant shall issue,” are general, and not confined by any word of reference to the preamble. Then the words, escape, go into, reside, or be, should each receive, if they will admit of it, a definite and distinct meaning, so that none of them shall appear to be useless or superfluous. The word escape I construe to apply to cases where the offender flies from the county where he is accused, with a knowledge of such charge, and to evade trial. The words go into I construe to apply to the case of a man who leaves the county where he has been charged, ignorant of that charge, and goes into the other county on his lawful occasions. The word reside I construe to apply to the case where a man has neither escaped, nor gone into the county where he is arrested; but where he has permanently resided in that county, and yet has, by agency and procurement, committed a crime in another county. The word be I construe to apply to cases where the offender, without having either escaped, or gone into the county where he is arrested from the county where the crime was committed, and without residing permanently in the county where he is arrested, yet happens to be found in such county, having by procurement committed a crime in another county, where he was actually present:—as if, in this case, Mr. Justice Johnson had been arrested while on a visit to the county of Wicklow, or while passing through it; in that case, he had neither escaped from Middlesex, where the crime was committed; nor had he gone into Wicklow from Middlesex; nor did he reside in Wicklow; but he was found there, and therefore might properly be said to be there.

Now what is the construction given to these words, escape, go into, reside, or be, by the counsel for the prisoner? They contend, that these words can only apply to cases where the offender has actually left or fled from the county where the crime has been committed, and has gone into the county where he is arrested. And, to support this construction, they say the clause should be read thus:—If any person shall escape, or go into, or having escaped, or gone into another county, shall reside, or be there.—Now, it is manifest, that by this construction the words reside and be are utterly nugatory and superfluous; for, if the clauses are only to apply to the case of offenders who left the county where the offence is charged, and who have gone into the county where arrested, then the words escape and go into were sufficient to attain that object, and the parliament might have been content with these two words only, as it was when it passed the 23rd Geo. 2nd, in which the words reside and be do not occur. And the counsel for the prisoner, feeling that this construction obviously rendered the words reside and be utterly nugatory, endeavoured to give them some meaning; and what was their explanation of them? This extraordinary one: that the words reside and be were introduced to mark the extent of the magistrate's jurisdiction, and that he was not to execute the warrant so indorsed beyond his county.

But that such cannot have been the reason for introducing the words reside and be, is manifest from this, that the subsequent part of the section expressly directs the magistrate to execute the warrant only in the county where it is indorsed.—Thus it is manifest, that by the construction contended for by the prisoner, those important words reside and be are made nugatory and superfluous, and are literally expunged from the statute; whereas, by the construction I have given to these words, each word is made to express not only a distinct meaning, but is made descriptive of a distinct class of cases. And, by this construction, not only is verbal criticism satisfied, but what is much more important, the great object of the legislature, the great object of public policy, is attained, viz. the removal and annihilation of the ancient obstacles, which prevented the trial of offenders in many cases, and gave impunity to crime. Such a construction is, therefore, not only legal, but, in fact, coercive on a judge.

But it has been contended, that, by the preamble to the 24th Geo. 2nd, the enacting clause is to be confined to escape either before or after warrant granted. But, I deny that the preamble can in that act control in such way the enacting clause. No preamble can do so except in two cases—first, where by words of reference the preamble is made part of the enacting clause; secondly, where the enacting clause is obscurely framed, and then the preamble is resorted to as a mode of discovering the meaning of the legislature. Now, this statute does not fall within either of these cases; for in this enacting clause there are no words of reference to the preamble; nor is the enacting clause obscurely framed; nor does it require any assistance from the preamble to ascertain its meaning.

From the manner in which this argument has been used by the prisoner's counsel, it would follow, that nothing shall be deemed to be enacted by the statute beyond the limits of the preamble. If this were the rule, what would become of the right to bail given to the magistrate by this act? It is not mentioned in the preamble, and yet it is obvious that it must have been one great object of the legislature in passing this act. That the rule is as I have laid it down will appear from the case of the King v. Robinson, 2 East, P. C. 1113.

In that case, Mr. Justice Buller, in delivering the opinion of the twelve judges of England, uses these words:—"Where the enacting clause of a statute refers to such offences only as are contained in the preamble, it may be restrained by the preamble; but in this case it would be doing violence to very plain words, and repealing some of the obvious provisions if it were so restrained. It is no uncommon thing for the preamble of a statute to recite a particular mischief as the cause of making it, and yet for the enacting part of it to embrace more general objects, and to extend to other cases which the legislature thought within the mischief." So, in this case I would say in the words of judge Buller, the enacting clause does not refer to and connect itself with the preamble, and that to restrain the enacting clause in this case to what is specified in the preamble, would be doing violence to very plain words, and repealing some of the obvious provisions of the act.

There is a still more modern case, which, perhaps, even more accurately applies to this part of the case. It is the case of the King v. Marks and others, 3rd East's Reports, 157. That case came before the Court of King's-bench in England, on a motion to bail the prisoners on returns to writs of Habeas Corpus. The prisoners appeared to be charged with a felony under the 37th Geo. 3rd, cap. 123. By the preamble of that statute it was recited, that, "Whereas divers wicked and evil disposed persons have of late attempted to seduce persons serving in his majesty's forces by sea and land, and others of his majesty's subjects, from their duty and allegiance to his majesty, and to incite them to acts of mutiny and sedition, and have endeavoured to give effect to their wicked and traitorous proceedings, by imposing on the persons whom they have attempted to seduce the pretended obligation of oaths unlawfully administered."—The statute then enacted, among other things, that "to administer any oath or engagement not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy, should be a capital felony." It appeared by the examination returned with the writ, that the prisoners were charged that they, being journeymen shearmen to master clothiers, formed an association to raise their wages, and, in pursuance of such conspiracy, administered an oath to one of their trade, "to be true to the association, and not to divulge its secrets." It was contended in that case, and with much more plausibility than here, that as the preamble only related to oaths administered for the purpose of creating mutiny or disaffection in his majesty's troops, the enacting clause could not be extended to a case so dissimilar as that before the Court. But the Court held, that as there were no words of reference in the enacting clause to connect it with the preamble, and as the words of the enacting clause were general, that they included the case before the Court, and made it a felony. In that act the preamble professed to deal only with oaths tending to promote mutiny or disaffection in his majesty's forces, yet the general words in the enacting clause extended the penalty of even death to all illegal oaths. Shall it then be said, that when the life of a man is at stake, the preamble shall be rejected, but that it shall be made to operate when it is calculated to clog the wheels of justice, to prevent the trial of an offender, and to give even security to crimes?

Having thus shown what I conceive to be the true construction of the 24th Geo. 2nd, let us come to the next statute in point of date, the 13th Geo. 3rd. I have already observed, that in my opinion the object of the legislature in passing this act, the 13th Geo. 3rd, was to place Scotland and England in the same situation as to the arrest of criminals as two English counties, except with respect to the power of bail. And accordingly, in the 13th Geo. 3rd, the legislature uses in the enacting clause the very same words that are used in the 24th Geo. 2nd, viz. "if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued shall escape, go into, reside, or be."—These words must, therefore, receive the same construction in the latter act as in the 24th Geo. 2nd, according to the rule of construction I have already laid down.

Having thus commented on all the preceding acts, I come now to the act in question, the 44th Geo. 3rd. This act had two great objects in view:—In the first place, to give Ireland the benefit of the provisions of the 24th Geo. 2nd, as between county and county; and, secondly, to give Ireland the benefit of the provisions of the 13th Geo. 3rd, as between it and England and Scotland. The first object is attained by the first and second sections of the act, and the second object by the third and fourth sections—[Here his lordship read the material parts of the first section of this act.]—The object of this first section was, to give Ireland the benefit of the 24th Geo. 2nd; the preamble then, in reciting the defects in the criminal code which were to be remedied by it, would naturally state the defects which were removed in England by the 21th Geo. 2nd; that is, the preamble in the 44th Geo. 3rd would be as extensive as the enacting clause of the 24th Geo. 2nd, which I have already shown is more extensive than the preamble of the same act, viz. the 24th Geo. 2nd. Accordingly, we find, that the preamble in the first section of the 44th Geo. 3rd is entirely new, and differs essentially from that of the 24th Geo. 2nd. It farther recites, that, "Whereas it frequently happens that persons against whom warrants are granted by justices of peace in Ireland, escape into other counties; and it may also frequently happen that persons having committed offences in some county in Ireland, may reside or be in some other county."—By this preamble the legislature points out the two classes of cases which had been remedied by the 24th Geo. 2nd, and which were to be remedied as to Ireland by that act, viz. that class of cases where the offender had escaped from or left the county where the crime was committed; and secondly, that class of cases where the offender happened to reside or be in a different county from that in which the crime was committed, without having changed his residence, or escaped from such county. By this important change in the preamble of the first section of the 44th Geo. 3rd, from the preamble of the 24th Geo. 2nd, I conceive the legislature to have decided by a legislative construction the extent of the enacting clause of the 24th Geo. 2nd, and the distinct meaning of the words escape and go into, and reside and be; for the preamble of the 44th Geo. 3rd, states a case as an object of remedy by the act, in which nothing like escape ever existed or happened, and it remedies that defect by the same words, reside and be, in the enacting clause, as are used in the enacting clause of the 24th Geo. 2nd.

In the third and fourth sections of the 44th Geo. 3rd, and which peculiarly relate to this case, the same enacting words occur as in the first section, with one addition which still farther strengthens this construction, and the distinct meaning between the words escape and go into, and reside and be. I allude to the word whither, introduced into both the third and fourth sections, and which does not occur in the 13th Geo. 3rd.—By the third section (and so in the fourth) it is "enacted that it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county, city, &c. &c. in England and Scotland respectively, whither or where such persons shall escape, go into, reside, or be, to endorse his name on such warrant."—By the introduction of this word whither, the legislature seems to have been astute to discriminate and mark the difference between the words escape and go into, reside and be—the word whither applying to the two former, as the cases where a change of place had been affected; the word where applying to the words reside and be, where no change of situation had taken place.

Upon the whole, therefore, whether I look to this act alone, or to the four acts made in pari materia; whether I look to the words of this act, or the four, and construe them according to legal rules of construction, or whether I look to the great object, intent, and policy of the legislature; in all and each of those views of the subject, I am clearly of opinion, that the man who never was in the country where the crime charged against him was committed, is as liable to arrest under this act of the 44th Geo. 3rd, as the man who actually escapes from such country.

Two other topics yet remain, which have been urged by the prisoner's counsel, on which I will very briefly observe. It has been urged, that the mischief sought to be remedied by this act was the impunity of crimes; and that, as in this case, the prisoner ought to be tried in Ireland for publishing this libel, this case is not within the mischief sought to be remedied by the statute, and therefore ought not to be affected by its provisions. To this I answer, the crime of publication in Ireland is totally distinct from the crime of publishing in England—distinct in point of law, and essentially different in the consequences flowing from it. Suppose the prisoner were convicted of publishing this libel in Ireland, could he plead autrefois convict to an indictment in England for publishing the same libel? Certainly he could not. And nothing can more decisively show that the crimes are distinct.

What is it that essentially constitutes the crime of a libel against the government?—Its tending to alienate the affections of the subject from the crown, and to bring the government and its officers into contempt and disrespect. Can a trial in Ireland for publishing this libel, and a conviction here, compensate the justice of England for the violation of its laws by a publication there? Or can such conviction here compensate the injury the state has received in England, by the crimes and opprobrium cast there upon the Irish government?—The crimes are therefore not only distinct in point of law, but most essentially different in the evils and consequences resulting from them; and therefore such distinct crimes require and call for distinct punishments.

But, last of all, it has been urged by the prisoner's counsel, that the prisoner cannot be tried in England on the indictment, and should, therefore, be now discharged, in as much, say they, as he is not amenable to the laws of England, for an act done there by his influence and procurement, while he resided in Ireland. This position is too absurd to be combated: it would set at nought the principles and ties which bind the two countries together, and would hold out the greatest encouragement to crimes by the impunity it would afford. No authority has been quoted in support of it; and, I conceive, I should ill discharge the duties of my office, if I yielded to the confident assertion of such a principle, —a principle, which, if acted on, would go little short of separating the two countries. I will only say this: that every subject of the empire is bound, by his allegiance to the crown, to obey the laws of the empire; he is bound not to infringe the laws of any part of it, either by actually committing an illegal act, or procuring it to be done in any part of the empire. If he does so, he acts at his peril, and he must answer for it.

I have now gone through all the topics and arguments offered by the prisoner's counsel; and I have the consolation to reflect, that the opinion I have formed in this case, is supported by the decision of the court of King's-bench. And here I cannot help observing, that this decision of the court of King's-bench has been treated with too little attention by some of the counsel for the prisoner. One of the prisoner's counsel has told us, that the construction given to this act by the crown (and which is now sanctioned by the decision of the King's-bench), was so ridiculous that he would be content to be driven as a proscribed driveller from these courts, if he did not manifest its absurdity to the meanest capacity. It is unnecessary for me to say, that, in my opinion, he has totally failed in his undertaking. But, after such an observation, I think myself bound to state, that, if I had entertained doubts on this subject, I should have considered myself bound by the decision of that Court—a decision made after mature deliberation, and by judges of as great legal knowledge, and splendid talents, as any this country can boast of.

On the whole, I am of opinion, that Mr. Justice Johnson must be remanded; and, I feel happy, that, in pronouncing this opinion, I enforce no hardship upon him. I only thereby afford him that opportunity, which, were I placed in his situation, I should most anxiously desire—an opportunity of promptly meeting the charge, and proving my innocence.

Mr. Baron Smith.—In this case, the arrest appearing to me to have been illegal, I am consequently of opinion that the prisoner should be discharged.

Indeed, I conceive that such should be our rule, in a matter of less easy solution than the present; for it is only in cases of certainty, that the Court is to remand: in those of doubt, it is bound to bail, or to discharge: and here, accordingly, we ought to liberate, in as much as we cannot bail.

In entertaining the sentiments which I have thus briefly avowed, I am aware that I encounter the authority of my Lord Chief Justice;* whose fallibility I am the more reluctant to admit, because he would himself be the first to make, and nobly act on, the admission. But, fallible he is; for he is human: and it is superfluous to state, that in dissenting from the opinion, I venerate the man. He indeed is one, my deference for whose superior intellect and knowledge gives way only to my respect for his more valuable qualities; and to the honest exultation which I feel, that merit so uncommon is placed at the head of our crown law. I must differ with some degree of qualm from him, who more elevated by worth and talent, than by age or station, would lend a patient and docile ear to the arguments of the humblest man. Who, if these should bring conviction to his candid and modest mind, would unaffectedly rejoice to have his errors thus corrected; without adverting to the lowliness of the instrument which removed them; and whom this liberal sentiment alone would have sufficed to exalt, above the corrector to whom he yielded. A man, who may be proud; but is a stranger to that base pride, whose pert and disgusting offspring are obstinacy and presumption.

I am aware that I also differ in opinion from one with whom I have generally had the good fortune to agree; and from whom no man, who is as well acquainted with him as I am, can dissent, without considerable scruple and hesitation—I mean my highly esteemed and respected friend, judge Daly.

But let it be recollected, that the peculiar situation of judge Osborne precluded him from giving, and perhaps prevented him from forming, any judgment on the present question. It is possible that, had he not yielded to the circumstances of a situation, which he considered so delicate as to enjoin silence as a duty, he might have delivered an opinion, in concurrence with that of the second judge of the court, and in opposition to what a person, unacquainted with the manly integrity of his character, might suppose to be the more probable bias of his mind. In that event, the Court being equally divided, the prisoner would have been remanded, not so much by a substantial decision on his claim, as by virtue of an etiquette and form of law.

There is then a possible case, in which the court of King's-bench may be considered as having been equally divided. But, whether such an hypothesis be admitted or not, be it remembered, that my sentiments coincide with those of Mr. Justice Day; as independent a gentleman, and as intelligent and upright a magistrate, as, I believe, is to be found upon the bench of either country; and one eminently versed and informed in criminal law; a judge, to whose hands an innocent man might commit his life; and whose late decision seems calculated to prove, that the liberties of the subject may be entrusted to his care.

Nor am I unapprized that, in my own court, I am likely to be left alone: another argument (it must be confessed) to show that I am wrong. But here, too, I have to do with men, whose talents will forbid them to be arrogant or uncandid: for of talent, I find modesty the almost inseparable companion.

* Downes.

Thus have I every advantage, which the impartiality of the judicial station permits me to desire.

If I could but avail myself of these—If the truth and justice of my opinions could supply the deficiency of my powers, I should not despair of making an impression on my lord and brethren, in behalf (as I conceive) of our liberties and constitution.

The prisoner's detention must be justified, if it admit of justification, by the provisions of the act of the 44th of the present king, ch. 92; so that the question is upon the construction of that statute.

Where the enacting clauses are perfectly free from ambiguity or doubt, it is neither necessary, nor perhaps allowable, to resort to the title, preamble, or other parts of the statute, for the purpose of controlling the efficacy of such plain enactments.

Yet where the enacting passages are not completely clear; but on the contrary leave room for doubt, as to what should be their construction, the rule is otherwise. For though we may not travel out of the enactments, for the purpose of rendering clear expressions doubtful; we may look beyond them, in order to make dark expressions clear. In the latter case, law, as well as reason, permits us to derive assistance from other parts of the same act; and even expatiating farther for explanation, to illustrate the question by the purview of other statutes in pari materia;—by the essential spirit of our law, and fundamental principles of our constitution.

And here, by the way, let me protest against any argument, drawn from our supposed knowledge that the present act was framed for the case of the present prisoner. My respect for parliament will not allow me to admit such an hypothesis for a single moment: and though I were irreverently to admit a supposition, which, on the contrary, I reject;—and though I were to know, what on the contrary, I cannot believe;—that what professed to be a general and public law, was in fact a private and particular act of quasi attainder, I still should expound it by the ordinary rules of construction; though I were thereby to leave the meshes of the net too wide, for entangling the prey which it was intended to secure.

But, turning at once from a supposition, in the present case so unjustifiable, and in any case so inadmissible and culpably disrespectful, I will, agreeably to the doctrines which I have been laying down, admit the preliminary question here to be, whether the enacting words in the fourth section of the statute now before us, convey a meaning so unequivocal and precise, as to preclude the necessity or right of resorting elsewhere, for aid towards a sound and correct interpretation.

The prisoner here stands charged with a misdemeanor: and so far from having escaped from Great Britain into Ireland, since the alleged commission of the offence, the passing of the act, the issuing of the warrant, or day mentioned in the preamble,* it appears by an affidavit, which does not contradict the record before us, that from a period antecedent to the earliest of these dates, he has uninterruptedly continued a resident of Ireland. Therefore it may for argument be assumed, that from the hour of his birth to the present time, he never has quitted this country for a moment.

Do the words then of the fourth section of this statute precisely apply to, and unequivocally include, such a case as I have stated? and warrant the prisoner's apprehension and detention? If they do, he must be remanded; and conducted, with all the insignia of felony, to England. We have no right to discuss the policy of an unambiguous statute; our business being not to legislate, but to construe. What the legislature has done clearly, we are to intend that it has done rightly; nor can we consider a proceeding, which parliament has sanctioned, as inconsistent with the principles of a free government; or as an invasion of the constitution.

But I am far from considering the enacting words of the clause in question, as applying clearly to the prisoner's case.

The words are, that "from and after the first day of August, 1804, if any person, against whom a warrant shall be issued by a magistrate of Great Britain, for any crime or offence, against the laws of England or Scotland, shall escape, go into, reside, or be in Ireland, it shall be lawful to"—proceed as has been done in the case before us.

It is plain, that Mr. Justice Johnson does not come within the description of persons who have escaped, or gone into Ireland. The affidavit, already adverted to, excludes him from that class; and, if the enacting words had ended here, would manifestly exempt him from the operation of this statute.

But the enactments do not stop here. They extend to certain cases of persons who shall reside or be in Ireland. Therefore, if these words indisputably embrace judge Johnson's case, there is no more to be said. We may close the statute, without examining the remaining clauses; and with becoming reliance on the wisdom, and deference to the behests of parliament,—must remand the prisoner, without trembling for the constitution.

But these supplemental words, so far from relating unequivocally to the case before us, according to my construction of them, do not apply to it at all.

At least, it cannot be alleged, that they admit of but one reasonable exposition; or, consequently, that they are wholly unambiguous:—and if their ambiguity be once conceded, such admission will let in, for the purpose of explanation, the remaining passages, and general context of the statute; the policy of the law, according to one or other of the proposed constructions; together with the aid of those various topics which I have already noticed.

It cannot, I say, be contended, that the words "shall reside or be" can only mean shall from his birth have constantly resided, or from the hour of his nativity shall uninterruptedly have been. It must, on the contrary, be allowed, that such words may denote a residence, which, though not of future commencement (with reference to the issue of the warrant), yet originated in that previous removal or escape, which, as well from the title and general scope of the act, as from the immediately preceding and contiguous words in this very sentence, appears to have been the cardinal fact, in contemplation of the legislature.

Indeed the first of these interpretations I am so far from holding to be the only rational one, which the expressions can receive,—that so to interpret them, would, as it seems to me, be (at some expense of grammatical correctness) to violate the liberty of a subject,—to contravene the spirit of the Habeas Corpus act,—and to sap some of the best principles of our truly valuable constitution.

I therefore should, with little hesitation, construe these words, if they alone were placed before me, as if the sentence ran, "shall escape, go into, or" (having done so) shall "reside or be."—In other words, I should hold the legislature to have described a tarrying or residence, following upon, and having commenced with a removal.

But it is enough for me if, without too great subtlety of refinement, the words will admit of more than one interpretation. For then we may inspect the whole of this* and other statutes; revolving, at the same time, the maxims of our law, and constitution,—in order to decide which of these possible expositions is the right one. Thus it is, that the policy of the law comes under our consideration: a due respect for parliament inducing us to conclude, that a construction, which renders their act impolitic, must be a false one.

Having entitled myself to this latitude, I should yet begin the investigation by resorting not to any other section of the statute, nor even to the recitals or introductory parts of this;—but, confining myself to the context of the enacting passages themselves, I would observe, that if the exposition from which I dissent be adopted, the words "escape," "go into," and "reside," will be impliedly rejected as superfluous and useless; inasmuch as in this view, the single sweeping expression, the descriptio generalissima, "shall be"—would comprehend every case, to which the other words could by possibility extend. Invert the order; and the superfluity becomes more apparent—"If any person shall be in, reside in, escape or go into." This would be as if a statute were to say---if any quadruped, or horse, or dog, or cat, &c.

On the contrary, the construction for which I contend, besides being perhaps more consonant to the rules of grammar, and certainly far more favourable to the subject's liberty, is also more conformable to an established rule of interpretation: because, instead of expunging any words which the legislature has introduced, it gives (by the removal of tautology) some degree of meaning and efficacy to them all.

For, first, a person may, after warrant, escape into Ireland:

Or, secondly, without escaping (according to the technical meaning, or even ordinary acceptation of that word), he yet, after a warrant shall have been issued, may go thither, on (perhaps) his ordinary occupations:

Or, thirdly, having, before the issue of the warrant, absconded, or without absconding, arrived there,—he may, at the time of its issuing, be resident in Ireland:

Or, fourthly, he may be there, not as a fixed resident, but merely as a transient and temporary sojourner.

For these several cases, the legislature, according to my construction of their statute, will, without plainly tautologous repetitions, have provided; and prevented any quibbling evasions of the law, by a person who might otherwise be beyond the letter, whilst his case was within the spirit of it.

Again, the authority, which this section of the statute gives, is restricted to offences committed against the laws of England, or of Scotland (recognizing, by the way, their distinctness from those of Ireland.)

Now, though there may be cases, where a person, himself in one place, can yet commit a crime within another, still these are but rare exceptions to the general truth of the position, that whosoever is guilty of a crime, must himself, at the time of its perpetration, be in the place where it is committed.

This general truth is much more likely, than exceptions of rare occurrence, to have been within the contemplation of the legislature;—who may be therefore intended to have directed the provisions of their act to the purpose of making persons amenable, who having been in England or Scotland, and there broken the law, should afterwards quit the scene of their transgressions; and get beyond the sphere of the jurisdictions which they had defied.

Thus, first, whether after warrant issued, they should abscond, or only migrate: or secondly, previously to its issuing, had already escaped, or gone into Ireland; or, thirdly, whether they were temporary sojourners, or permanent residents, in that country,—all these would be immaterial and nugatory inquiries. In each case, the Act of the law, no longer halting, would overtake them: would annul the pernicious effects of their migration; and make them responsible for the offences which they had committed.

* "Agreeably to the maxim of sir Edward Coke, that a statute should be expounded, totâ lege inspectâ." Orig. Ed.

But, still, an indispensable requisite in each case,—a preliminary sine qua non would be, that they had been in England or Scotland, (as the case might be), and having there transgressed the local law, had afterwards withdrawn themselves from British jurisdiction.

The words, “against whom a warrant shall be issued” (in this section) may not have been enough considered, or made use of, to assist us in construing the words “reside or be.”

If it had merely been enacted, that “if any person, against whom a warrant should be issued, for a crime of which he had been guilty in Great Britain, should escape or go into Ireland,” such words might only include the case of a migration subsequent to the issue of such warrant—and criminals withdrawing themselves in the interval between the commission of the offence, and the issue of the warrant, might thus evade the law. Therefore, the words “reside or be” are properly subjoined. These latter words include a greater portion of time; and extend the provisions of the act to the case of a migration, subsequent indeed to the crime, but previous to the warrant.

And this construction is supported by the following facts, viz. that the statute, which we are now expounding, is taken from an act passed for the case of England and Scotland, in the 13th of the king; and which is itself derived from, and in some degree compounded of, two English acts for county and county, passed in the 23rd and 24th years of George 2nd. The first of these latter acts uses the words “escape or go into,” merely: whereas the second, without altering the scope or meaning of the former, added the more comprehensive words reside or be. Plainly, because the letter of the earlier statute had failed to reach a case within its spirit; viz. a removal from one county to another, before the issuing of the warrant, though after the commission of the crime. A collation of the preambles of the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd, puts this matter beyond doubt; and proves that the words “reside, or be,” were inserted in the latter act, merely on this account: and the general preamble of the 44th of the king, (which is, properly speaking, dispersed and scattered through the first, third, and fourth sections), is, substantially, a mere compilation from those two preambles: and therefore shows, that the words “reside or be” have been introduced, eadem intuitu, into this recent statute. I say, first, that the statute now before us, contains no general preamble; except one, formed by a collation of the introductions of its first, third, and fourth sections: For the first of these is confined to removals from one Irish county to another; the third, to migrations from Ireland to Great Britain; and the fourth, to escapes from Great Britain into Ireland: whereas the general purview of the act extends to all those cases; viz. of escapes from county to county; and reciprocally from each of the islands to the other. Secondly, thus collected, the general preamble of the act before us, is substantially equivalent to the joint preambles of the 23rd and 24th Geo. 2nd. The only difference is, that the 24th of his late majesty, being an amendment of a former statute, of course contains a special and pointed recital of the omissions and inadequacies which it meant to cure; whereas the 44th of the king, being no amendment of any former act, includes no such reference, nor any such recital.

Another enactment, of the fourth section of the present statute, seems to favour my opinion, that the cases which parliament had in contemplation, were those of persons who had been in Great Britain; and having there offended, removed afterwards to Ireland.

The passage to which I allude is that, by which the British magistrate “is authorized to proceed with regard to such person,” when brought before him, “as if he had been legally apprehended in England or Scotland.”—That is to say, as if he had not quitted the country, of which he had violated the law.

Excepting the few digressive remarks which have just occurred, I have hitherto confined myself, not only to the 4th section of the 44th of the king, but to its mere enacting parts; without drawing any arguments from its preamble, or recitals.

I now, without travelling beyond this clause, would conclude my observations on it, by calling the attention of my hearers, to the introductory sentence;—which expressly states, that the evil and “inconvenience,” for “remedy” of which, its provisions are enacted, is “the escape into Ireland of persons guilty” (not of offences, but) “of crimes, in England or Scotland.”

But this introductory sentence goes farther still. The evil, to which it proceeds to apply a remedy, it states to be the like inconveniency, with that recited in the preamble, and corrected by the provisions of the preceding section.

Thus the introductory part of the third section becomes, by reference, incorporated with that of the fourth; and we may have, and ought to have, recourse to the former, for the purpose of explaining the doubtful enactments of the latter.

What, then, are the introductory recitals of this third section?

- 1st. That it may happen,
- 2ndly. That felons, and other malefactors,
- 3rdly. In Ireland, or Great Britain,
- 4thly. Make their escape reciprocally from the one island to the other.
- 5thly. Whereby their offences often remain unpunished.
- 6thly. By reason of there not being sufficient provision by the laws in force in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, for apprehending and transmitting such offenders to the country in which their offences were committed.

7thly. That for remedy thereof, it be enacted, as then follows.

These several passages, forming a preamble, which belongs as properly to the fourth section as to the third,—I shall now proceed to consider seriatim.

First, The words, “it may happen that malefactors escape,” are prospective; and, when connected with the following expressions, “shall reside or be,” suggest a residence, ensuing upon such preliminary elopement.

And, by giving a different interpretation to these latter words, we might be guilty of more than a merely critical transgression. We might turn this act into an ex post facto law; which should not only bring a stale offender to justice, by infinite (or at least indefinite) retrospection; but might, after a lapse of many years, pervert a lawful action to a crime. As where, for instance, the act prohibited in England, had been, when done in Ireland, permitted, by the laws of that then distinct and independent realm. Thus the statute would be construed to do that, which those who oppose my construction, not only admit, but insist that it has not done; it would create, not merely a new amenability, but a new offence.

Secondly, if the term malefactor (not found in the first section, which extends clearly to inferior offences), be applied to persons charged with trivial misdemeanors, the application will at least be novel and unusual; and can only be supported by obsolete research.

To suppose that parliament intended to describe, under the opprobrious title of malefactors, persons guilty of the slightest and most pardonable transgressions, might be to impute to them phraseology, disproportionate at the least. Such a construction would stigmatize as a malefactor, any man, who, under the influence of the most intolerable provocation, committed a merely constructive assault by raising his hand, without striking the provoker. It would ascribe to the legislature the improbable intention, that if, after having lifted his hand in England, any business or accident brought such a man to Ireland, he might, after the interval of half a century at least, be hurried without bail or mainprize on board ship, and carried back to the place from whence he came; and which such a construction would transform, from the abode of freedom, to a gaol.—The place where he had been betrayed into this imprudent gesture; and where, after a tedious imprisonment and irksome voyage, he might probably, on conviction, be fined sixpence, and discharged.

What a horrid instrument of envenomed and oppressive vengeance, in the hands of an implacable and malignant foe, might—not the statute, but this perversion of it, supply!—Can we believe that, by the epithet malefactor, parliament designated such a venial trespasser as I have described?—Yet, unless we believe them to have so intended, the case of judge Johnson is not within the designation. For a libel is no more than a misdemeanor: and if persons charged with libelling be malefactors, we must admit that the grievously outraged man, who merely elevates his hand against his reviler, is likewise a malefactor; and, as such, within the law.

Indeed libel ranks beneath even the slight transgression which I have noticed. For a libel not being, but only at the utmost tending to, a breach of the peace, is not an offence, for which sureties of the peace could be required; if we may trust to the authority of 1st Lev. 139; and to the judgment of lord chief justice Pratt, in the case of the king against Wilkes; as reported in 2nd Wilson, in the State Trials, and in a Digest of the Law of Libels.

Indeed, though his lordship there declares it to be “absurd, to require surety of the peace from a libeller,”—yet he seems to admit that there was one case (I mean that of the seven bishops), in which the contrary opinion had been maintained. But as he denies that case to be law; or an authority to prove any thing save, “the miserable condition of the times” when it occurred,—I could not, upon the whole, desire to see doctrines, recognized in the case of the seven bishops, used to sanction proceedings against the twelve judges of this country.

This doctrine of lord Camden, that sureties of the peace cannot be demanded of a libeller, becomes more material in support of my argument, and in exclusion of libellers from the class of malefactors, if we collate it with 2nd Hale, P. C. 136; where it is laid down that malefactors may be bound to their good behaviour.

In Wilson, and also in the State Trials, my lord Camden is made to express a farther opinion; viz. that it is absurd to require bail of a libeller. But not being able to reconcile this latter expression with either principle or practice, or with other dicta, which occur in the same case, I presume that the reporter must have made some mistake.*

Therefore, declining to avail myself of a doctrine, which I cannot understand, I confine myself to repeating, that a libel is no more than a misdemeanor; and that all such offences are bailable at the least (Com. Dig. tit. Bail, F. f. 3, page 661).

And though the moral turpitude of some libellers may greatly exceed that of the constructive assailant whom we have noticed, yet there might be libels, which, in foro Conscientiæ (the tribunal where all discretionary punishment is defined), would be little, if at all, more culpable than his assault.

Libels include many and various shades of guilt; from atrocity of the deepest gloom, to a twilight verging the pure horizon of innocence itself.

There are libels, which are false and poisonous. There may be others, which are true; and which might be harmless,—if it were not for the proud and angry passions that they rouse. Enraged to find their faults, or absurdities exposed, vanity may tempt those who are so detected to break the peace; and thus the malice of the libelled serves in some degree, to constitute the guilt of him that libels: the tendency of such publications to create animosity being, according to sir William Blackstone (4th Com. 151), the whole of what, in a criminal prosecution, the law (until conviction) can consider.

The case of unwritten defamation is widely different. There, the words must impute a crime; and must impute it falsely. In such cases, therefore, there is a malum in se on the part of the (yet not prosecutable) offender; and towards constituting this slanderer's guilt, we need not have recourse to the spite of his opponent.

That I do not misrepresent the law, by supposing the case of a true libel, cannot be denied. For, from the established maxim, that on an indictment the truth of the libel will be no defence, we must infer that such anomalies, as true libels, may exist.

But, feeling that what technically amounts to libel, may ethically be a slight and trivial fault,—not only the judges of the King's-bench, the Custodes Morum of the country, will generally refuse an information, unless it be pointedly and distinctly sworn, that the written charge is untrue (Doug. 284); but after conviction, on an indictment, the Court may take the truth of the writing, and other circumstances into consideration; and inflict a mitigated punishment in a venial case. In-somuch, that after his voyage and confinement, the libeller, like the assaulter, might have to pay no more than sixpence in the shape of fine.—In such an event, how stunted would the vengeance of a resentful prosecutor be, who was not permitted to carry his victim, without bail or mainprize, beyond sea!

Again, another species of libel might be remedial; if it were not that no transgression of the law can be so held; and that the vanity and selfish passions of those, whose conduct they regarded, might cause such writings to irritate where they would otherwise correct. So far from being likely to find a modern Aristides, who, at the desire of an obscure and illiterate fellow-citizen, would himself write the unjust suffrage which should exile him from power, we might sometimes, amongst future statesmen, meet with those who would seek to crush with the heaviest vengeance of the law, such as truly exhibited their errors to a suffering public; and would try to ascend by steps, not of legislative frame, but of their own unconstitutional construction, to the very pinnacles and loftiest apices of our code; in order to pounce with the greater force, upon their quarry, from a distance.

Therefore, no libel can be regarded as being useful in fact,—any more than it is permissible by law. But the shades of criminality, as we have seen, are very various:—and, as by our present decision we establish a general rule,—it should be assumed that the case before us is one as venial, as might, by possibility, occur.

Let me not be understood to say, that the present is a case of slight transgression. It might, on the contrary, turn out to be one of deep enormity. It will be for a jury, if the matter shall come legally before them, to pronounce whether the prisoner be innocent or guilty; and if the latter, it will be for the judge, in measuring the punishment, to define the atrocity or slightness of his offence. Meantime, I assume the case to be a venial one; merely because such a case might occur; and to such a case our present decision would apply.

If I sought to give examples of less pardonable defamation, I might instance a gross libel on his majesty, and on our establishments in church and state; said to have been published, I will not specify when or where; so that to no publication can my description be applied, which does not come glaringly within it, by being a seditious libel. I might notice a most calumnious and groundless rumour, which some malicious slanderers sent forth,—that persons connected with the government, forgetful of such connexion, gave this libel encouragement and circulation. I might advert to a scandalous report which went abroad, that a person, pointing at one of the judges as he administered justice from the bench, was heard to say, “that scoundrel will not long sit where he is: sufficient evidence is procured against him.” I might remind my hearers of some printed scandal, directed against the magistrates of a respectable county; and involving in its obloquy the general loyalty of Ireland; or I might allude to a piece of slanderous derision, contemptuously inscribed to Mr. Justice Fox, and falsely attributed to a gentleman of the bar. I might throw in the example of the like pus atque venenum levelled against me, and subscribed with a real or fictitious author's name. In this invective (erroneously, perhaps, ascribed to a pensioner of government) I am (in order to promote a due respect for the administration of justice) represented to the public, in my judicial character, as vain, empty, capricious, ignorant, ill-tempered, malignant, servile, and corrupt. I might hint at a false rumour, which some have contrived to spread, that the press of this country, whose freedom, on the contrary, so strongly supports our constitution, has been suffocated by the combined efforts of menace and corruption. Or, lastly, I might recall an equally-false report, that one judge was publicly declared to have composed those writings, for which another judge is now said to be indicted. Such a declaration is by rumour alleged to have proceeded from one, whom no man that knows him can respect more than I do; whose public virtue I will admit to be equal to his private worth; and who, if he were a monarch, might, I doubt not, prove a father to his country.

If it were certain that the above cases had occurred, I perhaps might cite them as instances of heinous defamation. But I cannot well suppose them to have all happened;—and even if they had, I should feel more pleasure in commending (though to some portion of this praise I might myself perhaps lay claim) the lenity, which has forborne to take proceedings against such offenders.

If I have been endeavouring to dilute the criminality of libel, and reduce it to its proper and its legal standard, I might refer it to some perhaps of those who hear me, whether it would be easy to pitch upon a man, who has fewer motives for being partial to calumny than I have.

I therefore proceed with the less scruple to observe, that it is no answer to what I some time ago objected, to assert, that libel being maleficium, he who is guilty of it is malefactor. The argument would prove too much; and therefore it proves nothing. “Crime and misdemeanor” (says judge Blackstone) “are, properly speaking, synonymous terms.”—Yet who would pronounce that a statute, purporting to relate to crimes, must therefore be extended to misdemeanors? When the same learned commentator informs us farther, that, by the Norma loquendi, common usage, the word crime denotes offences of a deeper dye; while smaller faults are comprised under the gentler title of misdemeanor.

Indeed, if maleficium were the radix, from which these statutable malefactors sprung, then every person guilty of a tort, every wrong-doer might be a malefactor, within the meaning of this act. For every civil action, which is not founded on a contract, arises (and is held to do so) ex maleficio, or delicto; and the general issue which a jury, in these latter cases, has to try, is, whether the defendant be guilty or not?—Thus a man, charged with such a conversion as might merely entitle the plaintiff to recover against him in trover, being accused of maleficium, would be a malefactor, by the statute in that case made and provided: and as soon as the declaration (i. e. charge) was on the file, might, if the venue were laid in England, be hurried over, without bail or mainprize, to that country.

Or again (and note the dilemma), restrict the operation of the act to public wrongs; and mark what follows from the construction which I oppose. He who speaks the foulest, falsest, and most injurious scandal, is not an object of legislative rigour: whilst he who writes and publishes what is strictly true, and eminently venial, and only provoking because the person written against is vain—shall be caught within the talons of this (so construed) penal law.

The above allusion to delictum, and forced construction, which it is sought to put on the word malefactor, reminds one of what is recorded by lord Clarendon and Mr. Hume, to have taken place in the disturbed reign of the unfortunate Charles 1st.

The ruling powers (say these historians) then invented “the term delinquents; to express a degree and species of guilt, not exactly known or ascertained. In consequence of which invention, many of the nobility and prime gentry found themselves involved in the crime of delinquency. Whoever incurred the displeasure or suspicion of administration, was committed to prison, and prosecuted, under the notion of delinquency. After all the old gaols were full, many new ones were erected; and even the ships were crowded with the gentry, who languished below decks, and perished in those unhealthy confinements; while the government, in the mean time, established the maxims of rigid law, and spread the terror of its own authority.”

From the second passage in the preamble to the third clause (which by adoption is become the preamble to the fourth) I therefore am inclined to pronounce, that the offence charged upon judge Johnson, not being one of the majora crimina, he is not, by common usage, or in technical language, a malefactor: that, consequently, his alleged transgression was not in the contemplation of parliament; and that on this ground he is exempt from the operation of the present act.

It is true that this argument might operate to protect a person, who having committed a gross and aggravated misdemeanor in Great Britain, had removed into this country, to elude the law: and thus a mischief would arise, and an intention be frustrated, which it might not be unreasonable to attribute conjecturally to the legislature. Then let our lawgivers (if to their wisdom one seems wanted) frame a statute, which, without departing from the legitimate rules of construction, we may interpret to embrace such misdemeanors, if attended with escape.

But let us not meantime found conjectures as to the intentions of our parliament, on matter dehors the act which we are reading, and still more dehors the maxims of the free government under which we live.

Let not those who but now, imprisoning themselves within the enactments, refused to search for the lawgiver's intention in even the neighbouring preamble, inconsistently intrench on the extensive ground of vague surmise, to make a breach in that constitutional mound of freedom, the Habeas Corpus act; by rejecting bail from one charged with a merelyailable offence—on the spot where the capture has been made; and where law and justice concur in directing that bail should be received. Let us not make a practical and pernicious bull, in endeavouring to secure a part, by a sacrifice of the whole; in removing the foundation, to complete or decorate the building. Let us not commit a more heinous offence than libel, by so straining an act of parliament, as to risk the subversion of the constitution. Let us on the contrary recollect, that one of the most fundamental principles of law is this; that no man, apprehended for a misdemeanor, who can find security for answering a charge of which the law presumes him innocent, shall be deprived of his liberty for a single moment; or removed even an inch from the spot where he was taken:—much less “exulet—vel utlagetur, vel aliquo modo destruetur”: much less shall he be sent an imprisoned exile from his country; an outlaw, beyond the sphere of his native code; to be ruined in his health, his character, and fortune; and this perhaps for the lowest of all offences—the statement of a truth, by which some vindictive man, instead of being corrected, is annoyed.

No: as yet the bench of Ireland is independent. If it ceased to be so, I should cease to sit upon it; and while it does (and may it long!) continue free, I will never convert myself into a legislator by construction—for the purpose of repealing the Habeas Corpus act, or abrogating Magna Charta. That the legislature will annul either, I am far from fearing or predicting: But if ever it should be their intention so to do—the words resorted to for the purpose, in order to their being efficacious, must be express.

Thirdly: the malefactors, spoken of in this preamble, are described as being in Ireland or Great Britain: that is to say (whilst we are considering the fourth clause), as in Great Britain.

Thus this passage is consistent with the rest; and favours my idea, that to give operation to the statute, the offender whom it is sought to arrest in Ireland, should have been in Great Britain when the offence was committed.

Fourthly: the last-mentioned sentence, if it wanted explanation, is explained by the statement which next follows, viz. that such malefactors may make their escape from one island to the other:—to remedy the mischief arising from which escape, is the object which the legislature professes to have in view.

Now how a person, already in Ireland, and there quiescent, could contrive at the same time to be eloping from England thither, I confess myself at a loss to comprehend.

Indeed this appears to me to be one of those impossibilities, which are equivalent to a change of sexes; and which therefore, on the authority of lord Coke, we may doubt the competence of parliament to enact.

Therefore, judge Johnson having been in Ireland, from the year 1802 to the present time, must have found it impracticable to escape thither in 1804; and consequently cannot be within the meaning of the act, so far as this preamble guides us to its true construction. His case not being within the evil, is not within the remedy.

On a matter not before me, I am not bound to give an opinion. But it might, perhaps, with more than plausibility, be doubted, whether in the case of higher misdemeanors, attended with escape, there would be unreasonable rigour in refusing bail from the offender, until he was reconveyed within the pale of those jurisdictions from which, after outraging them, he had retired. The elopement might at once be evidence and an aggravation of his guilt, sufficient to render him, properly speaking, a malefactor; and justly to deprive him of part of the privilege of bail. Besides, his escape was a wrongful act; of which we perhaps should be allowing him to take advantage, if we admitted him to bail, before he were brought back. But to make this reasoning apply, there must be an escape;—and the rule should be confined to misdemeanors of a serious nature. In a word, it will be for the legislature to make such a rule, if such be wanting. I merely doubt whether it can be collected from a sound construction of the act before us.

Fifthly (to return): the preamble goes on to state, that the only way in which these escapes are mischievous, is this; viz. that thereby, the offences remain unpunished. Now those who apply the enacting words which follow, to the situation of the present prisoner, lay the basis of those enactments in a false recital. For the recital would be untrue, if it were interpreted to state, that in the case before us, any such mischief or impunity need arise.

The misdemeanor, charged to have been committed by this malefactor in England, is a libel: and for any thing we can know to the contrary, a venial libel; containing nothing but the truth. The definition of libel, as we have already seen, must be comprehensive; in order to be commensurate with the spite and insolence of man.

The necessity for drawing a line thus constrains us to admit a doctrine, which might (I grant) be pushed to inconvenient lengths. The prose writer, who by depicting their deformity, endeavoured to scare or banish slavery, or vice, might be punished as a libeller, when he hoped to be honoured as a reformer,—for having unwittingly sketched a likeness of some tyrant or malefactor, as striking and as casual, as that which we have seen of Chaucer, traced by the sportive hand of nature, on a pebble:—whilst the poet, who deserting the safe labyrinth of “no meaning,” should rashly venture to “tell either truth, or lies,” might repent him, as bitterly as Horace of his Iambicks: or if he strayed into a perhaps not “needless Alexandrine”—but one which, on the contrary, the subject much required, might find that, agreeably to the critic’s prediction, he had to do with “a wounded snake.”

Let me again protest against being supposed to assert the truth of the publication, which has produced the question now before us. It would indeed be the reverse of true, if it denied the worth or honour of the justly respected, and truly excellent lord Hardwicke: if it disparaged the knowledge, or impeached the integrity of lord Redesdale; or represented my esteemed friend, and upright brother, Mr. Justice Osborne, as a man of corrupt principles, or meanly pliant dispositions.

But its contents are not judicially before us: nor if they were, could our decision properly turn on their enormity. Resting upon wider grounds, our determination would extend as an authority, to the most venial case, coloured with the slightest and the faintest tint of blame. Such a case we ought therefore to take the present to be.

Now it appears that the malefactor was in Ireland, at the time when the libel is alleged to have been written. Consequently, if guilty, he must be so by having transmitted it to England.

If he did so by dictating the contents to another, this was a publication, for which he may be punished here.

Or if a libel were contained in a letter, written in any Irish county, and there delivered to a messenger, or put into the post-office, he may be prosecuted, where he thus departed with the possession of it. That is to say, he is liable to be proceeded against, in Ireland. He must be so, as long as the case of Metcalfe against Markham, in the 3rd Term Reports, 652, is law.

For where the one transaction is at once a private injury, and public wrong, the same circumstances which would suffice to change the venue into a given county, on the allegation that the cause of action had arisen there, must also furnish ground of indictment within that county.

Thus, though judge Johnson should be guilty, his offence need not remain unpunished; and therefore his case does not come within the mischief, which this statute was emphatically meant to remedy.

While I am upon this subject, let me add, that if a case were conceivable (which by me it is not), where a libeller, without quitting Ireland, could be guilty of publication exclusively in England,—and consequently where, not being amenable to British power, he would, unless by virtue of this act, escape punishment altogether—still the present act should not be applied to such a case. For we could not draw the line; but must likewise extend the statute to other cases, not within the mischief against which the legislature was providing.

If this act be defective, it only follows that it should be amended. Meantime our business is not to add new clauses; but to expound those which are set before us. Besides it is clearly better that one case should escape the statute, than that by straining to catch this, we should grasp others, which parliament never intended to include.

Resorting to considerations of policy, as guides to sound construction, I would observe, that such an extension might produce the most unconstitutional effects.

It might enable a government in Ireland (I advert to future, and merely possible, not actual circumstances or times), which found its conduct strongly animadverted on, and chose to consider the animadversion as nothing the less libellous for being true,—to withdraw the trial of the question from an Irish tribunal, and take it from a jury of the vicinage, to the inhabitants of (juridically) a foreign country:—to persons less cognizant of the situation,—less anxious for the liberties,—less interested in the welfare of Ireland than we must be,—and who would be less exposed to the oppressions of its government, if these existed:—to persons of whom some (as there seems too much reason to apprehend) know about as much of the situation and interests of this country, as they do of the interior of Africa, or of the kingdom of Ava.

It might enable them to remove the case to a tribunal, less competent than our own, to pronounce upon that truth, which may be urged to extenuate, though not to justify the offence.

It might enable them to make choice of a tribunal, judging of the state of this country, and the conduct of its government, from the reports made by those very ministers, who thus changed the venue, from the place where (if any where) the crime was actually committed, to where it was only perpetrated by construction—ministers, who might detain their opponent without bail or mainprize,—hurry the most dignified of our magistrates on board ship, and convey them, in the guise of felons, to another country,—there to regain their liberty, when they could prevail on strangers to be their bail,—there to abide their trial, without the power of enforcing the attendance of witnesses to prove their innocence.

When the legislature shall plainly enact that this may be done, then, but not sooner let us recognize a law, which to common eyes, and perhaps but superficial observation, appears so little favourable to the liberties either of the subject, or of the press.

The time might come, when such abuses, as I have been noticing, would prevail.

I shall here take the liberty of digressing to a collateral subject; nearly connected however with the principal inquiry; and still more closely allied to what I hold it my duty to assert: I mean the respectability and honour of the judicial station.

I allude to a letter (which while I was an assessor of my Lord Chief Justice, I heard read); written by sir Evan Nepean,* and addressed to Mr. Justice Johnson; in which the former very properly suggests, that it would become the punctilious dignity of a judge to promote, rather than obstruct, the investigation of his conduct and of the truth of any criminal charge preferred against him.

Whether Mr. Justice Johnson be innocent or guilty, is a question neither within my power, nor my province, to decide. It is questio facti; ad quam Judices non respondent.

But I owe it to the character of that exalted (and I hope respected) order, to which I have the honour (for it is still an honour) to belong,—to observe that he does not seem to me to have shrunk from trial, or betrayed unwillingness to be amenable to justice.

He has but manifested a reluctance, compatible with utter innocence; and which, in similar circumstances, I should feel: a reluctance to be tried before a distant, and comparatively incompetent tribunal; without means of securing the testimony of witnesses in his own behalf.

Besides, I may suppose him to have entertained the opinion, which I avow myself to hold;—viz. that any arrest of him, under this statute, is illegal. If such were his opinion, he would have owed it more to the laws and liberties of Ireland, than to himself, to dispute the validity of an unconstitutional apprehension: and he would, at a moment critical to the bench, and to the country, have been a traitor to the privileges and independence of his order,—and to the freedom, laws, and constitution of the island which gave him birth,—if he had not acted precisely as he has done:—by eluding, with an address and presence of mind which do him credit, what might have seemed, but certainly was not, an attempt to hurry him beyond sea, with a celerity, which should outstrip the languid march of the Habeas Corpus.

I impute nothing to those who executed the warrant. It commanded expedition; and perhaps they but obeyed it. But (spite of the respectable support which it has obtained), I impute much to a construction, which gives such efficacy to this process; whilst it paralyzes an act on which our liberties depend.

I recoil from an interpretation, which might, in many venial cases, render any resort to the protection of the Habeas Corpus act, incompatible with obedience to the orders of a warrant, which enjoins instantaneous removal by the most direct way; and will not tolerate the least delay, or slightest circuitry of deportation.

How happy his majesty's government ought to feel, that though the attempt was merely seeming, the failure has been real,—to withdraw the prisoner's claims (valeant quantum) to liberation, from the cognizance of those legitimate tribunals, which have since sitten in judgment on them!—that in his present infirm state, he is not yet deposited in an English dungeon, there to pine, until humanity should induce strangers to become his bail;—or until (wind and weather, and their own liberality permitting) his friends on this side of the water should cross the Channel for his relief!

If honourable firmness in one instance, will warrant a presumption against baseness in another, the measures taken by judge Johnson, to bring the case of his country before the law, rather furnish proofs of innocence, than imply consciousness of guilt.

Nor (to revert to the correspondence which was read at the chamber of my Lord Chief Justice), is it any answer to what I have been urging, to observe that the prisoner might have escaped the dangers which have been stated, by giving the security ascertained by Mr. Marsden;—and measured (as might seem, from the letter of sir Evan) by the authority of the under secretary himself, and without the concurrent sanction of the lord lieutenant's pleasure.

It may be even admitted, that those perils by land and water might have been avoided, by Mr. Justice Johnson's signing the undertaking, prescribed by Mr. Justice Bell.

But, in acceding to either proposal, he would have recognized an authority to arrest him; and thus, if my construction of the statute be a right one, would pro tanto have compromised the laws and liberties of his country. Nor do I wish to disparage the liberality of the gentleman, who proposed to judge Johnson to give security for his appearance: I presume he gave the statute a construction, which is now sanctioned by great authority; though it strikes my humble understanding as being unconstitutional, and false.

I therefore interpret as an indulgence, conduct which might otherwise be regarded as a specimen of rigorous ingenuity, and adroit oppression.

I also indeed heard (at my Lord Chief Justice's), a third offer made: that if judge Johnson would but confess himself the author of a libel, he should be gratified in his wish for a trial in this country. But even this candid and liberal proposal, one can conceive that an innocent man might possibly reject.

For, when turned to familiar language, see what seems to be its amount.

"Relieve me from the necessity of proving, what perhaps I could not prove. Rebut the presumption of the law that you are innocent; and though you may not come out, like Barnardine, to be hanged,—confess, at least, that you are guilty. If you do this, take my word for it, you shall not go to prison. On the contrary, I will send an issue to an Irish jury, to try and inquire whether your confession be the truth?—And as for my lord Ellenborough's warrant, it shall be disobeyed."

I do not say that such was the proposal; but by a simple man it might have been so understood.

To return from this not foreign or irrelevant digression. In declining the jurisdiction of an English tribunal, judge Johnson may not escape punishment; nor is it to be intended that he wishes to evade it.

On the charge made against him, he may be tried in Ireland; and in this, as in the other part of the united kingdom, a suitable punishment would be the consequence of his conviction: for the judicial power is not yet abrogated amongst us.

That if he wrote the libel, he did so in Ireland, is plain from this, that he is sworn to have been there, at, before, and since the time, when his offence is laid to have been committed.

That by writing and sending it, he became subject to a prosecution here, may be inferred, as well from authorities directly in point,—as (without any case) from the mere reason of the thing.

For, the writer's sending of such libel was the sine quâ non to its publicity: and the only act done on his part, procuring another to publish; and thereby amounting to a publication by himself.

For, not having been in England, he cannot in any way have published there, save by conveying thither the manuscript, from which printed copies were dispersed.

Now if, on the one hand, this act be not a publishing, he is unconnected with the fact of publication in England. The privity between him and the circulator of the scandal is destroyed. The fact of publication being essential to his guilt, he thus becomes utterly absolved; and escapes punishment, only by being innocent of the charge.

On the other hand, if the writing and sending amount to publication, they must do so where they occurred. They must do so in the place from which the manuscript has been sent. Thus, having in Ireland published the defamation, the wrong-doer may be there convicted, of an offence which he has there completed.

If (as in the king against doctor Hensey, 1st Burrow, 646) a letter, though intercepted, may be an overt-act of treason; and (per lord Mansfield) one, dated at Twickenham, is an overt-act in Middlesex;—and if in Jackson's case* (tried in the King's-bench here), a letter written in Dublin, and found in the general post office of that city, was held to be an overt-act of treason there,—by inevitable analogy, a libel, put into the Dublin post-office, is there published; nor less published, if delivered to any person there. Indeed Comyns's Digest, title Libel, Publication, B. 1, puts the matter beyond controversy.

It is no answer, to allege (nor am I called on to deny), that if an offender sent a libel to London, to be published, it might be his act in that city, if the publication took place there (1st Strange, 77).

It is sufficient for my purpose, that the writing and sending amounted to a publication in Ireland; so that, though this statute were never passed, the writer need not escape punishment; consequently that his case, not coming within the mischief which is recited, does not require the remedy which is prescribed;—and that it would be as unnecessary, as it might be unconstitutional, to drag a person, against whom such an accusation was preferred,—to a distant tribunal,—where the essential act of publication by him could not be alleged really and de facto, but merely by construction of law to have taken place;—where no witnesses, competent to exculpate him, could be found;—and where he could not, by means of compulsory process, collect any.

Such a construction of the statute would not only, at the expense of the personal liberty of the subject, give a (perhaps vindictive) prosecutor electio fori,—but might countenance his making choice of that tribunal, where the person accused would have the least chance of a fair trial.

To suppose the possibility of malice, which might lead to harsh and oppressive proceedings, on the part of a prosecutor for libel, is not to indulge in any conjecture unsanctioned by the law.

On the contrary, libel was held a public offence at the common law, for the very purpose of turning into a gentler and more innoxious channel, that desire of vengeance, which the same law ascribed to those, who found their reputations sported with (4th Bac. Abr. tit. Libel, p. 449, and the authorities there cited).

Again, that sending a libel is a publishing, at the place from which it is sent, may be inferred from hence, that not only he who publishes (in the ordinary sense),—but he who procures another to do so, is guilty of the publication (Com. Digest, tit. Libel, Publication, B. 1).

And if guilty, he must be so, where he perpetrated this act of procurement: though he may, by construction of law, be also guilty of the same elsewhere (4th Bac. Abr. 458; and the cases cited in the margin).

But what is said by my lord Coke, seems to put the matter beyond doubt; and to ascertain that the writing and sending of a libel, constitute a publishing in the place where those two acts are done. He says that if one finds a libel, which concerns a public person, he ought to deliver it to a magistrate, in order that the libeller may be punished.

Now, if the author had not published, he would not be a libeller (Com. Digest, tit. Libel, Libeller, C. 1).

But, in the case supposed by Coke, he has no otherwise published, than by sending a libel which has been intercepted. Therefore writing and sending must amount to publication at the place from which the libel is sent.

Be this, however, as it may, it appears by affidavit, that of this alleged libel, there occurred in Ireland that vernacular sort of publication, which consists in the dispersion of printed copies.

And the cases collected in 3rd Bac. Abr. tit. Habeas Corpus, page 13, and in 2nd Hawkins, * See it vol. 25, p. 783.

ch. 15, prove that of these documents, as they do not contradict the return, we may take notice.

Therefore, even those who dissent from my application of the authorities which I have cited, must admit that there has been a consummation of the offence in Ireland; and consequently that the offender is punishable here.

This consideration ought, at once, to exempt his case from the present statute. For the mischief, to which it professes to apply a remedy, is that of offences often remaining unpunished:—and as well on principles of right reason, as in favorem libertatis, we must construe these expressions to describe the mischief of offences remaining unpunished altogether. The object of the legislature must have been, to guard against total impunity, or inadequate punishment;—which would not occur, where the party is liable in Ireland to the penalties of his offence.

As to there having been publications in different places, they all however flowed from a single act, the once writing, and once sending forth the scandal;—and to punish the author in London, would be, by astuteness and technical refinement, to inflict a double punishment for a single crime; and suppose two public justices within the united realm, instead of one.

The writing and sending are the fundamental and radical offence; from which, and not from any pretended repetitions of it, all the consequences have arisen. Therefore Ireland having been the scene of this offence, is emphatically the proper scene for prosecution.

In a word, if the prisoner wrote the libel he must have done so where he was. If this can be proved against him, he may be punished here. If it cannot, there is no evidence of his publishing in England. Therefore, he is punishable in Ireland; or he is not punishable at all.

The sixth recital, in the preamble to the third section, is the want of a sufficient provision, by the laws (recognizing their distinctness), of Great Britain and Ireland respectively, for apprehending such offenders; and transmitting them to that part of the United Kingdom, in which their offences were committed.

This recital suggests to me the following observations:

First, that no law is requisite for transmitting an offender, to the island in which his trespass was constructively committed; when he may be punished in that island in which it was actually perpetrated. And this act need not be so construed, as to supply what was not wanted.

Secondly, that the words "such offenders" are restrictive; and mean those fugitives, who had just been specified as the objects of the law. The words may be also properly referred to the class of "felons and malefactors," already noticed in the same preamble; and to which I do not conceive petty trespassers to belong.

Indeed if persons guilty of torts or misdemeanors be malefactors, it can only be because this latter word is nomen generalissimum. But if so, it includes felons: and the last-mentioned term must be rejected as superfluous, by those who would extend this act to misdemeanors.

On the contrary, compatibly with my construction, every word may be significant. Felons and other malefactors may mean persons having committed felonies, aut alia enormia. Malefactor may, for aught I know, or have been able to discover, have a precise and technical meaning in the Scottish law. Even if it have not, its introduction into the act from which it has been transcribed into the present one, might be necessary and useful. That was an act of regulation between England and Scotland; and there may be, and I believe are offences, atrocious and capital by the Scottish law, which yet are not felonies; if indeed the term felon be at all known in that code.

But, thirdly, a suggestion of greater weight is this; that unless we extend the operation of the act before us to misdemeanors, the recital which I have just extracted will be false. For it appears from the sixteenth clause of the English Habeas Corpus act, that persons charged with capital offences had been therefore transmitted from England to this country: and the previous legality of such a practice, the Habeas Corpus act may be thought to recognize. At least, it sanctions a continuance of the usage. Thus before the existence of the statute which we are interpreting, there was provision for the transmittal of capital offenders.

But this would be so far from rendering the recital false, that the paragraph would be more untrue, if it stated the law to have provided insufficiently, where in fact the law had not provided at all.

Then were the antecedent provisions sufficient? for if not, the recital before us will be satisfied; though we should not extend the act to the case of misdemeanors.—I conceive them to have been insufficient.

For, 1st, until the recent statute passed, if the government of the country where the offender was, might transmit him, at least non constat that the government of the country where he was not, could send to fetch him. Thus far then, the existing laws were insufficient. The preamble truly recites the insufficiency; and the enacting clauses proceed to supply the defect.

Secondly, The practice of transmitting capital offenders, from Great Britain and Ireland, reciprocally to each other, was a usage, between those distinct and independent countries, less referable to their municipal codes, than to their political connexions, and the comitas gentium, or Law of Nations.

The offender was transmitted, not under the warrant of a magistrate, but of a minister of the executive, viz. the secretary: and this warrant was executed, not by a peace officer, —but by another inferior servant of the state, viz. a king's messenger.

Therefore the Habeas Corpus act, in permitting such proceedings, rather tolerated so much of the law of nations, than strictly enacted the usage, as a breach of the municipal code.

Let me add, that still less does it directly, or by inevitable construction, recognize the PREVIOUS legitimacy of such a practice.

It is doubtful, at the least, whether it does not rather confer a new, than acknowledge a precedent legal authority. Without deciding on their previous legality, it sanctions a few innocent usages, by way of exception, —whilst it prohibits the continuance of such as were dangerous and oppressive.

At all events, that justly celebrated statute does not empower magistrates to issue, nor peace officers to execute, warrants for apprehending or transmitting capital offenders. It does not confer, on any person, a right of demanding such a process, ex debito justitiæ. It does not authorize to send for the culprit, from the place where he is not; but only to remove him from the place in which he is. Therefore, though we should restrict the operation of the present statute to such majora crimina, still the recital which it contains, might be strictly true; —that the provisions of the law were insufficient in this respect. —Nay, the recital might be true, though the Irish Habeas Corpus act contained a clause, parallel (mutatis mutandis) to the sixteenth of the English: which, however, it may be highly material to observe, is not the case.

Indeed, that previously to the act of the 31st Car. 2nd, that legal power did not exist, which, in the case of felonies, I admit the present act to give, appears from reports of equal authority with any which have been published since: I mean those of sir Edward Coke; and advert to the case of the lord Sanguire. There, Robert Carliel, the principal felon (and he was a murderer), having escaped to Scotland, my lord Coke expressly lays it down, that “it was impossible by legal process” (of the English law) “to apprehend the body of Carliel, being in Scotland.”

What did the king do?

In the first place, to use the language of this most celebrated of our reporters, “he consulted” (as was right for the executive to do) “with his judges;” and from their authoritative opinion he found, that “if this fact should be left to the ordinary proceedings of the law, Carliel, the assassin, could not be taken.”

In the second place, he had, with the best intentions, and for a useful purpose, recourse to the exertion of one of those extraordinary prerogatives, the too strained and frequent exercise of which (cruelly taken advantage of, by the encroaching Commons), tended to bring his unfortunate son and successor to the block.

He issued his royal “proclamation;” and, to resume the words of my lord Coke, the assassin “was taken; not by any common power; —but by means of his majesty’s royal and absolute power only.”

The British constitution was as yet unsettled. The English government had not yet learned, what the Irish nation, I hope, never will forget: —what, so long as it is pronounced from the bench of justice, need not be taught amidst the clash of arms, —that in a free country, the absolute power of an executive is unknown.

The case which I have been citing, is in the Reports; part IX, vol. V, pages 120 and 121.

The seventh and last recital of the preamble to the third section is, that the enactments which there follow, are for remedy of the mischiefs precedently enumerated. Therefore, (unless these enactments be cogently express), to no case which does not come within the mischief, should the remedy (to the invasion of a subject’s liberty) be applied.

Thus what I have been urging will amount to this; that the enacting parts of the fourth section, do not necessarily ex vi terminorum, or probably from the context, apply to the circumstances before us; while the recitals of that, and of the preceding clause, instead of embracing, will exclude the prisoner’s case.

I have not been contending, that the enactments of a statute must be strictly commensurate with its preamble. On the contrary, they may be, and are often, more extensive. I merely hold, that where these latter are not explicit, we may resort to the preamble to explain them. Where the legislature recites a mischief, and provides a remedy, the presumption is, that a case not within the evil, is not within the cure. “Stabitur huic præsumptioni, donec probetur in contrarium;” —and to rebut it, the enacting words must be express. Besides, the construction which I am resisting here, would not so properly extend the enactments beyond the preamble, as render them incongruous and inconsistent with it. The preamble having recited the mischief of impunity arising from escape, —remedies it (say my opponents), by providing for a case where there is neither impunity, nor escape. And perhaps the case of the infamous Renwick Williams, cited in the third edition of Leach, and also in East’s Crown Law, might go to show that I have given too great efficacy to the enacting clauses of a statute: that these are liable to more control from the preamble, than I have supposed; —and that the letter of a statute (however plain), shall not prevail against its spirit and general intent.

The determination of the Irish judges, with regard to the White Boy act, goes also to establish the same subordination; of letter to spirit; expression to intent.

But did the omission, to insert a recital which should include the prisoner's case, arise from inadvertence, or precipitation?

It would be disrespectful to parliament to suppose, that they could hurry over an act of such importance as the present, abounding with perplexing and slovenly omissions.

On the contrary, the preamble to the third section, which seems accurately drawn, states the case of an escape; and nothing more:—being in this respect even more confined than the introduction to the first clause.

Nor if, to meet the case of an escape, the legislature made peculiarly harsh and rigorous provisions (trenching on the ordinary rights and privileges of the subject), would it do any thing wholly novel and unprecedented. At least it would attempt nothing so unusual, as a construction embracing the present case, must accomplish.

Accordingly we learn from sir William Blackstone (4th Com. 298), that “such as being committed for felony, have broken prison, may not be admitted to bail: because this escape not only carries with it a presumption of their guilt, but is also superadding one crime to another.”

The same doctrine may be found in 2nd Instit. 188; and 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 133.

Then whether is it more likely,

First, that the legislature adverted to cases of an actual and de facto presence in England,—the commission of a crime there,—and a real or presumptive escape from thence?—and that the act was intended to nullify this escape,—and by frustrating its effects, to prevent the total impunity of the flying offender?

Or secondly, that they had in contemplation a merely constructive presence and guilt in England,—by a person who really committed, and was responsible for, the offence elsewhere?—And thus that their object was, not to guard against a defiance of the law; but to enhance and multiply penalties for the same offence;—until the victim, with more reason than the first-born offender, might exclaim that his punishment was greater than he could bear?

To return,—it may not farther be improper to remark, that the marginal abstracts correspond with the construction which I am giving to this statute. And indeed whether I argue from these, from the text, or from the title,—I am disposed to pronounce, that judge Johnson's case, not falling within the mischiefs which are recited, cannot come within the remedy which is prescribed.

But though, until he be found guilty, the innocence of every man is presumed, yet this act does not provide the party accused with means of compelling the attendance of witnesses, to make this innocence appear.

Was this also one of those maculae, quas incuria fudit? a merely careless, giddy, and forgetful omission?—No. It is not our lot to be subject to a legislature, which could thus negligently trifle with those liberties and rights, in asserting which, so much valuable blood has been often shed!—On the contrary, the omission to secure to persons situated like judge Johnson, the means of a fair trial, and a full defence, rather justifies my conclusion, that parliament did not mean to extend their statute to his case.

Where the offence was really, if at all, committed, there the most material witnesses are likely to be found: so that in the case of migration, that process might not be necessary, which this act omits to give. Therefore to cases of migration the act was intended to apply.

But (to recur parenthetically to a former topic), it may be said, that if “reside” be construed (quoad misdemeanors) to mean a residence ensuing on an antecedent removal or escape, it must in capital cases also signify the same. Admitted. And where is the mischief that will ensue? If the felon perpetrated the act in England, and thence escaped to Ireland, he perhaps might go unpunished, if it were not for the 44th of the king. But if at the time of the offence committed he was resident in Ireland, he must have perpetrated it there; and could there be punished for it.

And even though his offence were accessory to a principal crime committed in England, still he ought to be punished in Ireland; under the spirit of the statute of the 2nd and 3rd Edw. 6th, ch. 24; which, whilst it altered the common law, attended to the constitution; and directed that accessory offences should be tried in the county in which they were committed.—A fortiori, ought the offender to be tried here, where he is not charged with having been accessory to a crime perpetrated in the neighbouring island; but is accused of a species of offence which does not admit of accomplices; and where if culpable, he must be a principal, and have consummated his guilt in Ireland.

But, again, this statute does not provide the means of giving bail in Ireland. Need I prove that this was an indispensably necessary provision?—Could an Irish magistrate, without the special authority of an act of parliament, take bail in a matter not within his jurisdiction? and on a charge which he is not bound to know to be bailable, by the English or Scottish law? How, or to what, would such a recognizance bind the party? By what acts, or what omissions, could he forfeit it in this country? Of what court in Ireland would it be a record? How could English or Irish green wax, or Scottish process issue, to levy the amount of this shadowy obligation, not to be amongst the rolls of any British or Irish court?—What should prevent the pleading nul tiel record, to any attempted estreat of such a recognizance?

Where the arrest is under the warrant of a British magistrate, the taking bail in this country by an Irish judge, would be a delusive and nugatory proceeding; substantially equivalent to an unqualified discharge.

Indeed this part of the case appears to me to be so plain, that to dwell longer on it might seem unnecessary, if it were not that I have heard it confidently argued; and that the opinion which I have formed upon the point, seems at once capable of being incontrovertibly maintained; and to be nearly conclusive on the true construction of this statute.

I therefore would ask what is a recognizance?

Blackstone answers that "it is an obligation of record; which a man enters into before some court of record; or magistrate, duly authorized." (2nd Com. 341.)

I should proceed to inquire whether an obligation, entered into before a court of record in one country, thereby becomes an obligation of record in another?

First, if it do not, the definition which we have just extracted from Blackstone, will not be satisfied. A pretended recognizance, entered into before an Irish court, will not be an obligation of record in England. In other words, it will be no recognizance there at all; nor binding as such, on the supposed cognizor.

But secondly, if a recognizance entered into before an Irish (that is to say, juridically, a foreign) court, be an obligation of record in England, then either such recognizance is of more efficacy than the judgment of an Irish court; or this latter will also create an obligation of record in England.

Then in an action brought in England, on a foreign judgment, the declaration might conclude prout patet per recordum; the defendant might plead nul tiel record; and on such a judgment, indebitatus assumpsit would not lie.

But on the contrary, the case of Walker v. Witter (1st Douglas 1,) ascertains that prout patet per recordum would be rejected as an improper conclusion; and that the plea of nul tiel record would be equally improper. For both conclusion and plea would erroneously imply, that a foreign judgment was a record of a court in Westminster.

And the case of Bowles v. Bradshaw, cited in the notes, proves, if necessary, that a judgment of the Irish exchequer is no English record; but a mere simple contract; on which indebitatus assumpsit may there be brought.

Thus the words "a recognizance entered into before a court of record"—mean entered into before a court of record, in the country in which it binds: and otherwise it is no recognizance.

"A recognizance," says Blackstone, "is an obligation of record."

It must be so: for the king can only take by matter of record.

In England he takes by matter of record there: in Ireland by matter of record in this latter country.

"A recognizance," continues Blackstone, "is not witnessed by the party's seal." (2nd Com. 341.)

And why? Because it derives its authenticity from a higher source.

"It is witnessed only by the record of the court." (Ibid.)

In other words, patet per recordum:—and (as lord Mansfield expresses himself, in the case of Walker v. Witter), "implicit faith is given to such record."

But his lordship adds, that "the record of a foreign court is clearly not that sort of record, to which implicit faith is given by the courts of Westminster-hall:" subjoining that "the difficulty had arisen, from not fixing accurately what a court of record is, in the eye of the law. That description is confined properly, to certain courts in England. Foreign courts have not that privilege."

Be it remembered—is a common initial injunction of records. But lex neminem cogit ad impossibilia; and it would be impracticable to remember what never had been known.

Yet those who contend that a man may commit a crime in a country which he has never seen; may fly from thence to another, where he has resided from his birth; and when overtaken, be brought back to that which he never quitted;—those I must admit to be consistent with themselves, when they hold that his recognizance may be a record of a court, in which it never was acknowledged or enrolled.

But "a recognizance is an obligation of record, either entered into before some court of record (being there taken by its officer) or before a magistrate, duly authorized,—and certified to the court." (2nd Bl. Com. 341.)

But if the court of record intended, be an English court, can we suppose that, by the word "magistrate," a foreign magistrate is meant?

An Irish justice of the peace is no magistrate in England. He cannot without transgressing the law, presume to exercise there the most insignificant magisterial functions.

Will a recognizance, ostensibly entered into before him who is no magistrate, satisfy the definition of an obligation of record, entered into before one who is a magistrate?

Shall he, who dare not attempt the lowest, accomplish one of the highest acts of magistracy? or shall a person before him,—that is to say coram non Judice,—bind himself of record, and be estopped for ever, from contradicting or evading the obligation?

Shall the English authority, which such a man could not exercise in England, flow to him from the circumstance of his being out of England? Or shall an act, performed before an obscure Irish justice of the peace, be of record in England, when it would not be so, however solemnly executed before any of the king's superior courts in Ireland?

I say would not be so. For I hold that the independence of the king's superior courts in Ireland, acquired in 1782, has not been theoretically forfeited by the Union; and that the King's-bench in this country, is not ministerial, or subordinate to that of England.

I do not deny that, if duly authorized, an Irish magistrate may take and transmit a recognizance to England: so that it shall become an obligation of record in that country. I merely insist, that towards warranting any such proceeding, an authority by statute must be given; and that none such is conferred by the statute now before us.

Nor does this seem to have been an oversight on the part of the legislature. They omitted to give this authority by the third and fourth sections, because it was not wanted: those clauses being confined to unbailable offences; and to cases of escape.

Where they chose to confer such power, they have expressly done so. I mean by the first section of this statute; where it is specially provided that the endorsing justice shall take bail, and deliver the recognizance to the constable, who is required to receive, and transmit the same, to the clerk of the crown of the place where the offender is to appear; and it is farther (and not superfluously) enacted, that such recognizance shall be good, and effectual in law.

Thus the legislature has evinced, by the provisions of this first section, what law and reason had both shown before,—namely, that without the interposition of parliament, he who has no jurisdiction over the offence, cannot bail the offender: that he who cannot commit another to prison, is equally incompetent to deliver him to the custody of sureties; but that an enacting statute is indispensably necessary, towards enabling him to take, or to transmit a recognizance; and towards requiring those to whom it is transmitted, to receive it.

The legislature, I say, appears to have decided the question, in providing, by the first section, that where offences are bailable, the endorsing or other magistrate may take bail: a provision which would be superfluous, if without it the accused were entitled to give bail before him.

But the provision of this first section does more than ascertain the incompetence of the magistrate (unless under the authority of its enactments) to take bail. It shows the attention of parliament to the privileges of the subject.

If then, towards enabling an Irish court, or magistrate, to take bail, in a case of misdemeanor, circumstanced like the present, it were necessary that the act should contain a clause, empowering so to do,—can we ascribe to inadvertence, that no such clause is to be found?

I have heard this hinted; and that it is proposed to have the act amended in this respect. That would indeed be a serious amendment, whose operation was to become—not a partial and temporary suspension of the Habeas Corpus act; but rather its total and absolute repeal.

The hint has been attributed, with I know not what foundation, to a high and respectable law officer* of the crown, who from the commencement of this momentous discussion to the present time, though the prosecution be avowedly a state one, has not once favoured us with his aid or presence; so that I have had no opportunity of mootings with him the subject of this alleged insinuation.

Indeed his absence was the more to be regretted, because the delicacy of Mr. Solicitor General's situation,—said himself to be (what he must allow me to express my sorrow that he ever should be), an object of aggression in the present libel,—necessarily deprived us of his truly valuable counsel.

It is not alleged that the attorney-general is indisposed. It cannot be alleged that he has been occupied by business of greater importance than this before us; nor asserted that he has given up a question, argued with so much ability and candor by the Prime Sergeant: and still less can it be contended, that, aware of a difference of opinion on the bench, he has come forward to remove my difficulties, and bring me over to his side.

But why he has been away, I am persuaded the attorney-general could himself most satisfactorily explain; and could reconcile his absence with a strict and honourable observance of the duties of his station;—a becoming and merited respect for the Court of Exchequer;—and decent reverence of consideration for a question, deciding on the liberty of one of the judges of the land; and involving the first principles of that free constitution, which his royal master's coronation oath has pledged him to maintain.

Of all this I am aware; and think it likely that nothing but my own misapprehension could prevent me from perceiving, without the help of explanation, a consistency which may to others be apparent,—between the conduct which in this instance he has pursued, and the correct principles on which he is in the habit of acting.

Meantime while performing a duty, which I owe to the importance of the question, and the dignity of the Court, by (I trust, not indecorously or offensively, though with freedom) animadverting on a seeming omission on the part of Mr. Attorney General, it is superfluous to declare, that as I admire the talents, and professional knowledge of that gentleman, so, in doubting whether on this occasion, he has been critically correct, I mean no disparagement of his general character or conduct. Therefore in justice to himself and me, I confidently expect that he will not be offended.

Nor will I fear that any thing which I may have urged to day, can be misrepresented, or remembered to my injury, by others. I shall have roused no treacherous enemy into action: and even if I should,—yet knowing how free the country is, in which I live, I cannot suppose that his hostile activity would be successful. The free doctrines which I have maintained, I should be sorry to look on as too bold; and still sorrier to consider as in any degree obsolete. Therefore in promulgating them, I cannot risk incurring the displeasure of those constitutional minds, which have the guidance of the state. Nor, descending from the government and magnates, to lower circles, could the sworn enemies of slander draw the sword in silence; and, odia in longum jacentes, wait with virulent, relentless, and lingering impatience, an opportunity for dark, calumnious, and irresistible revenge.

I know all this. But though the reverse were true, God forbid that this should deter me from a firm performance of my duty! or that I, emphatically a servant of the constitution, should betray my trust, in order to skreen myself from danger!

Though, instead of living under the free constitution of this realm, and the mild administration of lord Hardwicke, we were cast upon worse governments, and more slavish times,—yet God forbid that an interpreter of the law should thereby be induced to treat the present like a side-bar motion! or that applying ordinary means to extraordinary occasions, he should freeze the energies of his mind in those cold observances and common forms, on whose fettering power, oppression too frequently, and too successfully relies.

God forbid that in a crisis like the present, though death, or even dishonour were to ensue,—I should withhold my humble, yet strong (though fallible) opinion, that the construction against which I am contending, could not prevail, without endangering the liberties of my country.

I have wandered from my subject; but am not ashamed of the digression.

To return,—I never can assent to an hypothesis (ascribed, perhaps falsely, to a law officer of the crown), which would cast an unmerited imputation on our legislature: which might seem to bring a charge against them, of forging chains for an empire, through mere hurry and inadvertence; and then tardily repairing the mischief they had done,—when one of the king's judges had become the victim of their precipitation.

On the contrary I am bound, by my reverence for parliament, to rescue them from charges which are destitute of foundation; and of which I shall always deny the truth: since if true, they might give birth to a train of zealot rights and duties, so fierce and monstrous, that I, for my part, could not contemplate them without horror.

Nor would any future amendment, such as may have been suggested, disparage parliament, or refute the construction for which I argue. On the contrary, when the legislature makes due provision for giving bail, I shall suppose them to intend, for the first time, to include bailable offences: and when they specifically include misdemeanors unattended with escape, I shall hold it right and constitutional so to do; and that I have been erroneous in deriving any ill effects from such inclusion.

Or if the future statute were declaratory in its nature, I should offer my arguments, my motives, my respect, and my fallibility, as my atonement.

In the mean time, with what strange inconsistency might we tax the legislature, in supposing them regardful of the constitutional rights of one subject, who was to be put to no greater inconvenience, than that of being brought from one county to the next,—and utterly negligent, at the same time, of the privileges of another, who after having been conducted as a prisoner, from one end of Ireland to the other, was then to be hurried beyond sea, to a distant country, a strange tribunal, and a foreign code!

But I have heard it said, that bail may be given in England. That is to say, after dragging a petty offender, from the remotest corner of this country, across the Channel,—he is there permitted to solicit strangers to be responsible for him, of whose character they know nothing.

It was not amongst strangers,—but in the narrow and familiar circle of his connexions and acquaintance, that the great Alfred, the illustrious founder of our law, expected a subject to find sureties for his being amenable to justice.

In the comparatively unimportant case, of a proposed removal from one county to another, we find parliament scrupulously attentive to the principle of law, that if bail can be had, it shall be taken on the very spot where the arrest is made; without obliging the accused to set his foot within a gaol,—or even to go to an adjoining county, in which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Can we imagine that, in the incomparably more momentous case of a proposed removal beyond sea, from one island to another, the same legislature should at once lose sight of the privileges of a subject, charged with a bailable offence?

Why then, in this latter case, does the statute give no authority for taking bail upon the spot,—and without removing the party accused?

I should answer, because in this part of the act, parliament had not bailable offences in contemplation; and therefore such a provision would have been superfluous and impertinent.

I am aware how much “absurdity” has been ascribed to the opinion, which exempts bailable offences from the operation of this section. I know that it has, with respectful irony, been proposed to help the Boeotian intellect of the Irish bench, by a subsidiary clause, enabling our judges to understand plain English; and enacting that the whole comprises all the parts. I know too that it has been exultingly inquired, how parliament could have conveyed, more explicitly than has been done, its intention of embracing cases of misdemeanor? The pride of this triumphant question, a simple answer will put down; viz. that by introducing this very word misdemeanor, the legislature would have been more explicit, and have done away all doubt.

Meantime agreeably to a construction, by which, in defiance of flippant ridicule, I abide, we may observe that the preamble to the first clause, which extends to misdemeanors, adopts an expression, viz. "offences," properly enough applicable to inferior transgressions: while that of the third section treats of felons and malefactors; and that of the fourth of persons guilty, not of offences, but of crimes: thus suggesting, that criminal and malefactor are synonymous.

Therefore what is to be done?—For first, a man arrested for a bailable offence, must not be exiled from his country, and cast into a foreign prison; under an act which does not order a committal without bail; and in contravention of the letter and spirit of the Habeas Corpus act; which has been justly deemed a modern and supplemental Magna Charta.

But secondly, bail cannot be taken here. Therefore the constitution must be violated, or the prisoner must be discharged.

But, say the counsel for the Crown, the proper time for bailing is, when the party shall have appeared and pleaded.

Here again the Habeas Corpus act is repealed by implication; and this, not by the makers, but by the interpreters of the law. It is repealed, not by the legislative, but by the judicial power.

A party arrested here, sues out his Habeas Corpus. The return shows him to stand charged with a merely bailable offence; and the act, under which the writ was issued, directs that bail shall be received. But counsel for the Crown produce the 44th of the king; and say, "you cannot be discharged on bail here, where you have been apprehended. You must go to England in close custody; there to appear and plead; and possibly (but very improbably) be bailed."

Let him who can, reconcile this doctrine with what judge Blackstone has laid down, 4th Com. 297; that not only to refuse, but to "DELAY to bail any person bailable, is an offence against the liberty of the subject;—

"First, by the common law:—secondly, by the statute of Westminster; and thirdly, by the Habeas Corpus act."

Again, this being a penal act, should receive a strict construction—an exposition in advancement, not restraint of the personal liberty of the subject.

The distinction between penal and remedial statutes, is not so obvious as might at first appear. On the contrary, the same act often partakes of both descriptions; and to different parts of it, different rules of construction will apply.

It is said that this act merely renders persons amenable to justice.

But we have seen, that the construction which I am resisting would do more. It would turn innocence to guilt; and punish, by retrospection, the criminality which it thus created.

Secondly, it may be a hardship to render persons amenable more than once, for substantially one offence;—and amenable to the jurisdiction of that particular tribunal, which the prosecutor shall vexatiously think proper to select.

Thirdly, even supposing the end to be remedial, yet if the means be penal, which the statute has devised for its attainment, the clauses which enact these means, should receive a strict construction.

The expense, and irksomeness, and danger, and disgrace, of a long imprisonment, and ignominious removal to a foreign country,—together with the difficulties, and aggravated costs, attending the party's defence of himself there,—are not these, I would ask my brethren, so many penalties?

And if we extend the third and fourth sections to the case of trivial misdemeanors, may not these amercements inflict upon a person ultimately acquitted, a more tedious imprisonment, and heavier fine, than could have ensued upon conviction, if he had been tried at home; so as to leave the absolved wretch nothing better to communicate, to an anxious and afflicted family left behind, than was written by the gallant Francis, after the ruinous defeat at Pavia,—fors l'honneur tout est perdu.

Shall we construe these clauses liberally (or perhaps I should say illiberally), in order that such effects may be let in? Or can we suppose that parliament intended to enact, what appears to have been so obviously calculated to produce them?

It is true that "ignorantia juris, quod quisque tenetur scire, neminem excusat."—But the code must be jus quod teneor scire; or my unwitting transgression of it is excusable.

Now, what is the code with which I am bound to be acquainted? That of the country which I inhabit. I am bound to know, and to observe the laws, which afford me protection; and to which, in return for that protection, I owe obedience.

If I visit Scotland,—while I am a sojourner there, I shall be presumed to know, and must at my peril disobey, the laws of that country,—to which, in my turn, I can enforce obedience from those who would transgress them, to my injury or disadvantage.

But observe the consequence of maintaining, that by an act done in Ireland, where I am resident, and from which I do not stir, I yet may incur the vengeance of the Scottish law.

I write, and send some letters from Ireland to Scotland; the contents of which are neither libellous nor seditious, according to the law, or adjudged cases in Ireland. The act which I do is, a publication of those writings; but (as they are not criminal) it is an innocent act, under the only law, which, whilst I continue in Ireland, I am bound to know.

But suppose their import to be defamatory and seditious, by the Scottish law; a code of which I am ignorant; and which hitherto I have not thought it essential to the security of my life or liberty to know.

What then will follow, from the construction against which I am contending? The moment the letters are received in that country, they are there published by my procurement. A Scottish magistrate issues his warrant; which an Irish justice complaisantly endorses, and executes against me. I am hurried over, in unbailable custody, to Scotland, to be certainly convicted by a majority of jurors; and to be transported for an act, which was an innocent one by the laws of the country where it was done.

This privilege of being transported for a misdemeanor, formed no item in the list of advantages which we were promised by the Union.

That constitution would hold wickedly incongruous doctrines, which should say, "you shall be punished for transgressing a law which you are not bound to know; and within the sheltering influence of which you do not live."

It would be like holding that a blind man should not be presumed to know that he was on the brink of a precipice; but if he fell and perished, must be considered as felo de se; or might be compared to refusing him the benefit of clergy, because he could not read.

Counsel for the Crown indirectly admit the unreasonableness and injustice of such a doctrine.

For the argument which they use, to reconcile the omission (in the 44th of the king) to provide for the party's giving bail where he is arrested, is the ignorance imputed to the magistrates of that district, of the code which the culprit is charged to have transgressed.

But why is this ignorance imputed to them? Because it is not the code under which they live; or, consequently, with which they are bound to be acquainted. Then whence comes the enlightening beam, which while it is denied to the magistrate, illuminates the mind of the supposed offender?

Shall ignorance of the law of England preclude the Irish magistrate from taking bail, for what seems to be no more than a misdemeanor? And shall not the same ignorance protect the Irish subject—from being committed to custody, and dragged out of his country, on a charge of having broken laws, with which he must be presumed to be equally unacquainted?

To return,—while I remain beyond the Scottish territory, I am not bound to know its law; and the presumption should be, that I am unacquainted with it. Therefore, to hold me responsible to its provisions, is to make me a wretched and an abject slave; for "misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum."

Neither would the exemptions for which I am contending, expose Scotland to being inundated with libels of Irish fabric.—For though the innocent offender escape, the offence will not remain unpunished: nor may it perhaps be here immaterial to remark, that the recital contained in the statute, is not that the offender, but the offence escapes unpunished.

He who publishes in Scotland, knowingly transgresses a law, with which he is bound to be acquainted. Therefore, consistently with legal principles, and with moral justice, there may be inflicted on him, a punishment which will vindicate the law;—deter others from a repetition of the like offence;—and prevent a mischief, which by the way is little likely to occur;—and which though it were, it might be better to endure, than deprive millions of the king's subjects, of their liberties, and constitution.

If the paper which was composed in Ireland, were allowable by its laws, who could lament that this innocent and inadvertent transgression of a foreign code, should remain unpunished?

If, on the other hand, in writing it, the composer transgressed the law of Ireland, he is there answerable, as a freeman should be, juri sibi cognito:—and the effect of the construction which I am resisting, is not to obviate an impunity, which need not occur; but to try and punish a man by a law, under which he does not live.

Though these islands be legislatively united they are juridically distinct.

Their statute law differs in many respects: some dissimilarity is, for example, to be found in their criminal code; and especially in that branch of it, which relates to misdemeanors.

But what say those, who maintain a construction, different from mine?

They must say this.

"What we call a libel, you wrote and published (it is true), in Ireland. But by the same act, some copies found their way into England and Scotland. So far as you have been concerned, no doubt the publication was but a single act. But look at it in this multiplying mirror, which we have manufactured out of the 44th of the king, and you will find it reflected into three offences; liable to three punishments; and

Our great revenge has stomach for them all.

Thus you are at least three times as guilty as you could have been before the union.

"You cannot, indeed, in the case of a capital felony, have execution three times done upon you. But, in misdemeanor, the course is clear and easy. It is a common sum in arithmetic. Ascertain what would be an adequate punishment for your offence, and this, multiplied by three, will give the minimum of penalty, under our construction of the present act.—For example, instead of two years imprisonment, and a fine of 1,000*l.* you shall be imprisoned for six years, and pay 3,000*l.* besides the irksomeness and heavy costs of two long journies, and a voyage beyond sea; together with the expences of the two trials de incremento, which the Union, and 44th of the king, will have secured you.

“It is true, that this construction not only repeals the maxim that “pro eadem causa nemo debet bis vexari,”—but may operate to punish misdemeanors (even where they do not amount to a breach of the peace), by imprisonment for life, and confiscation of all property, real and personal, of the offender. Nay, he may be utterly ruined by an acquittal. But will not this tend to prevent others from offending in the like manner?”

This preventive end is certainly a good one. I should only doubt whether it might not be too dearly purchased, by a surrender of the most valuable birthrights of the subject.

Far from denying the efficacy of this multiplying mirror, I should rather tremble at its power. I should fear that it might operate like those of Archimedes; by quickly and utterly consuming our liberties, and constitution.

Why drag the Irishman, who had never quitted Ireland, to London, for an offence alleged to have been committed by him, constructively present there?

Forsooth, because Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom.

Why try him afterwards in Ireland, and a third time in Scotland, for the same prolific act? feasting each time on his anguish; and sneering at his vain plea of autrefois acquit?

Because, for the purpose of oppressing the subject, Ireland has again recovered her distinctness.

The legislature can never have intended this: and we libel parliament, by giving their statute so vexatious a construction.

We will (say such expounders), consider the islands as united, for the purpose of trying you where we please;—and we will consider them as separate, in order to punish you as often, and as exorbitantly as we please.

But to return, at all risks, into Scotland.

An Irishman there, writes to inform a friend here, of a gross insult and injury which he has received;—and inquires what he ought to do in consequence.

The other, less consulting prudence or morality, than passion, false punctilio, and friendly zeal, advises to call to the house of the affronter;—to expostulate, and demand an apology for the insult, and proceed to inflict personal chastisement, if refused.

This is done accordingly;—and the Irishman, apprehended under the endorsed warrant of a Scottish magistrate, is hurried thither, and there is at the least in some danger of being hanged, for the commission of an accessorial crime, capital by the laws of that country; where he never set his foot, until he went thither to suffer death; for breaking laws which he neither lived under, nor knew; and this by an act, not punishable (or at least—not so heavily penal), in his own country.

Perhaps I have not stated accurately the effect of Scottish law;—of which (God avert the consequences!) I am ignorant enough.

Therefore of the argument which I have just been using, I cannot estimate the force. In fact, in dwelling upon weightier reasons, I have not disdained the transient aid of those of inferior strength. When the liberties of my country seemed sinking in the abyss, to prevent their submersion, I perhaps might catch at straws. But I trust I have been able to lay hold on more solid materials for reliance: and though from a misconception of their statute, the wise intentions of the legislature were frustrated and overwhelmed,—and the constitution of Ireland were to founder with them,—that I have clung to a plank, on which my honour may be saved.

Do I use the language of an advocate?—I trust I do.—But I am concerned for no individual. I am an advocate, exerting myself on behalf of the constitution. Such advocacy is more than the privilege,—it is the duty of a judge;—and the quiddam honorarium which I require,—is to have it remembered that, at all risks, I ever shall defend it.

If on the present occasion I support it with becoming warmth—it may be, that I yet retain the excitation of a speech, which did honour even to the eloquence of Mr. Curran; and gave additional lustre to the importance, however transcendant, of the present subject:—a speech, which those would be worse than bad critics, who could mistake for merely brilliant declamation.

But to return to dryer topics.

I cannot consent so to construe a statute, as that it shall impliedly, and by construction, accomplish that, which perhaps the legislature might hesitate to do expressly; viz. not to suspend for a time, and in the case of offences presently dangerous to the state,—but generally, and for ever, to repeal the provisions of the Habeas Corpus act.

We are in the habit of leaning strongly against the doctrine of constructive repeals.—Shall we admit, as an exception to this rule, the propriety of overturning by a side wind, the provisions of the Habeas Corpus act? and displacing, by construction, the corner stone of our constitution?

The most essential proviso of that statute is abrogated here, if the exception of treason and felony, which it contains, be extended to misdemeanors of the most trifling nature:—and the venial offender, though he offer bail, be committed to close custody, and transported beyond sea. I say, though he tender bail:—because, for want of an authority given by the present act, such bail, if tendered, could not be received.

Therefore, as the legislature has not provided that bail shall be taken from the person arrested, at the place of his apprehension, it did not mean to extend this act to the case of bailable offences; and especially not to those unattended with escape:—or secondly, though we should surmise the legislature to have so intended,—we must wait for direct words, before we can effectuate this intention. In the mean time we are not warranted to repeal any law,—and least of all, the Habeas Corpus act and Magna Charta,—by implication.

But it is said that under this act, the offender may give bail in England.

I repeat first, that this would not be enough. For, to delay receiving bail,—to send the accused a close prisoner beyond sea, to find it amongst strangers,—would be to repeal pro tanto the common law,—the statute of Westminster,—and the Habeas Corpus act.

Secondly, perhaps non constat that bail could be received in England; although I may be of opinion that it could. At all events (and which is the only material inquiry), the words relied on, as enabling the English magistrate to take bail, do not manifest a legislative intention to include misdemeanors.

For instance;—if the English magistrate had been directed by this statute, to deal with the prisoner (when transmitted) according to law:—would it, from such words, be clear that the legislature meant to include bailable offences? It certainly would not: and I apprehend that the words made use of, are merely equivalent to those which I have supposed.

Parliament may have meant no more than to prohibit a discharge.—If the words had been that the magistrate should proceed with the prisoner according to law, he might have been induced to ask himself this question;—“according to what law is it, that I should proceed? If according to the law, as it stood before the passing of this act, I must discharge the prisoner: for until this statute, I had no authority to detain him. If I am to deal with him according to the law created by the present act, then I do not find it specify what that law is.”

Therefore the legislature, expressing itself more precisely, said that the magistrate, on receiving the transmitted prisoner, should “proceed with him, as if he had been legally apprehended in England.”

I am not, however, called upon to prove, that these words might not give authority to bail, if the legislature meant to comprehend bailable offences. It is enough for me, to show that such expressions do not imply an intention to include them; nor rebut the presumption, which totâ lege inspectâ will arise, that the statute was not meant to extend to misdemeanors. For though we restrict the operation of the law to felonies, the language adopted will be preferable to the words “according to law” (which I have supposed); as more free from doubt, and more precisely definitive, of the authority which the magistrate is permitted to exert.

But why should we, contra libertatem, strain those expressions into evidence of an intention to include misdemeanors, and reject another inference, more deducible from them, and which would at least exclude such as were not accompanied by a real or quasi escape?—I have already in a former part of my argument observed, that the words “as if the person had been legally apprehended in England,” seem nearly tantamount to these,—as if he had not withdrawn himself from thence.

Again, how do the words relied on empower (if they do so), the English magistrate to take bail? No otherwise than by reference to, and recognition of the law of England, that for a misdemeanor, bail shall be taken, where the accused is apprehended. But is not this the law of Ireland also?—And if it be, how can we send judge Johnson a close prisoner to England, under a charge of misdemeanor,—and by virtue of an act, which does not expressly prohibit the admitting him to bail? It is true he cannot be bailed here. But does it follow that he should be transmitted? or may it not rather follow that he ought to be enlarged?

To resume: the Irish Habeas Corpus act is nearly copied from the English. One clause in the latter, does not however (nor its parallel) occur in ours. That clause makes it highly penal to remove a prisoner from England, to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, Tangier, or any other places beyond the sea. The cause of this omission it may not be easy to ascertain. Perhaps a confidence in the government, founded on the constitutional conduct of his present majesty's illustrious house. Perhaps that the foreign parts which I have mentioned, were dependencies, not of this country, but of England. But let the cause of the omission have been what it may, can we doubt that the spirit of the omitted clause should be considered as pervading the Irish statute?

What then does this section of the English act denote? A constitutional jealousy, entertained by the legislature (or rather by the Commons), and which seems particularly pointed against a practice of conveying persons beyond sea,—which had obtained, in the times immediately preceding this important act.

This clause is the more remarkable, because it follows one, which provides that the Habeas Corpus shall run into those very islands of Jersey and Guernsey, to which (so averse were the framers to trips beyond the sea), it is, notwithstanding, forbidden to send any Englishman a prisoner.

The title of the act also shows the same jealousy; which it now seems so much the fashion to lay aside.

It is entitled “An Act for better securing the liberty of the subject; and for prevention of imprisonments beyond sea.”

I may here briefly observe, that in the course of the present discussion, three statutes have been repeatedly referred to; viz. the 13th of the King, ch. 31; the 23rd Geo. 2nd, ch. 26; and 24th of the same reign, ch. 55.

As to these acts, I admit with the counsel for the crown,—and I rely on it against them,—that they were the rudiments of the present statute.

I am also ready to admit, what they farther have insisted, that those acts establish, between the districts of England and Scotland, and counties of Great Britain, the same law, which the present statute has created for the interior of Ireland; and between the British islands.

But if the combined preambles of the 23rd and 24th of Geo. 2nd, be held to differ from the general preamble of the 44th of the King, (which I hold, and have already shown that they do not); then the same law is not adopted between the counties of Ireland, by the latter act, as was established between those of Great Britain, by the two preceding.

For there, clearly there must have been an escape, or migration, after offence: though whether before or after warrant, became (by the 24th Geo. 2nd) immaterial.

I say there must have been a removal. For the enacting words of the 24th Geo. 2nd, are not enlarging. They do not apply generally to “any person ;” but only to one, against whom “a warrant shall be issued.” Thus these latter restrictive words connect the enactments with the preamble; and link both to the statute of the antecedent year.

Now no reason can be assigned for such a difference of law, as should dispense with the necessity of escape between the Irish counties; but should hold it indispensable as between the shires of the adjoining island.

We therefore ought to reject a construction of the 44th of the present King, which introduces so unaccountable, and irrational a distinction.

But with what force (I would ask), do the counsel for the crown cite the acts which I have noticed, by way of refuting my exposition of the one before us?

For no adjudication on the construction of those statutes has been quoted: and until the contrary be shown, I may presume that they have not been so interpreted, as by analogy to extend the present act to Mr. Justice Johnson. For until it be shown, I will not presume that any act has been so construed, as (according to my ideas), to infringe the constitution.

And as to the 13th of the King, which I admit to be the immediate parent of the act in question, how does Blackstone (remarkable for the accuracy of his descriptions), delineate its effects, in 4th Com. 292?

“And now” (says he) “by the statute of the 13th Geo. 3, ch. 31, any warrant for apprehending an English offender, who may have ESCAPED into Scotland, or vice versa, may be endorsed and executed by the local magistrates; and the offender conveyed BACK,” (observe the expression), “to that part of the United Kingdoms, in which such offence was committed.”

Can a man have escaped to a place, in which he has remained from his birth?—or be conveyed back to a country, in which he never was before?

Thus Blackstone’s interpretation of the 13th of the King sustains my doctrine, that the 44th applies only to migrations. For the counsel for the crown assert that this is the legitimate offspring of the former; and vehemently insist on its close resemblance to the parent statute.

To return: the enactments of the third and fourth sections are the same; except that the former relates to escapes into Ireland, from Great Britain; and the latter to elopements vice versa.

Therefore we cannot construe the fourth clause to authorize the removal to England, of a person arrested here, under the warrant of a British magistrate, for a misdemeanor,—without at the same time holding that the third section will justify the like removal, of one similarly circumstanced—to Ireland.

Will the judges of England be ever induced to concur in this construction?

I pass over the slighter consequences of such an exposition:—for instance, the exile of their greatest men, under the fiat of an Irish trading justice, endorsed by an English magistrate of the like respectable description: the removal of their speaker from the chair,—or their chancellor from the woolsack,—to answer for having by letter animadverted with too much freedom, on the conduct of some not humble, though obscure retainer, of the Irish government.

I advert to no such comparatively insignificant effects as these:—but to that direct repeal of the English Habeas Corpus act, which such a construction of this third section must involve.

Will the English judges so expound the statute now under consideration, as that an inhabitant of England, who is no convicted felon, and has not been charged with any capital offence, shall yet be sent a prisoner to Ireland?—What would those judges think of the promptitude of an officer, who conceived it his duty to refuse the prisoner time to obtain his Habeas Corpus? or in what light would they view the apprehensions of a crown lawyer, that such delay, though conceded to the request of the man in custody, might expose the constable and his assistants to an action of false imprisonment?

That the act under consideration, according to the construction which I reject, operates on individuals, with a rigour disproportionate to their alleged offences, is but an inferior reason against interpreting it so. A more solid and formidable objection is, that so construed, it might be wielded as an instrument of oppression.

We may exult that George the third is on the throne; and that his gracious dispositions are represented by lord Hardwicke; but we are bound to maintain the checks of our well-guarded constitution, against evil times, and arbitrary rulers.

We are therefore not to overlook what appears upon the record: namely, that the present is a sort of state prosecution; for an alleged libel on the executive government of this country.

We are not to forget, that what is contended for by the servants of the crown is, that the Habeas Corpus act shall be ineffectual to procure the enlargement of one, who has incurred their displeasure, by the supposed commission of one of the lowestailable offences: by the publication of what (having no judicial knowledge of its contents) we want the means of pronouncing to be untrue.

We, the legitimate expounders of the lex terræ, and especially called on to give efficacy to those laws, which form an entrenchment round the liberties of our country,—are bound to ask ourselves, what motive the servants of the crown might in arbitrary periods have, for ignominiously sending as a prisoner, to another country, a man placed in one of the most dignified situations amongst the magistracy,—whilst as yet his innocence of any crime must be presumed; and when the suffering him to remain at home, so far from producing a failure of justice, would subject him to the jurisdictions of the country, where his offence, if any, was committed: where the merits of his case could be most fairly tried:—where his defence could be most advantageously made;—and his innocence, if he were innocent, most easily made appear:—where amongst friends he could find security, to exempt him from a prison:—where, if acquitted he would be unpunished;—and if convicted, his punishment would be proportionate to his offence.

The answer to these questions, as to the probable motives of a government, in times unlike the present, might guide to a determination of the matter now before us.

Though the topic be a delicate one, I also feel it to be a duty (to which all considerations of mere delicacy should give way), to observe that the prisoner is one of the judges of the land.

With what view do I make this observation?—Shall the judges be less responsible to justice for their conduct, than the most obscure individual of the country?—God forbid!—I am rather disposed to maintain the opposite opinion. But it is to be recollected, that in our frame of government, the judicial order forms a distinct, and sort of barrier estate: and that it is a principle of the first importance to our freedom, that this body should be protected from all oppressive control, and jealously removed from all seductive influence, which the executive might be tempted to exert.

The judges stand (at least they may stand), in the breach; and ought manfully to maintain their privileges and independence: less for their own sake, than for that of the constitution. Nor has any thing happened lately* in this country, which seems calculated to warrant their slumbering on their posts. Therefore, in the moment in which we find a judge the object of this proceeding, it illustrates the abuses to which, ill construed, the statute, at some future period, might give rise.

We should remember that it is of emphatic consequence to the public, that the independence of the bench should exist, not merely in theory, but substantially in practice; and that the Habeas Corpus act (which counsel for the crown by a side wind would overturn), is a barrier erected by the patriotism of our ancestors, against the encroachments of the crown: encroachments as likely to be made, if at all attempted, upon the judges of the land (those impediments to despotic rule), as upon any other order in the state.

On the whole, I consider this as perhaps the most vital question which I have been ever called on to discuss. A more important one, than I ever expected to find submitted to me: a more critical one, than I hope I shall ever have to investigate hereafter.

If the judges reject my construction of this act, I shall bow to their interpretation, as the true one:—and my deference for parliament will prevent me from pronouncing, that so expounded, the statute is oppressive.

But, while the question is yet open, I may avow my opinion, that the provisions, which a construction different from mine must introduce, would tend to shake our liberties and constitution to their foundations.

I admit that they might equally affect the liberties of England. But the proud and enlightened magistrates of that country will, I am persuaded, assert theirs with sufficient boldness.

I for my part confess, that my first anxiety is for the honour, the freedom, and the welfare of my native land.

Indeed the silence with which the event of this arrest has been received, might lead one to infer that I have been exaggerating its importance; and that the transaction is less momentous, than I conceive, or represent it.

But the test afforded by such silence might, in times less fortunate than ours, become highly dangerous and fallacious: and therefore it is unsafe to resort to it at all.

* This is probably an allusion to the proceedings instituted in the House of Lords by the marquis of Abercorn against Mr. Justice Fox, which were in progress at the time when this argument was delivered. A very full account of the different proceedings in the case of judge Fox will be found in Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, Vols. 2 to 7 inclusive. See also 2 Plowden's Hist. of Ireland from the Union to 1810, pp. 11, 56, 158, 373.

We cannot have forgotten how profound the silence was, which the Moniteur observed on a far different occasion: dissimilar to what, while our laws are rightly construed, can ever disgrace or terrify this country.

I mean the apprehension of the late duke d'Enghien: when he was hurried from a foreign territory into that of France, by the persons exercising the powers of government there,—to be tried by a law with which he was unacquainted,—for a crime alleged to have been committed in a country where he had not been.

The silence there may have originated in terror or corruption. But I have already protested against the sophistry of deriving conclusions from the virtues of our sovereign, the merits of the viceroy, or circumstances of the day.

We therefore should, on the contrary, remember, that in this country like causes may produce the like effects; as our history shows them to have done in evil days; which might recur.

If this were ever hereafter to be the case, would not such frightful stillness supply an argument, more impressive and eloquent than words could frame, to prove how alarmingly unconstitutional an occurrence must be, of which the press did not venture to take notice?

I know that some will be, or affect to be, surprised by the tone which I have thought it proper to assume. There may indeed be a tame, and creeping, and tradesman-like mode of administering the law conceived; but it is not one which meets my ideas of the duties or station of a judge. Laws are but means; and though it be not our province to legislate, but to interpret,—yet should we not forget, or fail to further, the end and object of those laws, which we are called upon to construe; namely, the preservation of public morals; the promotion of social order; and the establishment of good government, of our liberties, and of the constitution. Nor would it be possible that any laws, whose direct and obvious tendency was, to overwhelm this latter, could flow from the only source, which should give them force and authenticity; viz. from the true principles and spirit of the constitution.

Therefore I repeat, that where the words of a statute are ambiguous, I shall always hold that so to construe them as to work oppression, is to interpret them falsely.

Besides, the statute which we are expounding, may be considered as in some degree consequential to the Union; a measure which (let me without egotism, be permitted to recollect that), while a member of the legislature, I supported.

If that arrangement, now the law of the land, and as such entitled to our (and especially to my) respect, should, as may happen to the best measures, be abused,—still, so long as I was not an accomplice in them, I should not hold myself responsible for those abuses; nor culpable for having unwittingly contributed to produce them, by being party to a league, from which they need not have arisen.

But the united parliament never will enact what, rightly construed, can be subversive of Irish freedom. How therefore can abuses in the statute law spring up, unless through misinterpretations, proceeding from the bench? Or how could I pretend to an unblemished character or tranquil mind, if I were advisedly to lend my hand to a perversion of that compact, which I fondly considered as ensuring the happiness of Ireland,—and in the formation of which I therefore actively concurred? How indeed could I look for pardon from my God, if by (what strikes me as) the forced construction of a corollary statute, I should effect the degradation and enslavement of my country?

No. Let us leave the Habeas Corpus act untouched: the Union on the liberal basis, on which, when carried, it was placed: the constitution in the state, in which our brave ancestors bequeathed it. We are not likely to render our liberties more secure, by alteration. To the rash innovator who attempted it, I should be disposed to exclaim, in the ominous and emphatic language of the Roman Centurion, "signifer statue signum: hic manebimus optime."

These were the observations which I had to make. In entering so far upon the subject to which they apply, I may have wearied my hearers; but I have satisfied my conscience.

Mr. Baron George.—In this case I am of opinion with baron Maclelland. How the motion now before the Court shall be ruled seems to be a matter of great concern to the defendant, and in its discussion many great questions have been introduced: on that account I came this day prepared to deliver my sentiments in some method; but the line of argument I had proposed seems ill-suited to this late hour, I shall therefore offer but very few arguments: I shall pass over the return that has been made to this writ, and the several English acts from which that of the 44th of the King is taken, by saying, that I concur in the observations baron Maclelland has made upon them.

We must observe that the legislature studies to avoid all ambiguity in wording statutes which authorize arrests. Acts which authorize magistrates and constables to commit, or to arrest, do in general show them their duty in plain terms, and so furnish such as intend to act well with an explicit and certain justification; but any statute calling on peace officers to act, and yet leaving it doubtful to them and to others whether they had any authority would be a reproach to legislation.

The counsel for the defendant have argued that the act of the 44th of the King is of this last description, for after denying to it the extent which it expresses to have, those learned gentlemen are not agreed among themselves what are the classes of crimes, or of offenders which fall within it. At one time it is said, that the Habeas Corpus act is infringed if this act extends beyond capital cases;—next it is said that this act extends to felonies, and unbailable cases only. Again, that if this act extends beyond felonies, it comprises such misdemeanors only as are committed by actual and not by constructive presence; and that without escape no warrant can be endorsed here for an offence committed in England. They have not drawn any line by which they all agree this act is bounded: But, as I think, all this uncertainty arises, from denying to the words of this statute, their plain and express meaning; which seems to have left nothing to construction, and extends, in express terms, to all persons against whom a warrant shall be granted for any crime or offence.

But much of the weight of the argument has rested on the consideration, that the preamble of this law recites escape, and that in the body of the act no power is given to admit to bail in the country where the warrant is to be endorsed; from whence it has been concluded that the act is applicable only to cases where there has been flight for an unbailable offence. If this be so then the magistrate who indorsed, and the officer who executed the warrant upon one who did not escape must be answerable in trespass vi et armis:—how then shall these persons be informed of the fact on which all their authority is made to rest? How is the fact of escape to be found? How to be certified, or to be proved to them? We cannot fairly intend that the legislature has made all the authority of the magistrate to arise out of a collateral fact of which he can have no official knowledge; and yet compelled him to endorse the warrant when presented to him as the act has required.

This act of the 44th of the King is, as far as the case before us is concerned, a transcript of the 13th of Geo. 3rd; and in my mind the apprehensions here so well expressed for the liberties of the people and of the press, by the possible abuses of this law, lose much of their alarm when it is known that the same provisions in force for thirty years and more, between England and Scotland, have not as yet produced any inconvenience to either of those countries. When the legislatures of the two countries were united, it became necessary that a law similar to that which had till then been in force between England and Scotland should be adopted between Great Britain and Ireland. It seems an obvious and a necessary policy to make every man throughout the united kingdom amenable for any offence against the law of any part of it; and therefore going against the express words of this statute would also be going against its plain intent. It is argued, that had this act been designed to extend to bailable cases, a power to take bail in the country where the warrant was to be endorsed would be given by it; but, perhaps, authority to admit to bail has been admitted on far different grounds. By the statute each magistrate is empowered to bail for such offences against the laws of his own district as are bailable. The magistrate is supposed to know what offences are bailable within his proper district: How far offences may be bailable by the laws of other countries he knows not; and it might seem to be rash and unreasonable to give judicial power unless competent knowledge was to accompany it; besides, if foreign magistrates knew the duty of such an office, and should be thought to abuse it wantonly and oppressively, the law would be imperfect that left such an evil without remedy; the Court, whose immediate officer he was, having no record before it, or knowledge of the merits, could not judge of his conduct; he must answer, if at all, at a foreign tribunal. The difficulties of estreating, levying, and applying the money forfeited, by recognizance of bail, in such cases have been mentioned. Thus we see what various and voluminous systems of law must arise, had authority to bail been given.

Transmitting the defendant to England, or requiring him to attend there for trial, has been treated as a wanton and an unconstitutional severity; but it appears by the warrant and affidavits now before us, that the libel imputed to him was printed and published in a paper of general circulation, which made its first appearance in London. That such offence may be indicted here also, I doubt not. The injury done by a printed libel may be inflicted in many places; and no doubt a prosecution may be maintained in any of those places: and if this be so, with which party does the choice of a venue rest?—with the sufferer or with the person accused? The persons here charged to be libelled, highly as they value the public opinion in Ireland, may set as high a value on that in England. Besides, they appear to be persons holding highly dignified offices, and may prefer to have the issue on this indictment tried, as near as possible to the seat and observation of that legislature to which they are responsible. The want of compulsory process for witnesses the defendant, no doubt, labours under; but a change of venue might cast this on the prosecutors.

Although to this statute, many faults and imperfections have been imputed, it must be allowed to have one good quality: It is identically and reciprocally the same, with respect to England, Ireland, and Scotland; it is an equal law—it contains nothing that can awaken jealousy—each community of the united kingdom is equally subject to it; and the chief justices of England, and of Ireland, seeming to have the same sense of its provisions, have shown their readiness to give them effect.

For these reasons, with many better already given by baron Maclelland, I concur in opinion with him.

Lord Chief Baron.—This case has been so fully and ably discussed as well on the one side as on the other, that very little remains to be said by him who comes last; and to say any thing at all requires no small degree of strength of mind, for before I can apply myself to the subject, I must disengage myself from the effects of that fascinating eloquence which still vibrates upon my ear, has touched, and still acts upon the finest feelings of my heart, and which has renewed some of the pleasantest recollections of my life. And I am not only overpowered by the eloquence which we have heard at the bar; I must also try to deliver myself from the meshes of that net, in which the ingenuity and talents of my brother Smith have involved me; and here I am glad to observe, that though some apprehensions seem to be entertained by him, for the independence of the Irish bench, it is not likely to suffer in its reputation for ability—he alone would be sufficient to avert that danger.

But I confess that he has not convinced me;—either the razor is too keen, or the block too coarse, for me to feel those impressions which his arguments have probably made upon men of finer understandings, and less debilitated constitutions. This question has been greatly magnified by the course which has been taken; one would be led to believe, that the respectable defendant was now at the bar to be tried, upon the charge made against him; but we are not called upon to pronounce either on his guilt or innocence—that is not the question—we are bound until a verdict has been given to consider him as innocent, but we are not to give that verdict. The question before us is, whether a warrant has been granted against him: that appears upon the face of the return; and then all we have to inquire is, whether the Irish justice was warranted in endorsing the warrant of the Chief Justice of England. In my opinion the act is imperative upon him; he had neither the means nor the right to inquire into the guilt or innocence of the party, or into the exility or enormity of the guilt, if any existed,—nor could he inquire, whether the warrant was granted against a person escaping or going into the country in which he receives the warrant; when he sees the warrant, he is bound by law to endorse it. The question before us then merely amounts to this—is the prisoner in custody under a warrant issued by a competent authority in England, and endorsed by a magistrate of competent authority in Ireland? If we take the fourth section of the act 44th Geo. 3, c. 92, and strip it of the tautology into which the legislature has fallen, we shall find the words of the act to be nearly these: “If any person or persons against whom a warrant shall be issued by

“a competent authority, for a crime against the laws of England or Scotland, shall escape, go into, or reside, or be in Ireland; the warrant shall be endorsed by a magistrate, of the place into which he has escaped or gone, or where he resides, or exists, and under the authority of that warrant, he shall be carried to the country from which it issued, and there dealt with, as if he had been there apprehended.”

I seems to me to be impossible to create doubts upon the construction of this clause, without the exercise of that legal subtlety which can turn the plainest words into ambiguity: the enacting words can bear no other construction to any plain mind. Moliere was said to read his comedies to an old woman, as to a person who would best comprehend their obvious force and meaning; and I cannot doubt, that if this act were read to any old woman, she would understand its provisions precisely as I have done.

What then is the objection?—that there is a particular preamble to the enacting clause, which is to receive a different construction from the general preamble, and is to control the generality of the enacting clause, and to confine it to the case of escape; but this position I cannot admit to be law—the enacting clause cannot be controlled by the preamble, unless when the enacting clause refers expressly to the preamble, and here there is no such reference. It was an argument of this kind which excited the indignation of lord Cowper, who urged, that upon the construction of the Coventry act, it might with equal force be argued, that inasmuch as it is recited in the preamble to that act, that the cause of passing it, was the slitting of sir J. Coventry's nose; that therefore, the nose only was intended to be protected, and that all the other parts and features of the human body might be maimed and disfigured with impunity; for, said an ingenious barrister, the nose only is mentioned in the preamble.

But another objection is raised—the statute gives no power of bailing, and therefore it is said, cannot extend to bailable cases. I deny that such a power is withheld by the law; for its very concluding words are, that upon his arrival in the nearest county in England, the person arrested shall be brought before a magistrate, to be dealt with as if arrested there; that is, “shall be bailed, if the charge be bailable,”—if not, shall be transmitted in custody to the place where the offence is charged to have been committed.

It is said, that the preamble of the third section applies also to the fourth part, which uses the words “felons and other malefactors;” but the same words are used in the 13th Geo. 3rd, which clearly extends to misdemeanors; for it directs, that when the person shall be brought from Scotland into England, he shall be taken before a justice, who shall proceed against him, as he might have done by the 24th Geo. 2nd, which regulates the process between county and county, and provides for the manner of giving bail; from whence I infer, that, notwithstanding the arguments at the bar, the word "malefactors" includes persons charged with bailable offences.

The object of the 13th Geo. 3rd was, to put the criminal process in England and Scotland upon the same footing as it stood between county and county in England by the 24th Geo. 2nd; the 3rd and 4th clauses of the act under discussion are almost precisely the same as the 13th Geo. 3rd, and their object is, to put the process in Great Britain and Ireland upon the same footing as between county and county in England. It is said, that monstrous hardships will follow; and I admit, some curious evils have been pointed out; I am not answerable for them—I am not a law-maker—I am only a law-teller. If I were to speak in a legislative capacity, I might perhaps say, that I was convinced that such a law ought not to have been made without farther provisions; but sitting where I do, and finding the law so made, I must act under its directions.

Besides, all the consequences which have been spoken of with respect to Ireland, will follow with respect to England and Scotland; and, if the people of England have been less tender of the rights of our people than they ought, this act puts it completely in our power to be even with them. If they are alive to the liberties of the country, we are not less so. No man who has heard the display of eloquence and ability which came from the bench this day, can suppose that we are less so: and I will not yield, even to my learned and eloquent brother, in being as feelingly alive to true constitutional liberty, as he or any man. But if the people of England were so alive to the feelings of liberty, how has it happened that they have not, for thirty-two years, repaired, as between England and Scotland, the very mischief which is now said to exist between Great Britain and Ireland? And this is a sufficient answer to the hints thrown out, that this law was framed for any particular purpose; it could not have been so intended:

it had been the law between England and Scotland for above thirty years; and when Ireland came to stand in the same relation to those countries as they bore to each other, it was but just to assimilate the proceedings in the three countries. No such hardships as those suggested, however, arise on the 13th Geo. 3rd; nor has the propriety of that law ever been controverted. As to the opinion, that this act operates as a repeal of the Habeas Corpus act, if it do so, I cannot help it, but I do not think it does; at most, it does but suspend it while a prisoner is in transitu from one country to the other: and as to the hardship, if it exist, it is common to the whole empire. The act is an act of fair reciprocity; there is as much hardship in bringing an Englishman, without bail, from the Orkneys to the first northern county in England, or a Scotsman from the Land's-end in Cornwall to the first Scottish county, as in bringing an Irishman from Dublin to Holyhead.

From the weak state of my health, I did not think, when I began to deliver my opinion, that I should have been able to hold out so long; but I must, in mercy to myself, nay, and my audience, conclude;—and, if I have been compelled to omit any of the reasons which have contributed to form my judgment, I trust I shall stand excused, the more especially, as I feel my opinion to be sustained by that of the court of King's-bench, and of two out of three of my brethren.

The defendant subsequently obtained a writ of Habeas Corpus out of the court of Common Pleas, where the case was again argued. The Court deferred giving their decision until the first day of the next ensuing term; and the defendant was admitted to bail in the court of King's-bench.

The decision of the court of Common Pleas was the same as that of the courts of King's-bench and Exchequer; but I have not been able to ascertain whether any difference of opinion subsisted amongst the learned judges.

the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and of and concerning the said CHARLES OSBORNE so being such justice as aforesaid and the said ALEXANDER MARSDEN so being such under secretary as aforesaid (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "What I have now to touch upon must be done with a delicate hand I will confine myself to a bare narrative of facts and will not presume to give any opinion As soon as the government had fully recovered its recollection a commission directed to five of the judges issued for the trial of those rebels who had been arrested for treason committed in the county and city of Dublin This commission having issued while the judges were on circuit was filled up (and very properly filled up) with the names of five senior of those judges who were then on the circuits which were likely to terminate at the earliest period of time such was the reason given by government for the particular selection of the judges named on that commission and it certainly was a good reason In some time after this commission had been sitting it became necessary to issue a new commission for the trial of rebels in the shires of Antrim and of Down In the appointment of this second commission the principle which directed the selection in the first was not adhered to on the contrary the junior judge of the twelve" (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "was very anxiously called out and placed in this new commission over the heads of a number of his seniors This however could not and ought not to have given offence to any of those senior judges because whatever opinion of them the government" (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "may have manifested in such an appointment the opinion of the present government" (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "upon such a subject (known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice) is too contemptible to have the slightest effect upon any of those learned judges in the public mind The circumstance therefore was not at first attended to There is published in this city a newspaper called the Dublin Journal It is in general conducted with good sense loyalty and a regard to truth but in particular deviations it is known to be under the control and immediate direction of government" (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "In that paper of the 20th of October last a publication appeared which purported to be a charge given by the junior judge above alluded to to the grand jury of the county of Antrim in this place I beg now to declare that I am far from attempting to assert that the learned judge did pronounce any such charge and when I speak of his charge I request you will understand I mean only the newspaper publication above-mentioned In the newspaper publication the learned judge is made to tell the grand jury that 'through the well-timed efforts and strenuous exertions of a wise and energetic government &c. the progress of such crimes as lately disgraced this country had been effectually checked' If the learned justice did make any such assertion (which I am far from supposing) with what amazement the grand jury must have received such a broadside poured upon the truth of the fact I cannot as I was not present know but I can very well imagine what the feelings of twenty-three well-informed gentlemen must have been Their respect and a thorough knowledge of their duty would necessarily keep them silent" (and in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "But Sir suggestion does not stop here Men ask how could (if the learned justice did make any such assertion) the learned justice be led to give credit to a position which contradicts the evidence of the senses of every man in the kingdom who was present at or knew any thing of the transaction how could a learned judge be supposed to assert that which no man in the kingdom would assert unless he had some reasons of the same nature as those which prevailed on Mr. Marsden's attorney-general on the trials for high treason to assert something of the same kind? Men Sir couple the extraordinary selection of the learned justice" (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "from amongst his fellows with the extraordinary assertion attributed to him in a government newspaper and they ask if he made that assertion where did he get his information? Was he ever in Mr. Marsden's (meaning the said Alexander Marsden's) "audience-room since the night of the 23rd of July? what passed there? what were the predisposing causes which induced government to select particularly that learned justice? (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "could government have foreseen (and if so by what faculty) that the learned justice would have given an instruction to the grand jury so very useful and so very grateful to the government? What night telescope could have been applied to the eye of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "which through the dark womb of things unborn could have enabled him to perceive through this little future star of praise springing from the creative lips of the learned justice? Here sir decorum towards you and towards the public induces me to be silent as to other and perhaps stronger observations But I may I believe add what men also say that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "in order to screen them from public disgrace we might then look for another but not less fatal end to our liberties and to our constitution than that which rebellion or invasion could produce and in truth they say that except as to momentary effects rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference if it can be supposed that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice" And in other parts of which said last mentioned libel were and are contained divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE and the conduct of the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid by way of antithesis and contrast between the conduct which in and by the said last mentioned libel it is insinuated that the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had adopted and pursued and the conduct which in and by the said last mentioned libel it is asserted that the late right honourable LLOYD LORD KENYON now deceased would have adopted and pursued (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "instead of calling him" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "to the high station which he so ably filled had it pleased his majesty to bless the western neighbours of Cambricus"* (meaning the people of the said part of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland) "who certainly owe the honest and warm-hearted principality" (meaning the principality of Wales) "no ill will with Lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "for their chancellor I can very well conceive what Lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "in such a situation would have done and also what he would not have done From a rare modesty of nature or from a rare precision of self knowledge Lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection on his arrival in a country with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which and with their persons manners and individual characters and connections he must have been utterly unacquainted In such a country torn with domestic sedition and treason threatened with foreign invasion and acting since the union under an untried constitution if doctor Addington had required that Lord Kenyon should direct a Cambridge-shire Earl (meaning the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke) "in all his councils" Lord Kenyon would as soon at the desire of Lord St. Vincent have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles particularly the integrity of Lord Kenyon would have shrunk from such an undertaking if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possesses any rank estate or connexion in the country should upon any account be consulted" (meaning thereby and intending to cause it to be believed that he the said John Lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had undertaken to direct the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke in all his councils as such lieutenant and governor as aforesaid in the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom with a condi-

scandalous and malicious libel containing therein divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said JOHN lord REDESDALE and the conduct of the said JOHN lord REDESDALE as such chancellor and privy councillor as aforesaid by way of antithesis and contrast between the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is insinuated that the said John lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy councillor as aforesaid had adopted and pursued and the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is asserted that the late right honourable Lloyd lord Kenyon now deceased would have adopted and pursued (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "Instead of calling him" (meaning the said late Lloyd lord Kenyon) "to the high station which he so ably filled had it pleased his majesty to bless the western neighbours of Cambricus" (meaning the people of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "who certainly owe the honest and warm-hearted principality no ill will with lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd lord Kenyon) "for their chancellor I can very well conceive what lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd lord Kenyon) in such a situation would have done and also what he would not have done From a rare modesty of nature or from a rare precision of self-knowledge lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection on his arrival in a country with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which and with their persons manners and individual characters and connexions he must have been utterly unacquainted In such a country torn with domestic sedition and treason threatened with foreign invasion and acting since the Union under an untried constitution if doctor Addington had required that lord Kenyon should direct a Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke) "in all his councils Lord Kenyon would as soon at the desire of lord St. Vincent have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles Particularly the integrity of lord Kenyon would have shrunk from such an undertaking if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the country should upon any account be consulted His pride would have spurned at the undertaking if he were told that to the Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke) "and himself in the cares of government a clerk in the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers without political habits political information or honourable connexion were to be joined as assessors and to be the only assessors And lord Kenyon's pride and integrity would have both joined in preventing him from being himself the instrument of introducing such men into a cabinet of government if any one man could be found of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country had in the moment of his conviction and sentence uttered the following apostrophe 'That ‘viper! whom my father nourished! He it was from whose lips I first imbibed those principles and doctrines which now by their effects drag me to my grave and he it is who is now brought forward as my prosecutor and who by an unheard-of exercise of the prerogative has wantonly lashed with a speech to evidence the dying son of his former friend when that dying son had produced no evidence had made no defence but on the contrary had acknowledged the charge and had submitted to his fate’ Lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene in which although guilt was in one part to be punished yet in the whole drama justice was confounded humanity outraged and loyalty insulted. Of lord Kenyon therefore Cambricus must well know it never could have been believed that he himself would lead such a character forward introduce him to the favour of a deceived sovereign clothe him in the robes and load him with the emoluments of office. Lord Kenyon must have known that a noble duke for having toasted at a drunken club in a common tavern to a noisy rabble ‘the sovereignty of the people’ was struck by his majesty’s command out of the privy council and deprived of all his offices both civil and military. If therefore any man were to be found who not at a drunken club or to a brawling rabble but in a grave and high assembly not in the character of an inebriated toast-master but in that of a sober constitutional lawyer had insisted on the sovereignty of the people as a first principle of the English law and had declared that by law an appeal lay from the decision of the tellers of the Houses of Parliament to that of the ‘tellers of the nation’ and that if a particular law were disagreeable to the people however it might have been enacted with all royal and parliamentary solemnity nevertheless it was not binding and the people by the general law were exempted from obedience to such a particular law because the people were the supreme and ultimate judges of what was for their own benefit. Lord Kenyon if he had been chancellor in any kingdom in Europe would have shrunk from recommending any such man to the favour of a monarch while there yet remained a shadow of monarchy visible in the world” and in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) “It was said of lord Kenyon that he loved money if so he loved his own money only and not the money of any other man. Lord Kenyon therefore as chancellor never would have made any rule or order by the effects of which the secretary of a master of the rolls would be deprived of all fees for the purpose of throwing all those fees into the hands of the secretary to the chancellor the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits” and in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) “The professional pride and inborn honour of lord Kenyon” (meaning the said late Lloyd lord Kenyon) “would never have suffered him to enter into a combination to sap by underhand means the independence of his brethren the judges he never would have suffered the great seal in his hands to be used for the purpose of garbling the bench in order to gratify those who might be contented publicly to eulogize that government which privately they must have despised nor would he have employed any of his leisure in searching into offices for practices by which he might harass the domestic arrangements of others whose pride and whose integrity would not bend to his views and thus double the vigour of his attack by practising on the hopes of some and endeavouring to work upon the fears of others” To the great scandal and disgrace of the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE. In contempt of our said lord the king and his laws to the evil example of all others in the like case offending and against the peace of our said lord the king his crown and dignity

And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said Robert Johnson again unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending to traduce defame and vilify the said JOHN lord REDESDALE so being such chancellor as aforesaid afterwards to wit on the same day and year last aforesaid at Westminster aforesaid in the county of Middlesex unlawfully and maliciously did compose write publish and print and cause and procure to be composed written published and printed a certain other scandalous and malicious libel containing therein amongst other things divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said JOHN lord REDESDALE and the conduct of the said JOHN lord REDESDALE as such chancellor by way of antithesis and contrast between the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is insinuated that the said John lord Redesdale as such chancellor as aforesaid had adopted and pursued and the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is asserted that the said lord Kenyon would have adopted and pursued (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) “It was said of lord Kenyon that he loved money if so he loved his own money only and not the money of any other man. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said Robert Johnson again unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending to move and incite the liege subjects of our said lord the king to hatred and dislike of our said lord the king's administration of the government of this kingdom and to insinuate and cause it to be believed that the people of that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland were oppressed aggrieved and injured by our said lord the king's government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and to traduce defame and vilify the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and especially the right honourable PHILIP EARL OF HARDWICKE our said lord the king's lieutenant-general and governor-general of the said part of the said United Kingdom and the right honourable JOHN LORD REDESDALE our said lord the king's lord chancellor and keeper of the great seal and one of his most honourable privy council of and for the said part of the said United Kingdom and also further unlawfully and maliciously devising and intending to traduce defame and vilify the honourable CHARLES OSBORNE then and there being one of the justices of our said lord the king assigned to hold pleas in the court of our said lord the king before the king himself in Ireland aforesaid afterwards to wit on the 10th day of December in the forty-fourth year of the reign aforesaid at Westminster in the county of Middlesex unlawfully and maliciously did compose write and publish and cause and procure to be composed written and published a certain other scandalous and malicious libel in some parts of which said last-mentioned libel were and are contained divers scandalous malicious and seditious matters and things of and concerning the said parts of the said United Kingdom and the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom and of and concerning the said CHARLES OSBORNE so being such justice as aforesaid and the said ALEXANDER MARDEN so being such under secretary as aforesaid (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "what I have now to touch upon must be done with a delicate hand I will confine myself to a bare narrative of facts and not presume to give my opinion As soon as the government had fully recovered its recollection a commission directed to five of the judges issued for the trial of those rebels who had been arrested for treason committed in the county and city of Dublin This commission having issued while the judges were on circuit was filled up (and very properly filled up) with the names of the five senior of those judges who were then on the circuits which were to terminate at the earliest period of time Such was the reason given by government for the particular selection of the judges named in the commission and it certainly was a good reason In some time after this commission had been sitting it became necessary to issue a new commission for the trial of rebels in the shires of Antrim and of Down In the appointment to this second commission the principle which directed the selection in the first was not adhered to on the contrary the junior judge of the twelve (meaning the said Charles Osborne) was very anxiously called out and placed in this new commission over the heads of a number of his seniors This however could not and ought not to have given offence to any of those senior judges because whatever opinion of them the government (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) may have manifested in such an appointment the opinion of the present government (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "upon such a subject (known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice) is too contemptible to have the slightest effect upon any of those learned judges in the public mind. The circumstance therefore was not at first attended to. There is published in this city a newspaper called the Dublin Journal. It is in general conducted with good sense loyalty and a regard to truth but in particular deviations it is known to be under the control and immediate direction of the government" (meaning the persons employed by our said lord the king in the administration of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "In that paper of the 20th of October last a publication appeared which purported to be a charge given by the junior judge above alluded to to the grand jury of the county of Antrim. I beg now to declare that I am far from attempting to assert that the learned judge did pronounce any such charge and when I speak of his charge I request you will understand I mean only the newspaper publication above mentioned. In the newspaper publication the learned judge is made to tell the grand jury that 'through the well-timed efforts and strenuous exertions of a wise and energetic government &c. the progress of such crimes as lately disgraced this country had been effectually checked'. If the learned justice did make any such assertion (which I am far from supposing) with what amazement the grand jury must have received such a broadside poured upon the truth of the fact. I cannot as I was not present know but I can very well imagine what the feelings of twenty-three well informed gentlemen must have been. Their respect and a thorough knowledge of their duty would necessarily keep them silent". And in another part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "But sir suggestion does not stop here. Men ask how could (if the learned justice did make any such assertion) the learned justice be led to give credit to a position which contradicts the evidence of the senses of every man in the kingdom who was present at or knew any thing of the transaction? How could a learned judge be supposed to assert that which no man in the kingdom would assert unless he had reasons of the same nature as those which prevailed on Mr. Marsden's attorney-general on the trials for high treason to assert something of the same kind? Men sir couple the extraordinary selection of the learned justice" (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "from amongst his fellows with the extraordinary assertion attributed to him in a government newspaper and they ask if he made that assertion where did he get his information? Was he ever in Mr. Marsden's" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden's) "audience room since the night of the

23rd of July? What passed there? What were the pre-disposing causes which induced government to select particularly that learned justice?" (meaning the said Charles Osborne) "Could government have foreseen (and if so by what faculty) that the learned justice would have given an instruction to the grand jury so very useful and so very grateful to the government? What night telescope could have been applied to the eye of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "which through the dark womb of things unborn could have enabled him to perceive this little future star of praise springing from the creative lips of the learned justice? Here sir decorum towards you and towards the public induces me to be silent as to other and perhaps stronger observations. But I may I believe add what men also say that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of majesty should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr. Marsden" (meaning the said Alexander Marsden) "in order to screen them from public disgrace we might then look for another but not less fatal end to our liberties and to our constitution than that which rebellion or invasion could produce and in truth they say that except as to momentary effects rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference if it can be supposed that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice". And in other parts of which said last-mentioned libel were and are contained divers scandalous and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE and the conduct of the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid by way of antithesis and contrast between the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is insinuated that the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE as such chancellor and privy counsellor had adopted and pursued and the conduct which in and by the said last-mentioned libel it is asserted that the said late right honorable LLOYD LORD KENYON now deceased would have adopted and pursued (that is to say) in one part thereof according to the tenor and effect following (that is to say) "Instead of calling him" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "to the high station which he so ably filled had it pleased his majesty to bless the western neighbours of Cambricus" (meaning the people of the said part of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland) "who certainly owe the honest and warm hearted principality" (meaning the principality of Wales) "no ill will with lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "for their chancellor I can very well conceive what lord Kenyon" (meaning the said late Lloyd Lord Kenyon) "in such a situation would have done and also what he would not have done. From a rare modesty of nature or from a rare precision of self knowledge lord Kenyon would have acted with reserve and circumspection on his arrival in a country with the moral qualities of the inhabitants of which and with their persons manners and individual characters and connexions he must have been utterly unacquainted In such a country torn with domestic sedition and treason threatened with foreign invasion and acting since the Union under an untried constitution if doctor Addington had required that lord Kenyon should direct a Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke) "in all his councils lord Kenyon would as soon at the desire of lord St. Vincent have undertaken to pilot a line of battle ship through the Needles Particularly the integrity of lord Kenyon would have shrunk from such an undertaking if a condition had been added to it that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the country should upon any account be consulted" (meaning and insinuating thereby and intending to cause it to be believed that the said John Lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had undertaken to direct the said Philip earl of Hardwicke in all his counsels as such lieutenant and governor as aforesaid in the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom with a condition that no one nobleman or gentleman who possessed any rank estate or connexion in the said part of the said United Kingdom should be consulted as to the government thereof) "his pride would have spurned at the undertaking if he were told that to the Cambridgeshire earl" (meaning the said Philip earl of Hardwicke) "and himself in the cares of government a clerk in the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers without political habits political information or honourable connexion were to be joined as assessors and to be the only assessors and lord Kenyon's pride and integrity would have both joined in preventing him from being himself the instrument of introducing such men into a cabinet of government" (meaning and insinuating thereby and intending to cause it to be believed that the said John Lord Redesdale as such chancellor and privy counsellor as aforesaid had been the instrument of introducing a clerk in the secretary's office and a couple of lawyers without political habits political information or honourable connexion into the cabinet of the government of the said part of the said United Kingdom) "If any one man could be found of whom a young but unhappy victim of the justly offended laws of his country had in the moment of his conviction and sentence uttered the following apostrophe 'That viper! whom my father nourished! he it was from whose lips I first imbibed those principles and doctrines which now by their effects drag me to my grave and he it is who is now brought forward as my prosecutor and who by an unheard of exercise of the prerogative has wantonly lashed with a speech to evidence the dying son of his former friend when that dying son had produced no evidence had made no defence but on the contrary had acknowledged the charge and had submitted to his fate' Lord Kenyon would have turned with horror from such a scene in which although guilt was ing to cause it to be believed that the said John Lord Redesdale had searched into offices for practices by which he might harass the domestic arrangements of other persons whose pride and integrity would not bend to his views) To the great scandal and disgrace of the said JOHN LORD REDESDALE In contempt of our said lord the king and his laws To the evil example of all others in the like case offending and against the peace of our said lord the king his crown and dignity.

To this indictment the defendant put in the following plea to the jurisdiction of the Court.

* And now the said Robert Johnson in his own proper person comes, and having heard the indictment aforesaid read, and protesting that he is not guilty of the premises charged in the said indictment, or of any part thereof, for plea nevertheless, saith, that he ought not to be compelled to answer to the said indictment, because he saith that the kingdom of Ireland, before and until the time of the union of the two kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland was regulated and governed by the proper laws and statutes of the kingdom of Ireland, and not by the laws or statutes of the kingdom of Great Britain, or by the laws or statutes of England; and that ever since the union of the two kingdoms, that part of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, hath been and yet is governed and regulated by the proper laws and statutes of that part of the said United Kingdom called Ireland, and not by the laws or statutes of that part of the said United Kingdom called Great Britain or by the laws or statutes of England: and the said Robert Johnson further saith, that in the said kingdom of Ireland, before the said union, and in that part of the said United Kingdom called Ireland since the said union, there always have been and now are courts and jurisdictions therein being and thereto belonging, distinct from the courts and jurisdictions of Great Britain or of England, or of any part thereof, and competent and sufficient for the trial of all offences committed by the natives or inhabitants of Ireland during the time of their respective residence and commorancy in Ireland: and the said Robert Johnson further saith that he was born within Ireland aforesaid, and out of Great Britain, and before the said union (to wit) on the 1st of October, 1752, (to wit) at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex; and that he, the said Robert Johnson, on the first of November, 1802, and thenceforth continually, and until, at, and after the time of presenting the said indictment by the jurors aforesaid, in form aforesaid presented (to wit) until and upon the thirty-first of May, 1805, was resident and commorant within that part of the said United Kingdom called Ireland, and not elsewhere; and that the writings by the said indictment called libels, and in the said indictment mentioned, are of and concerning certain matters and things which took place in Ireland after the said first of November, 1802, (to wit) on the twenty-third of July, 1803, and subsequent thereto; and that the composing, writing, publishing, and printing the said writings, by the said indictment called libels; and causing the same to be composed, written, published, and printed in and by the said indictment alleged and mentioned, and the committing of all the supposed offences therein mentioned, took place and were after the said 1st of November, 1802, and while he the said Robert Johnson was so resident and commorant in Ireland aforesaid, and not elsewhere (to wit) on the 1st of January, 1804, (to wit) at Westminster aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid; and this he is ready to verify.

To this there was a general demurrer.

And on Tuesday, June 25, 1805, the Attorney-general moved the court for a peremptory rule on the defendant to join in demurrer on the morrow; the usual four-day rule to join in demurrer having expired on Saturday the 22nd, and the intervening Monday being a dies non jurid. He stated, that the indictment had been found in Michaelmas term last, and no plea put in until this term, when the above plea to the jurisdiction of the court was pleaded as of the last term: and that the object of his motion was to have the demurrer argued on Saturday next, the last crown paper day in the term. That according to the practice on the civil side,* the plaintiff may enter the joinder in demurrer for the defendant, without giving him any rule to join in demurrer: and though by the rule of court of Trin. 1 Geo. 2nd,† by which that practice is regulated, if there be no joinder in demurrer by the time the rule‡ for pleading is out, the plaintiff may sign judgment, still the practice on the crown side of the court has been, not to enter up judgment without giving a peremptory rule to join in demurrer within such time

‡ By the practice of the Crown-office there are two four-day rules given to bring a defendant in to plead, and then a peremptory rule is moved for, giving, in town prosecutions, the morrow; in country prosecutions, ten days to plead. In subsequent stages of pleading, only one four-day rule is given, and then a peremptory rule moved for, which is in general drawn up for four days more; but in vacation it is considered that such peremptory rule is not necessary.—East.

as the court shall direct. This appears from an ancient book in the Crown-office by sir Simon Harcourt, formerly master of that office, where is this entry:—Post regulam peremptoriam quatuor dies ad placitandum non de recto sed ex gratia; curia semper existens interrogata quando dies appunctuatur ut curie placet. And he mentioned as instances of such peremptory rules given, The King v. Williams,* where the attorney-general having demurred to a plea to the jurisdiction, pleaded to an information for a libel; and the defendant being in court, it was insisted that he should join in demurrer instante;† but the Court gave two rules for joining in demurrer, and then a peremptory rule; after which they said, if the defendant did not join in demurrer, they would give judgment; and the general practice in this respect, as reported by the same master in Laver's case,‡ “That in prosecutions for misdemeanors two four-day rules to plead are given, and a peremptory rule moved for; and then, if there be a demurrer, one four-day rule to join in demurrer is given, and a peremptory rule moved for: but that in capital cases (as that was) there is no rule given either to plead or join in demurrer, the prisoner being obliged in all cases to answer immediately.” He also referred to two other precedents from the Crown-office, the one Rex v. Ryder, 8 Geo. 2nd, where, after the common rule was out, a rule was given for the defendant to join in demurrer peremptorily on the morrow: and Rex v. Broughton, Trin. 28 Geo. 2nd, where a rule was given on the defendant to join in demurrer on the Friday, and a peremptory rule on the Monday following.

On these precedents, The Court now gave the rule required:—“That unless the defendant should peremptorily join in demurrer on the morrow, judgment should be entered for the king.”

* This was an information for a libel filed in the latter end of the reign of Car. 2, against the defendant, Speaker of the House of Commons, who as such had licensed, by order of the House, the publication of Dangerfield's narrative, on which account he pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court; to which plea the attorney-general demurred; and on the first opening of the case, judgment of respondeas ouster was given: and finally the defendant was fined 10,000*l.* E. 2, Jac. 2. Hodgson*, E. 35 Geo. 3rd. Sed quære by whom this account of hours is to be kept? and whether instante, as applied to the subject matter, may not more easily be taken to mean before the rising of the Court, where the act is to be done in court? or before the shutting of the office on the same night when the act is to be done there?—East.

On Saturday the 29th the demurrer was argued.

Court of King's-bench, Westminster, June 29, 1805.

Mr. Abbott.*—This, my lords, is an indictment found in this court against the defendant, charging him with having composed, printed, and published, and caused and procured to be composed, printed, and published, several libels (which are set forth in the indictment) reflecting on the lord-lieutenant and the lord chancellor of Ireland and others of his majesty's ministers, the particulars of which it is not necessary to state as the question now before the Court does not turn on them. To this indictment the defendant has pleaded a plea to the jurisdiction of your lordships' court; and his plea, after protesting that he is not guilty of the premises charged on him by the indictment, states that he ought not to be compelled to answer to this indictment, because the kingdom of Ireland before and until the Union, &c. [Here the learned counsel read the plea, for which see p. 385.] To this plea there is a demurrer, and then a joinder in demurrer; the question therefore now is, whether this plea is sufficient to oust your lordships' court of its jurisdiction to try this case: and it does seem a little extraordinary that any attempt should be made to prove that this court is not competent to try any person charged with the publication, in the county of Middlesex, of a libel upon his majesty's government—the proposition which it is incumbent on my learned friends who are of counsel for the defendant to make out. In opposition to it I have but little to say, nor can I have much until I hear something from the other side.

My lords, I take it to be one of the essential requisites of a plea to the jurisdiction of a court in which it is pleaded, that it should disclose another court more competent to try the subject matter which it seeks to remove from that court which is already in possession of the case. I find that rule laid down in 1 Doctrina Placitandi, p. 234. In Cowp. 172, you will also find the same rule particularly relied upon by lord Mansfield—I refer to the case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, wherein he says, “In every plea to the jurisdiction you must state another jurisdiction; therefore if an action is brought here for a matter arising in Wales, to bar the remedy sought in this court, you must show the jurisdiction of the court of Wales; and in every case, to repel the jurisdiction of the king's court, you must show a more proper and more sufficient jurisdiction: for if there is no other mode of trial, that alone will give the king's courts a jurisdiction.”

* These arguments of counsel are transcribed from MS. short-hand notes never before published.

Now it is not attempted by this plea to show—and how was it possible to show?—that any other court of England or Ireland had any jurisdiction, to the exclusion of your lordships' court, to try such an offence as that which is charged in this indictment, and which, be it always remembered, is the publication of libels in the county of Middlesex. There is in Ireland, I admit, a court competent to try offences committed there, but not to try offences committed in England: there neither is nor can there be any court in that country in which this gentleman can possibly be tried for having published a libel in the county of Middlesex.

My lords, I find in the books—which I have searched with some assiduity—very little on the subject of pleas to jurisdiction; but I think they may be reduced to three classes, and the plea now before the Court will not be found to fall within either of those classes. The first ground, my lords, of a plea to the jurisdiction of a court is the subject matter of the suit; for instance, you may plead to the jurisdiction of a court that land is holden in ancient demesne. A second ground of plea to the jurisdiction of a court is where the matter of the suit arises out of the ordinary limits of the jurisdiction of such court, as in the following instance:—Suppose the case of a city or borough in the charter of which there are clauses directing that the justices of the county shall not interfere in any matters within the said city or borough; and the magistrates of the county within which such city or borough is situate take cognizance of matters within such city or borough, it will be a good plea to the jurisdiction of such a bench of magistrates to state such clause of the charter of such city or borough, and to show that what had happened in such city or borough was within the provisions of its charter. But the present has nothing of that nature about it. The third class of cases, and the only one I can find to which that of the present defendant has any application, comprehends the ordinary instances of the officers of superior courts—such as attorneys and others—who are privileged in their respective courts to a certain extent. Whether it is to be contended by my learned friends on the other side that this gentleman has a personal privilege not to be sued here, I am unable to determine: but something of this sort is I presume to be attempted.

Let us now see how the defendant's case stands as disclosed by his own plea. He there says that he is a native of Ireland; and that before the union of the two countries Ireland was a distinct kingdom, governed by laws of its own, having courts of its own competent to the trial of offences.

My lords, what might have been the case before the Union, when the natives of Ireland were subjects only of the King of Great Britain, and not properly speaking subjects of the Crown of Great Britain [Vide 1 Hale's

P. C. 155, b. 317], it is not necessary for me to discuss; but even under those circumstances I think it would not have been difficult to dispose of such a plea as the present. Since the Union however it is unquestionably clear that every native of Ireland—that every person living in Ireland—is the subject not merely of the King but also of the Crown of the United Kingdom: and the effect of the Union is such that there is now no difference between the natives of Ireland and the natives of this country as to their duty of obedience to the sovereign, as to their common privileges, or as to their submission to the administration of justice and the protection which they receive from the same. Whatever therefore might have been the effect of a foreigner, resident abroad, sending a libel into this country, to be published here, and of its being so published by his agent here, that is a point which it is unnecessary to argue, because it is not the case of this defendant. For the present is the case of a subject of this realm, sending from one part of the realm to another, a libel to be there published; which, if his plea be true, the defendant has done; and it appears to me that this case is not distinguishable from those cases in which persons have been convicted of conspiracies and other offences where the offence has been commenced in one county and completed in another, for we have had conspiracies carried on in which different acts have been committed in different counties. Let us suppose that a person born at Bristol (which is a city having jurisdiction of its own by charter) and living there should send to his agent a libel to be published in the county of Middlesex; and suppose an indictment were preferred against him for that publication, and the venue laid in the county of Middlesex, which would of course come on to be tried before a local court in the county of Middlesex, would it ever occur to any person in such a case to plead to the jurisdiction of that court, and to state that the defendant was born in Bristol, that at the time of the publication of the supposed libel he resided at Bristol, that at Bristol there is a court competent to the trial of offences committed there, and that therefore the court in Middlesex was not competent to try him? I apprehend it would never occur to any one to offer such a plea to such a charge; and yet, my lords, that case appears to me to be precisely similar to this; the effect of the Union between this country and Ireland being, to put the subjects of both parts of the United Kingdom precisely on the same footing.

The present plea, if it be any thing, is nothing more (as it seems to me) than an alibi—an argumentative not guilty. The defendant says, "I cannot be guilty of publishing this libel in the county of Middlesex, for at the time at which I am charged with having published it I was in Ireland;" that is not only no plea but is also a very bad argument; for, where-ever he was, he did that which was illegal, and he admits that he did that which was illegal; the question is, not where he was, but where he did the act, or rather caused it to be done; and if it be true in point of law that it is impossible for a person residing in Ireland to publish or cause to be published, while he is there resident, a libel in the county of Middlesex, the defendant will have the full benefit of that legal impossibility under the general issue; and in that respect his present plea amounts only to the general issue, and is on that account also bad as a plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

My lords, it is not necessary in this case, nor indeed in many others, that the defendant should be personally present at the place in which the offence is committed; your lordships know that where several parties are charged with a conspiracy, where different acts are done by different parties in different counties, they may all be indicted for the conspiracy in that county in which any one of the acts was done. Although it may be a county in which one of the defendants could prove he never was in his life, he may be convicted of a conspiracy in any county where any one act was done to further the object of that conspiracy, as was the case in Rex v. Bowes.* I do not mean to aver that in that case one of the defendants had never been in the county of Middlesex, but it would have made no difference if it had been so, as some of the conspirators in that case had no active interference whatever in any thing that was done in the county of Middlesex; but they were all convicted of a conspiracy in that county, where some acts were committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. So where false papers, as vouchers for the payment of money, were sent from one part of the kingdom by one man and presented in the county of Middlesex by another, this delivery was held to be sufficient to support an indictment in that county; I refer to the case of the King v. Brisac, 4 East, 164; for the indictment in that case stated the fact to have been committed in the county of Middlesex because the vouchers were produced to the officers of government in that county, although these very vouchers were made out on the sea coast in Scotland.

Lord Ellenborough.—In Shetland.

Mr. Abbott.—Yes, my lord; and they were transmitted from thence, by a person who was innocent of the fraud, to this county, to be presented here for payment; and they were presented accordingly to the clerks of the public office here. The chief defendant himself had done no act whatever in this county towards effecting that conspiracy, nor did any part of the transaction but the delivery take place in this county. But although the defendants had not themselves done any thing here, they had caused the act of presenting the vouchers to be done here, which was in effect the same as if they had done it themselves, and that was held sufficient to support an indictment for a conspiracy in the county of Middlesex. For your lordships held that the act of the agent of the conspirators done by their direction in furtherance of their conspiracy was their act, and although the agent was innocent for he thought the vouchers genuine and presented them as such, yet it was a guilty act in the conspirators for they knew they were not genuine.

There is another case, the King against Munton,* a public officer of the island of Antigua. He had transmitted accounts of receipts and expenditures to an agent of his in this country; they were delivered I think at the Custom-house; he himself at the time of their delivery was at Antigua, but on his return to England he was tried, convicted, and received judgment in London; although he was not in London but at Antigua at the time every act was done on which his prosecution was founded. There was another case, just now mentioned to me by my learned friend Mr. Burrough. Some time ago there was a prosecution against a person for a libel on lord Portsmouth, written abroad and received in Lincoln's-in-fields; the person who sent that libel from the continent came here afterwards himself; and he was prosecuted and convicted. That was the case of the King v. Scilay.†

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—I do not recollect from what part of the world the libel in that case was sent, it was from some part of the continent.

Mr. Burrough.—I believe from Switzerland; but I am sure it was from some part of the continent.

Lord Ellenborough.—I believe all that appeared in that case as to the place from which it was sent, was the date of the libel; the evidence only went to prove that it was received in Lincoln's-inn-fields.

Mr. Abbott.—Any person may be tried,

* 1 Esp. N. P. C. 60, 2nd edit.

† I am not aware that this case has ever been reported. Mr. Henry Dealtry, from whom in the progress of this work I have received much valuable assistance, tells me it appears by the proceedings in the Crown-office, that in the month of September 1802 a writ of Certiorari issued to the justices for the county of Middlesex, to remove into the court of King's-bench an indictment found before them against Jean Scilay for sending an anonymous letter to the earl of Portsmouth to extort money from him on pretence of his having committed sodomy with him (Scilay). On December 7th, 1802, Scilay was tried before lord Ellenborough at the sittings for the county of Middlesex, in Westminster-hall, and convicted; and having absconded, he was out-lawed in Trinity vacation following.

even for a capital offence, in a county in which he never was. As, if a person deliver to an infant or to a lunatic poison to be by that infant or insane person administered to another, which poison is administered in consequence of being so delivered, your lordships very well know, that the person who so delivers the poison originally, is a principal in the murder of him to whom it is administered, although it may be administered in a county in which such person never had been, 1 Hale's P. C. 431. He must ex necessitate be considered as present in that county, or go altogether unpunished. The indictment not only may but must be laid in the county where the poison was administered, and it is utterly impossible that it should be otherwise.

My lords, I have but little to add. This case has in another part of the United Kingdom undergone a great deal of discussion; and the topics which are before your lordships this day were there amply and learnedly investigated. I do not find that any of the learned judges had any doubt upon this subject,—at least I have no account of it, but the words of one of them upon that occasion are so apposite that I will read them to your lordships, and then close my address. I allude to the judgment of Mr. Baron Maclelland on the writ of Habeas Corpus in the court of Exchequer of Ireland.

"It has been urged," said that learned person, "by the prisoner's counsel, that the prisoner cannot be tried in England on the indictment, and should, therefore, be now discharged, in as much, say they, as he is not amenable to the laws of England, for an act done there by his influence and procurement, while he resided in Ireland. This position is too absurd to be combated: it would set at nought the principles and ties which bind the two countries together, and would hold out the greatest encouragement to crimes by the impunity it would afford. No authority has been quoted in support of it; and, I conceive, I should ill discharge the duties of my office, if I yielded to the confident assertion of such a principle,—a principle, which, if acted on, would go little short of separating the two countries. I will only say this: that every subject of the empire is bound, by his allegiance to the crown, to obey the laws of the empire; he is bound not to infringe the laws of any part of it, either by actually committing an illegal act, or procuring it to be done in any part of the empire. If he does so, he acts at his peril, and he must answer for it."

If any man, either by his own illegal act or by the act of any other procured by him, does that which is an indictable offence, he is punishable for it by indictment. This gentleman has, during his residence in Ireland, done, or caused and procured to be done, such an act in Middlesex; that is, he has caused and procured the libel in question to be published in this country, and he must therefore answer for it to the laws of this country. Let him then plead Not Guilty to the charge, and I am confident that every person here will be happy if, in the event of the trial, he shall be able to convince the world that such a publication as we complain of by this indictment did not proceed from him.

Mr. Richardson.—I am to solicit your lordships' attention on behalf of the defendant, and to support this plea. I have observed my learned friend taking a great deal of trouble to establish a proposition, which I have neither interest nor inclination to controvert; namely, that a person resident in one county may cause an act to be done in another; and I admit that there is a physical possibility of this being true of two kingdoms; namely, that a person resident in one kingdom may cause an act to be done in another; but I deny that the same consequences follow in two kingdoms as follow in the case of two counties in the same kingdom. I admit that where a person resident in one county causes an act to be done in another county, he may be punished by indictment in the county where the act is done, being in the same kingdom, because they are then under one and the same law. But where the same principle is applied to two kingdoms, governed by different laws, the case is otherwise; for I submit to your lordships, that to give jurisdiction to a court to punish a man for any act he has done, that act must not only be locally done within the jurisdiction of that court, but it must also be done by a person bound at that time to obey that law by which he is to be punished.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—What is your proposition?

Mr. Richardson.—That to give jurisdiction to a court to punish a man there must be not only an act cognizable by that Court, but it must be committed by a person bound at the time, to obey the laws which make that act criminal; and I mean humbly to contend before your lordships, that this defendant, being a native of Ireland, resident in his own country, was not at the time when these imputed offences are supposed to have been committed, bound to obey the laws of England.

And, my lords, in order to establish this proposition, I will consider, first, how the matter would have stood, if instead of being an Irishman, this defendant had been a Russian or a Chinese, or the subject of any other foreign state, resident in his native country; and secondly, I will endeavour to show that his being an Irishman makes no difference whatever from the case of any foreigner. Now, my lords, without entering into any theory on the origin of government, I admit that the laws of any particular state have an effective operation, and are binding upon the subjects of that state. The doctrine more generally received in modern days with respect to the obligation of subjects to obey laws, is that such obligation depends on a contract express or implied between the government and its subjects; that is, between the government and every person who is to be governed, whose conduct is to be regulated and judged of by that law to which by such contract he has assented. If this, which is the received theory at present, be true, no obligation by which a man may be bound to obey the laws of one kingdom can bind him to obey those of another.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—I rather think there is a variety of opinions on that theoretical and speculative question; I mean the question whether government be founded on any supposed contract between the governors and the governed. It is a question on which I believe there is a good deal of difference among the writers of the present day.

Mr. Richardson.—I do not mean to entangle your lordships or myself with an inquiry into the grounds of this or any other theory; the result of them all will answer my purpose; namely, that the law of a particular state is a rule of conduct for the subjects of that state only. That the civil law of any particular country is not obligatory on any other country is to be found in the definition of civil law by the highest authority. This is set forth in the Institutes of Justinian (book 1, tit. 2d, § 1,)* whose words are “Jus autem civile à jure gentium distinguitur, quòd omnes populi qui legibus et moribus utuntur partim suo proprio partim communi omnium jure utuntur. Nam quod quisque populus ipsi sibi jus constituit, id ipsius proprium civitatis est, vocaturque Jus Civile, quasi Jus Proprium Ipsius Civitatis.”

My lords, this obligation is binding on the natives of every country, and must bind them for ever; they can never shake it off: but as to those who are not natives, the obligation binds them during the time of their residence alone, and while they are commorant in the country by the laws of which they are protected. The native is invested with all his country's rights at the moment of his birth; as his birth-right he receives the protection of his country when it is most essential to his continuance in being, when he is most helpless and standing most in need of such protection; he therefore never can shake off that native and original obedience to the laws. But there is also a local and a temporary obedience due from persons who voluntarily reside in a country of which they are not natives, who claim the protection of the laws of the state, and who while they receive that protection are bound to pay obedience to such laws, but no longer†. That doctrine is laid down by Mr. Justice Blackstone, and indeed is so generally received that nobody I believe disputes it. The doctrine itself is laid down most clearly in the first book of the Commentaries of that able writer, chapter 10, p. 370, in which he says that protection and obedience are correlative terms, for without protection there can be no obedience. The words of Mr. Justice Blackstone are “Local allegiance is such as is due from an alien or stranger born, for so long time as he continues within the king's dominion and protection; and it ceases the instant such stranger transfers himself from this kingdom to another.”

The same principle is thus expressed by my lord Coke in Calvin's case, 7 Rep. 5, a, “Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectionio protectionem.”

And, my lords, I say it is not merely the local presence of a man which will make him subject to the laws of a country or bound to obey them, but there must be also a protection received from such laws; otherwise presence alone will not be sufficient. And that appears from the determination in Perkin Warbeck's case mentioned in Calvin's case, 7 Coke, 6, b. That was a case which occurred in the 15 H. 7; and my lord Coke states it in this manner; that Warbeck being an alien, and born in Flanders, pretended to be one of the sons of Edward the Fourth, and invaded the realm with great power with intent to take upon himself the dignity royal, &c. He was taken in war, and it was resolved by the justices that he was not punishable by the common law, but before the constable and marshal who by special commission tried him according to martial law; which I merely state to show that protection is essential to submission in the case of a foreigner, before he can be bound by the law of a state.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—He invaded the country and came with great power and force hostilely.

Mr. Richardson.—Yes, my lords; but if the definition of the civil law be just (and it strikes every man's understanding I believe, it certainly strikes mine, as being a just definition), it extends only to the members of a particular state, and not to those of another state during their residence abroad. It is the rule which a state prescribes ipsi sibi, to itself and not to others: it is the Jus proprium ipsius civitatis,—the law belonging to that very state, and not to any other.

I say, my lords, it follows from these principles, that a foreigner resident out of this country cannot be punished in England for an act done here, though the act may be contrary to the law of England; because he owes no obedience to that law, he not being in England at the time when the act was committed.

I would illustrate this position by a reference to the revenue laws. There are various revenue laws of different foreign states as well as of our own; and they have frequently come incidentally under the consideration of our courts—particularly in cases upon policies of insurance; a question has been made whether an English subject ought to pay obedience to the revenue laws of a foreign state; and it has been uniformly held that we are not bound to take notice of any revenue laws of any foreign state, and further that if persons bound to pay obedience to the revenue laws of a foreign state (as for instance the subjects of that state) were to enter into a contract with any subjects of England contrary to such revenue laws of such foreign state, that contract is good in England, and if entered into bonâ fide it may be enforced here, although it be in contravention of the revenue laws of the country, the subjects of which are parties to such contract. That doctrine was laid down by lord Mansfield in several cases; I will refer your lordships to only one or two of them. One is Planché against Fletcher, Doug. 251, and the other Lever v. Fletcher, London sittings, Hilary Term, 1780, Park's Insur. 237. Lord Mansfield laid it down broadly, that no country pays any attention to the revenue laws of another.

* Vide Puffend. L. of N. and N. b. 2, c. 3, s. 23.

Lord Ellenborough.—That is only that we do not enforce foreign laws of revenue in England: they must have their revenue as they can; but we will not punish the subjects of foreign states for breaches of their revenue laws.

Mr. Richardson.—That is, my lords, no country in fact pays any attention to the revenue laws of another state.

My lords, I say if this be a principle recognized in our courts of law, we must of course allow the same indulgence to foreigners with regard to the revenue laws of our own country. Now, my lords, by the revenue laws of England and by our laws for the protection of trade, numerous offences are created, and they who commit them are punishable by the criminal law of England which is thus applied to acts perfectly innocent every where else. To mention one instance out of many, to export wool is by the stat. 13th and 14th Car. 2nd, c. 18, s. 11, declared to be a public nuisance. Now an English subject concerned in the exportation of wool might under this statute be indicted for a misdemeanor; but suppose this exportation is made in consequence of an order received from a Dutchman resident at Amsterdam; in that case, as there are no accessories in misdemeanor, he would unquestionably be a principal; and if he had been an Englishman resident at Yarmouth, and had given that order, though the execution of the order might have taken place in the county of Sussex, he might be indicted for the misdemeanor in Sussex; but, my lords, will it be contended that a Dutchman, who I say owes no obedience to our law, would be answerable for a breach of it? It certainly will not. But it would be binding on a British subject in whom there is a presumption of knowledge of the law, which by the way is sufficiently severe and sometimes harsh even against the native subjects of a country when its laws become complicated. But still they are offenders against a known law or at least a law presumed to be known; but that rule could not, upon any principle of reason, be said to affect a Dutchman as to whom no such presumption can exist; and if that Dutchman or any other foreigner who had so acted and been instrumental in infringing upon the laws of England should happen afterwards to visit his friends here, would he become subject to arrest and imprisonment for what he had, innocently as to the laws of his own country, done while he was there, unconscious that an act innocent in itself was made criminal by our law? I contend before your lordships that he certainly would not.

But perhaps my learned friend will say, there is a difference between such things as are mala prohibita and such as are mala in se, for such a distinction does appear to be recognized in some cases. That distinction was recognized in a well known decision by a very learned judge; I allude to the case of Moliere in Fost. 128, which was that of a French prisoner of war, who had been indicted for privately stealing in a shop; and Mr. Justice Foster, before whom the case came on to be tried at the assizes, stated to the jury, it would be improper to convict such a person of the capital part of the charge by the law of England which made private stealing in a shop a capital offence, because it was too much to presume that the prisoner knew that to be the law; and he left it to the jury to convict him, not upon the statute, but upon the common law.

Mr. Justice Grose.—But how could he be convicted on any thing but the statute which created the offence for which he was indicted?

Lord Ellenborough.—How the birth-place of the offender could create any difference in the nature of the offence defined by law, I cannot conceive; nor can any body else, I believe; I hope that case will not be considered as deserving the sanction of the Court; it certainly is not law.

Mr. Justice Grose.—That was only the humane decision of a single judge, actuated at the time by his feelings, under singular circumstances; but the law of that decision has never been sanctioned.

Lord Ellenborough.—The offence was, privately stealing in a shop; and the circumstance of the prisoner's birth could assuredly make no difference.

Mr. Richardson.—I was going to contend, that there could be no such distinction, and that the distinction between malum in se and malum prohibitum is not a legal,* but merely a moral distinction. My principle is this; that a foreign subject, resident in his own country, owes no obedience whatever to the municipal laws of another country. I say, the just principle is, that he owes obedience to no laws but those of his own country.

Lord Ellenborough.—Except where his actions may contravene the ordinances of his own country, or be hostile to its interests by disturbing or endangering the amity of a foreign power; for that amity may be lost by his disobedience of some of the laws of a foreign state.

Mr. Richardson.—It is not necessary for me to inquire how far he may be punishable in his own country for such acts, considered as offences against the duty which he owes to his own state. Possibly there may be such cases by the law of nations, or by some positive and particular provisions of the laws of some foreign states. I am only saying, that, generally speaking, no man owes obedience to the laws of any other country than his own.

Lord Ellenborough.—You put the point with perfect distinctness most unquestionably.

Mr. Richardson.—I say, my lords, that unless it can be shown, that the laws of all countries punish all acts that are mala in se in the same manner, and up to the same extent, it is impossible to say that the subject of one country, even for an act which is malum in se, can be amenable to the laws of another. But that is not the case; no, not even in murder, which is certainly as much malum in se as any act that can be committed. Suppose all nations had agreed that murder should be punished with a year's imprisonment at least, it would then be a punishment established by the law of nations to that extent, though the laws of particular states might go a great deal farther; and then it would be legal every where to punish a man for murder with one year's imprisonment; but no farther could it be carried against a foreigner. But, my lords, that is clearly not the case; and in every case of criminal inquiry, the subject-matter is considered as punishable, not because it is malum in se, but because it is malum prohibitum. In prosecutions, the whole course of inquiry, and the whole measure of punishment, are dependent on the law of the state, and every act is considered with reference to the positive institutions of the civil law. But, my lords, states have not agreed on the extent of punishment even of murder itself; if there be such a distinction, even in the case of murder, as considers that crime malum in se, and every where punishable as such—

Lord Ellenborough.—That is not universally so, certainly; for in some countries, the exposure of infants to wild beasts takes place, and in others human beings are destroyed when they are supposed to be useless, because they are past labour. I do not know of any crime being punished merely on account of its being malum in se; if there be any such instance, I am not aware of its existence.

Mr. Richardson.—I am humbly contending that there is not; and certainly if there be, libel, which is the offence stated in this indictment, is one to which that principle is the least applicable. The law of libel, especially in England, is matter of positive institution, and embraces a great number of peculiarities, which are not to be found in any law of any other country, nor in any other branch of the law of this country. There is a direct and remarkable distinction in the law of England, as it applies to the case of libel, considered civilly and considered criminally; namely, that the truth of the matter makes the defendant innocent in the former case; but affords perhaps no mitigation, certainly no justification, in the latter. So clear and so strong is that distinction, that the truth of a libel can never become matter of proof on a criminal charge; but when made the subject of civil inquiry, as where the party injured sues for damages, in consequence of the publication of a libel the case is otherwise; for instance, if I happen to know of a particular felony having been committed by any individual, and I communicate that fact in a letter to a friend, and the person of whom my letter speaks brings an action against me for libel, I may justify the libel, and take upon myself to prove the truth of it. If, on the trial of the issue, it shall be found that what was contained in the alleged libel is true, the defendant will obtain a verdict, and the plaintiff being thus declared to be guilty of the felony, may be committed to take his trial for the same;* but this takes place only because he has preferred a civil remedy to a criminal prosecution; because if he had proceeded against me by indictment, I should inevitably have incurred the punishment of a libeller; for I should then not be allowed to prove the truth of the allegations of my letter.

Lord Ellenborough.—I have heard of that case—the commitment of a plaintiff who brought his action for slander, charging him with felony, where there was a justification, and a verdict given for the defendant; and that the plaintiff was committed for trial for felony on that finding. I say I have heard of such a case, but never knew of one. I never knew of the finding of twelve men against a plaintiff, complaining in a civil suit that he had been charged wrongfully as a felon, being equivalent to finding a bill of indictment. I have heard of the occurrence of cases in which the verdict against such a plaintiff has produced his committal for trial for the felony, the verdict being tantamount to the finding a bill of indictment by a grand jury; but I have never been able to find such case.

Mr. Justice Grose.—I remember a case at Bristol, before Mr. Justice Yates, in which a defendant obtained a verdict on a plea of justification charging the plaintiff with being a horse-stealer. Mr. Justice Yates doubted whether he could commit the plaintiff as a horse-stealer; he consulted Mr. Dunning, then recorder of Bristol, when it was held that Mr. Recorder had the proper jurisdiction; and that was the answer which he made to Mr. Justice Yates's question. Nothing took place upon this, because there was a doubt entertained by Mr. Dunning, who claimed the jurisdiction, although Mr. Justice Yates was one of the judges of the court of King's-bench, and had jurisdiction over all England.

Mr. Richardson.—There was a case before lord Loughborough, of Harman against Norton, where such a doctrine was, as I understand, admitted; but the plaintiff avoided being committed by retiring from the court.

Lord Ellenborough.—I do not believe that any thing has actually occurred, in our time at least, if at any time, that has settled this point. I remember being told, at an early period of my life, that a case of this kind had occurred before Mr. Justice Gould at York, where a man had been tried on a commitment, after a justification upon words calling him a felon, and he had a verdict against him upon an action for slander. The plaintiff in that case was committed for the felony, upon the jury finding a verdict for the defendant upon his justification. But upon inquiry into the truth of the matter, I never could find out that any such case had occurred: I rather think that all such cases are sent before a grand jury. However, that is collateral to the case now in question.

Mr. Richardson.—What might be the particular consequence of such a case, it is immaterial to discuss at present; but there is this difference between the criminal and the civil law of England in a technical point of view; that in the one case the truth of the matter complained of may be proved, in the other it cannot.

Lord Ellenborough.—You do not state that the criminal common law of England and of Ireland are different in that respect; but I may derange the order in which you intend to proceed. I beg, therefore, that you will pursue your argument according to the course you have laid down for yourself.

Mr. Richardson.—If I have been successful in establishing, that a foreigner, while he has no protection under the laws of England, cannot be found guilty of an offence against its revenue laws, it follows, as of course, that he cannot be found guilty of any offence against its libel laws, or indeed against any of its laws, except he should be resident in England. For, he can owe no obedience where he receives no protection: so that, as a foreigner not resident here, none of his actions can be deemed criminal by our law, because he is not bound to obey our law.

I now proceed, my lords, to consider whether there be any difference in this respect between the case of an Irishman, residing in his native land, and that of any other person who is not subject to the laws of England.

My lords, in Ireland there prevails a system of jurisprudence, consisting of written and unwritten maxims and institutions, which compose, in effect, the same system of jurisprudence as that which prevails in England. They are, in truth, the same written and unwritten maxims, and the same institutions; but that proves no more, than that the system is in force in England as the common law of England, and is in force in Ireland as the common law of Ireland. The circumstance of the two countries having adopted the same principles of jurisprudence, the same maxims and institutions, can make no difference in this case, nor can it have any influence on this question; it is the same thing as if the present defendant, instead of being an Irishman, had been a native of Scotland, in which country we all know a totally different system of law there prevails.

My lords, it is matter of curious, and perhaps difficult historical research, to discover how the present laws of Ireland became its laws. We have high authority for believing that they came originally from England; my lord Coke says, that the laws of England were adopted as the laws of Ireland by the parliament of Ireland (Co. Lit. 141, b.); and he grounds this opinion on two patents of Henry 3rd; the one in the 11th, the other in the 18th year of his reign. In the first of these, king Henry states, that his father, king John, in the 12th year of his reign, went into Ireland, and carried with him "discretos viros, et legis peritos" (discreet and wise men, learned in the laws) "quorum communi concilio et ad instantiam Hibernensium statuit et præcepit leges Anglicanas in Hiberniâ;" and again, in 18 Henry 3rd, it is stated, that king John, "de communi omnium de Hiberniâ consensu," ordained, that Ireland should be governed by the laws of England (Co. Lit. 141, b.)

Lord chief justice Vaughan thinks my lord Coke was mistaken about that (Vaughan, 294), and is of opinion, "that there was no consent of the Irish parliament."

Be that as it may; it is nothing to me whether it was by parliamentary consent, or by any other means, that the laws of England were adopted in Ireland. Perhaps it may have been by the law of conquest, which was then recent, that the common law of England was given to Ireland; for "conquest" (your lordships know) "creates a legitimate right to give law to the conquered in all Christian land;" Calvin's Case, 7 Co. 5a, 17b; where it is laid down, "that if a king come to a Christian kingdom by conquest, he may at his pleasure alter and change the laws of that kingdom; but until he alters those laws, the ancient laws of that kingdom remain." But whether the law of England was given to Ireland by conquest, or accepted by the parliament, which is now matter of historical curiosity, or antiquarian learning, there is no ground or pretence for saying, that the laws of England, as the laws of England, are in force in Ireland. They are in force in Ireland as the laws of Ireland; whether by adoption or by conquest, or by use and custom, or by whatever means, no matter; they are in force in Ireland, not because they are the laws of England, but because they are the laws of Ireland.

Then perhaps it may be said, that Ireland continued for a great length of time a subordinate and dependent kingdom. My lords, it was so to a certain extent, and unquestionably the right of legislation for Ireland was exercised by the parliament of England, and afterwards by the parliament of Great Britain; that is to say, by the parliament of England before, and by the parliament of Great Britain after the union between England and Scotland. It was so de facto; and while the statute 6 Geo. 1st, c. 5, continued in force, that was the law, at least that was received as the law on this side the water. But it is well known that that law* was dissented from by the inhabitants of the sister kingdom, and by subsequent acts of parliament was totally changed.

The stat. 6 Geo. c. 5, after reciting the assumption of jurisdiction by the Irish House of Lords to examine and correct the judgments of Irish courts, declares "that the kingdom of Ireland hath been, is, and of right ought to be subordinate unto and dependent upon the imperial crown of Great Britain, as being inseparably united and annexed thereto," and that the British legislature hath power to legislate for the kingdom and people of Ireland; and further declares and enacts that the Irish House of Lords hath not any jurisdiction to affirm or reverse decrees or judgments of any courts in Ireland.

This statute was uneasily borne by the people of Ireland till the year 1782, when by stat. 22nd, Geo. 3rd, c. 53, after reciting that the former statute (stating its title) had been passed, it was enacted that that statute, and the several matters and things therein contained shall be and is and are hereby repealed.†

This method of simply repealing a declaratory statute was not satisfactory to the inhabitants of the other side of the water; and therefore to make the matter more clear, and to render the independence of Ireland complete the 23rd Geo. 3rd, c. 28‡ was passed, for the purpose (as is expressed in the title) of removing and preventing all doubts which had arisen or might arise concerning the exclusive right of the parliament and courts of Ireland in matters of legislation and judicature and for preventing any writ of error or appeal from any of his majesty's courts in that kingdom from being received, heard, and adjudged in any of his majesty's courts in the kingdom of Great Britain.

This act of parliament being very short I will take the liberty of reading it to your lordships:

"Whereas by an act of the last session of this present parliament (entitled An Act to repeal an Act made in the sixth Year of the Reign of his late Majesty King George the first, entitled an Act for the better securing the Dependency of the Kingdom of Ireland upon the Crown of Great Britain) it was enacted, That the said last-mentioned act and all matters and things therein contained should be repealed: and whereas doubts have arisen whether the provisions of the said act are sufficient to secure to the people of Ireland the rights claimed by them to be bound only by laws enacted by his majesty and the parliament of that kingdom in all cases whatever, and to have all actions and suits at law or in equity which may be instituted in that kingdom decided in his majesty's courts therein finally and without appeal from thence: therefore for removing all doubts respecting the same it is declared and enacted that the said right claimed by the people of Ireland to be bound only by laws enacted by his majesty and the parliament of that kingdom in all cases whatever, and to have all actions and suits at law or in equity which may be instituted in that kingdom decided in his majesty's courts therein finally and without appeal from thence, shall be and it is hereby declared to be established and ascertained for ever, and shall at no time hereafter be questioned or questionable."

And by s. 2 no writ of error or appeal from Ireland shall be received or adjudged in any court in England.

My lords, language can hardly be found stronger than that which was used on this occasion, to express the complete independence of the legislature of Ireland on that of Great Britain; for the subjects of Ireland are, to all intents and purposes, to be bound by the legislature of Ireland and not by the legislature of Great Britain; so that here we have two distinct, separate, and independent kingdoms.

The language of this statute was so strong that it might have excited a question, whether the former laws enacted by the parliament of England were not repealed by it; and indeed great alarms were felt in Ireland by persons whose titles to their estates depended on private acts of the British legislature.

Lord Ellenborough.—That produced a quieting act upon the subject.

Mr. Richardson.—It produced an Irish act of parliament in the ensuing session to give validity to such titles.

* A division took place in the House of Commons on one of the stages of the bill for securing the dependency of Ireland: the numbers were 140 to 83, Vide 7 New Parl. Hist. 643.

† Concerning this statute see 22 New Parl. Hist., p. 1241, 1264, 1266; 23 New Parl. Hist., 16, 35, 91.

‡ See 23 New Parl. Hist., 322, 325, 730, 735.

My lords, I say that whatever might have been the law, or whatever doubts might have existed as to what the law was, before the passing of these acts of parliament, it cannot now be questioned that the legislature of Ireland was, at that time, become as independent of the legislature of Great Britain, as that of Scotland was before the union of England with Scotland. Neither can it be a question that the laws of England are in force in Ireland, because they are the laws of Ireland and not because they are the laws of England. And so far from any argument to the contrary arising out of the act of union between Great Britain and Ireland, that I think a very strong confirmation of the doctrine arises out of that act.

My lords, it appears from the manner in which that great political event took place, that the two legislatures treated with each other on terms of the most perfect equality: they severally considered their separate advantages, and they acted for their mutual interest; they agreed like two contracting parties with one another, on terms of independence and equality for their mutual good. By these terms the legislature became one and the same for both, not that the legislature is either English or Irish, for the one is merged as much as the other into a mass compounded of both, called the united parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which neither the one country nor the other gives up, on the contrary each retains its laws; and by the eighth article of the Act of Union, it is expressly declared that all laws in force at the time of the Union, and all courts within the respective kingdoms, shall remain as before;—that they shall all remain as by law established at the time of the Union [Here the learned gentleman read the 8th article of the Act of Union].

That the laws of England and those of Ireland have by the Act of Union been kept independent is quite clear. No Englishman will admit that he is subject to the laws of Ireland, nor will any Irishman admit that he is subject to the laws of England, otherwise than as may be hereafter enacted by the united parliament, in which both are represented; for in fact the several laws and statutes of the two countries are studiously and industriously preserved. The Union therefore makes no difference whatever in the question, which is now exactly the same as if it had arisen the year before the Union took place.

My lords, there certainly are some privileges to which an Irishman is entitled and which cannot be claimed by any person who is not a native of the king's dominions. An Irishman is not born out of the pale of allegiance to the king; an Irishman is not an alien or incapable of holding offices of trust under the Crown in this country; he certainly may hold any, although an alien cannot; but that rests upon another principle, and it is the same principle upon which the law of treason rests.

The case of Calvin was argued with great superfluity of learning, and by it was decided, that it was not the country, but the personal tie by which a man was bound to his prince, which constituted allegiance. The object of allegiance is the person of the prince, and not his corporate capacity; and therefore if a monarch has several distinct kingdoms subject to him, and they are governed by several and distinct laws, however independent these kingdoms or states may be of each other, there is but one allegiance for them all, and the object of that allegiance is the person of the prince. Treason therefore is an offence solely against the person of the sovereign. But, my lords, we are here upon a question of a mere misdemeanor, in which the laws have studiously preserved a distinction from the crime of treason. There is great difference between the allegiance due to the king, and the obedience due to the laws of any part of his dominions, of which the other parts of his dominions are independent; which distinction is recognized in Calvin's case throughout. Allegiance to the king of the united British empire is as much due from a Scotsman as from an Englishman, but no obedience is due from a Scotsman, resident in his native land, to the laws of England. "He that hath abjured the realm, oweth to the king allegiance, who may pardon him, and restore him to his country again, amittit regnum, sed non regem; amittit patriam, sed non patrem patriæ; but in the case of a misdemeanor the defendant must be punished because he owed obedience to the law which made this an offence:" and here I submit to your lordships that the defendant owed no such obedience.

But my friend says that it is a principle of law that every plea to the jurisdiction of a court must point out some other court by which the party can be tried; surely he does not by that observation mean any court in England; because I contend that no court whatever here has jurisdiction to try this case. My friend's argument can only apply to cases where the question of jurisdiction arises between different courts of this country, not where the objection extends to all our courts. If a foreigner, on arriving in England, were indicted for having, during his residence abroad, directed the exportation of wool from hence, it would be sufficient for him to plead to the jurisdiction without pointing out any court competent to try him in his own country, for that would be impossible, the act charged not being an offence in any country but England. Suppose, antecedent to the statute of 28 H. 8, for punishing murders committed abroad, a person had been indicted for a murder alleged to have been committed at Paris, would it not have been competent to the defendant in such case, to plead to the jurisdiction of the court, that the offence, if any, was committed where the court had no jurisdiction? The nature of the thing proves that no English court could have tried a man upon such an accusation.

Lord Ellenborough.—That is rather too large a proposition; for the court of parliament may try for offences committed in any part of the United Kingdom, as in the case of lord Strafford for treason in Ireland; or within the other dominions of his majesty, such as the East Indies.

Mr. Richardson.—That applies to peers of parliament, who are constructively resident in England as advisers of the Crown.

Lord Ellenborough.—Mr. Hastings was no peer of parliament: I only state this to show that your proposition is not true to the extent to which you would lay it down as applicable to the present case.

Mr. Richardson.—The objection here is, that the offence, if any, is altogether foreign to the law of England—that it is no offence against the law of England. When I state, by this plea, that the act complained of as an offence, is the act of a person who owes no obedience to the law of England, that is a sufficient plea to oust the jurisdiction of the courts of England: this plea states that the person so charged with having committed the act, is amenable only to the law, and triable only by the courts of the country where he was born and where he resided.

My learned friend stated a supposed case of a native of Bristol as analogous to this; but my learned friend, after hearing my argument, and adverting to the principles on which it is founded, will not press that point, for it has no bearing upon the case in the way in which I take it up in argument. I do not set up any local jurisdiction in this kingdom against that of this Court; but I say that the party here charged, is, with reference to the laws of England, to all intents and purposes a foreigner; that, at the time the act is charged to have been committed by him, he owed no obedience whatever to the laws of England; and that therefore he committed no offence for which he can be accountable to the laws of England.

My learned friend stated the case of a conspiracy where the party was indicted, convicted, and punished here, although he himself had done no act in the county where the venue was laid. My lords, these are cases in which no question arises or can arise, as to the jurisdiction of the court, unless the party accused in these cases stood in the situation in which the present defendant stands, namely, the being a native of another country—a foreigner as to the laws of this—the being at the time he is charged with having committed this supposed offence against the laws of England, resident in another and that other his native country.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—The question of the jurisdiction of the court was pressed in the case of the King v. Brisac & Scott.

Mr. Richardson.—Not in a manner similar to this; for there the defendant pleaded the general issue, and an act in furtherance of his crime was proved to be done in the county of Middlesex.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—There was no question made on the ground of that defendant being a native of a different part of the kingdom.

Mr. Richardson.—In that case there was no question similar to the question in the present. It was there only contended that there was no act of conspiracy proved to have been committed in the county of Middlesex; that Brisac being at sea, he could not do any thing in this county; but no question at all was made whether or not that defendant owed obedience to the laws of England.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—Certainly not.

Mr. Richardson.—There is no case in which it is held that any foreigner may be made amenable to the laws of England, for a conspiracy to carry any purpose into effect in England, while that foreigner is resident in his own country; and I submit to your lordships, it cannot be, because he owes no obedience to the laws by which that is made an offence.

My lords, the circumstance of the similarity, or even if it were so the identity of the laws of England and Ireland, makes no real, although it may make an apparent difference in the case; and therefore the force of our objection to the jurisdiction of this court does not at first sight appear to advantage or to be so powerful as it will on closer inspection; or as for instance if the question had arisen between England and Scotland. Suppose that the publication charged by this indictment to be a libel had made its appearance in Edinburgh instead of Westminster; the principle contended for by my learned friend would be the same, but there the party must be tried not by the laws of England but by those of Scotland; and there would be a very different species of punishment in case of conviction.

Lord Ellenborough.—I believe deportation.

Mr. Richardson.—Yes, my lord. He would be subject to a punishment unknown to the law of England, by the law of a country with which he cannot be supposed to have any acquaintance.

With respect, my lords, to the statement of my learned friend that the subject matter of this plea would be more properly a defence under the general issue, I beg to remind my friend that in the case of the Kinlochs* it was determined that the question of jurisdiction could not be raised upon the general issue.

My lords, the motive of the honourable gentleman, whom I have the honour to represent before your lordships, for taking this course, is not that he dreads the investigation of this subject here or any where; but he thinks,—and I confess, as it appears to me, fairly thinks,—he ought to have the benefit of a trial in the country where he lives, where he is well known and eminently regarded, for he has a number of witnesses as well to his innocence as to the proof of an excellent character who are resident in Ireland where he has long and ably filled an important station. It is not to be doubted, that if it be true that he did compose this publication in Ireland, he might be subject to punishment there, on proof of the fact. I do not deny that the fact, which I say cannot be inquired of in the county of Middlesex, may be inquired of in Ireland, where this gentleman indisputably was during the whole time this indictment states him to have written, composed, and published the supposed libel in question; and although I have a confident hope that if necessary he will establish his innocence, still if found guilty he might be punished in Ireland. But I must not omit to observe, that the course which has been taken, by instituting proceedings here, has subjected him to considerable inconvenience; for at the time when this indictment was exhibited, he had no means of commanding the attendance of witnesses here, nor are there any such means at present. There is I understand a bill* now before the legislature which is intended to make some provision for that case, of which however we can as yet take no notice; but if he should have a compulsory process for the attendance of such witnesses as he may think necessary to examine to establish his case, nobody can doubt that the expense must be very considerable—of itself a serious punishment, as applied to the case of this honorable gentleman, under all its attendant circumstances,—an expense of itself more burthensome than the effect even of a conviction in his own country; to say nothing of the inconvenience of bringing persons of high station the distance of four hundred miles over sea. I do not mean that the argumentum ab inconvenienti is conclusive against the rules of law, but these are the grounds which have induced him to press his objections to a trial here, and to ask your lordships whether he may not have the benefit of a trial in his native country; which, to a person standing in his situation, may be a great benefit for there he will be tried before persons to whom he is well known, and where he can vindicate his character without the expense which this course of proceeding entails upon him, and which to a person of moderate fortune would be absolute ruin. On these grounds I submit our case to your lordships and humbly pray that this plea may be established.

Mr. Abbott† in reply said, that the argument ab inconvenienti could not be admitted where the law was clear. That the principal arguments resolved themselves into an objection, that an Irishman was to be considered as an alien with respect to the laws of England, for which no authority had been or could be cited; for there was no character or privilege belonging to a subject of this country which did not belong to an Irishman, both at home and abroad. Then, if protection and obedience are co-relative, as the defendant has every protection and benefit which the law of England can bestow, he must owe obedience to that law. If an Irishman were libelled by a subject of this country, he would have his redress; but the law of England would not punish an Englishman for libelling a foreigner residing abroad, except so far as it might be considered to be a state-offence in interrupting the harmony between the two countries, if in amity with each other. And this is also a charge of a libel upon the king's administration of government in Ireland. And in answer to the case of the Kinloch's, he observed that Mr. Justice Foster* was finally of opinion that the prisoners might, if it had been well founded, have availed themselves of the objection to the jurisdiction, on the general plea of Not Guilty.

Court of King's-bench, July 1, 1805.

Lord Ellenborough, C. J.—This is an indictment charging the defendant with the publication of a libel at Westminster in the county of Middlesex; to which the defendant has pleaded that before and since the Union of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, Ireland had been and yet is governed by its proper statutes and laws, and not by the statutes and laws of England; and that in Ireland there are courts competent for the trial of all offences committed by the natives of Ireland during their residence there. The plea then proceeds to state, that the defendant was born in Ireland, and that the writings, in the indictment called libels, are concerning things which took place in Ireland after the first of November, 1802, whilst he the defendant was resident in Ireland; and concludes to the jurisdiction of the court. To this plea there is a demurrer, and a joinder in demurrer. And in support of the demurrer it is objected that the plea is bad, inasmuch as it does not show any other court where the defendant may be tried for this offence: and that it amounts but to an argumentative plea of Not Guilty. And in support of the objection to the manner in which this plea is framed, the Doctrina Placitandi, p. 234, a book of considerable authority on questions of pleading, and also what was said by lord Mansfield in his judgment of the case of Fabrigas v Mostyn in Cowper's Reports, 172, have been relied on, "that in every case, to repel the jurisdiction of the king's courts, you must show a more proper and sufficient jurisdiction; for if there be no other mode of trial, that alone will give the king's courts a jurisdiction." And as to this, there can be no question but that such is the general form of pleading in civil suits. And in the pleas to the jurisdiction of this court, in the cases of Eliot, Holles, and Valentine, against whom an information was exhibited by the attorney general in K. B. in the reign of Car. 1, for words alleged to have been seditiously spoken in the House of Commons, there is an averment that the offences, if any, were committed in parliament and ought to be there tried and determined, Vide Tremaine, 298. So in the case of the Kinlochs, Foster 17, which was referred to in the argument, where it was charged in the indictment that the offence was committed at Fochabers, in Scotland; the prisoners in their plea to the jurisdiction of the court of Oyer and Terminer stated, that the offence with which they were charged was triable in the court of Justiciary, or in some courts, or before other justices in Scotland.

* See the introductory note to the trial at bar p. 413.

The necessity of thus pleading in general was not controverted by the defendant's counsel; he, however, endeavoured to support the plea by saying, that the objection to the indictment being the total want of any jurisdiction in this part of the United Kingdom to try the defendant at all, it was impossible and unnecessary to state such other court or place of trial. This admission, in our opinion, clearly goes to show that this plea is bad; for if that cannot be done in this case, which is required to be done in all pleas to the jurisdiction, the consequence will be, that the matter of this plea is not proper to oust this court of its jurisdiction to try an offence committed in the county where it sits, but is matter to be taken advantage of either by plea in bar, or by evidence on the plea of Not Guilty. It will be recollected that the plea in question admits the commission of that crime which is charged in the indictment to have been committed in the city of Westminster; and the proposition which the defendant's counsel has contended for is in effect this:—Admitting the defendant to have committed a crime as to the laws of England in the county of Middlesex, I still insist that he is not punishable for it by any court of this part of the United Kingdom; though I cannot show that he is punishable by any other. The stating of such a proposition carries, almost on the face of it, its own refutation, even without the conclusive authority of lord Mansfield on that point, as already stated from Cowper 172: to which may be added lord Hardwicke's very decisive and peremptory opinion on the general subject in 1 Vesey, 202, and 2 Vesey, 357. In the first of these cases, which was that of the earl of Derby v. the duke of Atholl, in 1748, a bill was filed for a discovery concerning the general title of the Isle of Man, and for relief relating to the rectories and tithes within that island. "The defendant pleaded in general to the jurisdiction of the court, that the Isle of Man was an ancient kingdom not part of the realm, though belonging to the crown of Great Britain, and that no lands, &c. there ought to be tried or examined into here; and demanding judgment whether he should be put to further answer. Lord Chancellor.—This comes to be of great consequence to all the courts in England. There are two general questions on this plea; first, Whether the plea be good in point of form; not a trifling form; for if the objection thereto on the part of the plaintiff be right, it is material to the nature of such a plea. Secondly, whether good in substance? As to the first, it is objected for the plaintiff that although it be shown in the negative, and alleged that this court has no jurisdiction over the Isle of Man, and that it is not to be tried here, yet it is not shown in the affirmative, what other court has jurisdiction, or that there are any courts in the Isle of Man holding plea thereof: and the rule is insisted on, that whoever pleads to the jurisdiction of one of the king's superior courts of general jurisdiction, must show what other court has jurisdiction. I am of that opinion; and that for the want thereof the plea is bad, and ought not to be allowed, if nothing more be in the case; as it is expressly laid down in 2 H. 7. 17. a, and Doctrina Placitandi, 234, and is agreeable to the general rule of pleas of this sort; as in the pleas of abatement, wherein it must be shown that the plaintiff may have a better writ. The reason of this is, that in suing for his right a person is not to be sent every where to look for a jurisdiction, but must be told what other court has jurisdiction, or what other writ is proper for him: and this is a matter of which the court where the action is brought is to judge. There are not many authorities on this head; but in the old books of entries the form of pleading is so; and the opinion of Popham, C. J. in Yel. 13, and Fitz. Ab. tit. Jurisdiction concerning Wales: and although lord Vaughan may have denied that to be law, he was a very strong Welchman, as appears through his argument; in which there is a great deal of good and useful learning; yet it never was delivered, though intended to be so. It is said to this, that the court ought in this case to take notice of what is the jurisdiction; that the matter of fact is shown; and it is likened to the case of inferior courts, wherein it is sufficient for the defendant to plead that the cause of action arose out of the jurisdiction of that court. But I cannot put this (which is a superior court of general jurisdiction, in whose favour the presumption will be, that nothing shall be intended to be out of its jurisdiction which is not alleged and shown to be so) upon a level with an inferior court of a limited local jurisdiction, within whose jurisdiction nothing shall be intended to be which is not alleged to be so. 1 Saund. 74. I was desirous to be informed how the pleas were in this court, which are looser than at law; and no case has been cited in which the plea to the jurisdiction of this court has not given jurisdiction to another, as to a visitor," &c. And afterwards, in The Bishop of Sodor and Man v The Earl of Derby, 2 Ves. 357, lord Hardwicke, speaking of the plea to the jurisdiction in the former case, and of the grounds on which he had over-ruled it, says, "I would not be understood when I over-ruled the plea of the duke of Atholl, to have over-ruled it on affirmance of the general jurisdiction of this country to try and determine the title to the Isle of Man, or any such feudatory dominion; but merely on this:—the plea was to the jurisdiction, without averring to what court the jurisdiction belonged; and the rule of law is, that in a plea to jurisdiction, like a plea in abatement, where it is to a court of general jurisdiction, you must also show where the jurisdiction vests, as well as negatively that it is not there: but if it be an inferior court, you need only plead thereto, and not show where it is," &c. If then the circumstances attending the defendant, of his birth in Ireland, and his residence there at the time of the publication made in this country, have the effect of rendering him not punishable in any court of this country for such publication, this impunity must follow as a consequence, from its being no crime in the defendant, so circumstanced, to publish a libel in Middlesex. And indeed the argument rested wholly upon this position, that the defendant owed no obedience to the laws of this part of the United Kingdom, and if he owed no obedience to them, that he had been guilty of no crime in acting contrary to them. But such defence, if it can be in any form available in law is matter of absolute bar and an entire answer to the charge that he unlawfully published the libel in question; and the plea in that case ought not to have been in its present form, in which, as was said by the counsel for the crown, it is at most but an argumentative plea of Not Guilty. On this account therefore there must be judgment that the defendant answer over to the indictment.

It was then ordered that the defendant do answer over instantly, otherwise that judgment must be entered against him peremptorily.

*Proceedings on the Trial of the Hon. Mr. Justice Johnson at the Bar of the Court of King's Bench Westminster, before a Special Jury of the County of Middlesex, on Saturday Nov. 23: 46 GEO. III. A. D. 1805.**

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

It is proper, in this place, to advertise the Reader of the proceedings which took place in the Houses of Parliament subsequently to the decision of the Irish Courts of Law on the motions for Mr. Justice Johnson's discharge, and antecedently to the trial at Bar. I have therefore extracted from Hansard's Parliamentary Debates the following passages:

"House of Commons, Friday, Feb. 8, 1805.

"Mr. James Fitzgerald, in consequence of the determination of the court of King's-bench in Ireland, on the construction of the act passed in the last session, for the more easy trial of offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to another, in which determination the construction had been established by the opinion of two judges against that of one; in consequence also of the great agitation that had arisen in Ireland, on this determination, and assured of the concurrence of the gentlemen of the Irish bar, who, if they did not concur with him, would have abandoned all that independence of judgment, and all those sound principles of law and reason of which they had ever been so honourably tenacious, felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the act in question, which so flagrantly called for amendment in the point he alluded to. He should have felt it his duty to give notice of a particular motion on this head, if he did not think the amendment would come better from the quarter in which the act had originated. He trusted the hon. and learned author of the act would offer such amendment as would be best calculated to preserve the spirit of the act, and at the same time to remove every thing that could give rise to such unjust construction.

"The Attorney General had no difficulty in allowing that the act required amendment in some points. At the same time he doubted, whether the amendments he thought it required were the same that were wished for by the learned gentleman, for he knew of no amendments that were rendered necessary by the proceedings in that court, nor did he think it right, in the present state of those proceedings, to prejudice the discussion of the case now before the courts, by a parliamentary declaration of the sense of the House upon the construction of the act.

"Mr. Fitzgerald said, that according to his view of the justice of the case, the person taken up should be at liberty to give bail where the arrest took place, for his appearance where the offence was committed. It could never have been the intention of the framer of the act, that a person arrested in Ireland, for a bailable offence committed in England, should be brought to the place where the offence was committed without being allowed to give bail; or, that a person arrested in England for an offence committed in Ireland, should be conveyed to that country without availing himself of the legal mode of liberation till the time of trial.

"The Attorney General, in explanation, agreed perfectly, that the evil complained of by the learned gentleman had never been in his contemplation. The provisions of the act of last session had been copied from the act of 13th Geo. 3rd between England and Scotland, in which the defect had not been noticed until the occurrence now alluded to had discovered it in both." 3 Hans. Parl. Deb. 309.

"House of Commons, Tuesday, April 30, 1805.

"Mr. J. Fitzgerald called the attention of the House to an extraordinary construction (the arrest of judge Johnson) which had been put upon the act made for the purpose of arresting felons and traitors in any other part of the United Kingdom. He was proceeding to comment with severity on this construction, when the Speaker informed him it was not regular to enter fully into observations of this nature, but that he should simply give notice of the measure he intended to bring forward. The Attorney-General said that it was still his intention to move for an amendment of the law alluded to; but he did not think right to do so, while discussions were pending in the Irish courts of law on the true construction of it with respect to that country." 4 Hans. Parl. Deb. 507.

"House of Commons, Monday,

"The Attorney General, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the act of last session, for facilitating the arrest of offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to another, or from one county to another. He had deferred this motion hitherto, lest it might appear, if he had brought it forward earlier, to be a prejudging of a case pending in the courts of the sister kingdom. That case had been decided, and therefore he felt himself at liberty to bring forward his measure. The object he had in view, was simply to enable a magistrate in Ireland who might execute a warrant issued by a magistrate in England, to give the same bail as if the warrant had been issued in that country, and vice versa. The charge, that he had framed the measure of last session with a view to bring Mr. Justice Johnson a prisoner to attend his trial in this country, would fall before a statement of a fact. The bill had been prepared by order of the secretary of state the preceding session, though, from the advanced stage of the session, it had been deferred till last session, and he had obtained leave to bring in the bill some days previous to the conviction of Mr. Cobbett; and it was not till some days after, when the original manuscripts had been given up by Mr. Cobbett, that Mr. Justice Johnson could be considered as the object of a prosecution. Leave was given to bring in the bill." 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. 119.

The bill appears to have passed through its respective stages in the House of Commons without further notice. In the upper House, however, the following proceedings took place upon it:

"House of Lords, Tuesday,
June 25, 1805.

"The Duke of Cumberland presented a petition from Mr. Justice Johnson. The petition, after setting forth the leading circumstances of his case, stated in substance, that the petitioner was put to very considerable expense in defending himself in a cause now depending in his majesty's court of King's-bench. That he was informed that a bill (the Felons' Escape) was in that House, which contained several clauses which if passed, would have the effect of an ex post facto law upon his cause, and prayed that their lordships, in their wisdom and justice, would so amend such clauses, as that the law, at the time of the alleged offence, might not be altered. The petition was ordered to lie upon the table." 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. 557.

"House of Lords, Thursday,
June 27, 1805.

"[OFFENDERS' ESCAPE BILL.]—Their lordships having resolved into a committee on this bill,

"The petition of Mr. Justice Johnson, presented and read against certain clauses of the bill, which went as stated to affect his case in the nature of an ex post facto law, and praying, as in the concluding terms of the petition, 'that his case might not be affected by a law which was not in existence at the time of the alleged offence,' was read.—Mr. Adam and Mr. Park were then heard, the former at considerable length, in support of Mr. Justice Johnson's petition. Mr. Adam went into a history of the former act to amend which the bill before the committee was intended; also the case of his learned client, from the time of its first being brought under the consideration of the Irish courts of law, to the present moment of its pending in the court of King's-bench in England. He dwelt upon the consideration of the bill, in its present shape, going to affect the learned judge's case in the form of an ex post facto law; adverted to the point, that the act under which he was to be tried, afforded no power of compelling the attendance of witnesses from Ireland; argued for the propriety of trying the learned judge before an Irish court of law, in a country where his person, character, and conduct, were better known, than they could possibly be in this. The learned counsel enforced principally these leading considerations, with his usual talents and scientific knowledge.—Mr. Park supported the arguments of his learned brother. He dwelt forcibly on the objectionable considerations of an ex post facto law, and adverted to the circumstance of there being no act before the 41th of the king, by which the learned judge could be tried in an English court of justice; and stated, that the learned judge had no opportunity of being heard before the other House of Parliament, because the clauses he principally objected to were not introduced till the third reading of the bill, when they were added by way of riders.—Mr. Adam, in the course of his address, referred to some clauses, the introduction of which, he humbly submitted, would, on the others being expunged, render the bill unobjectionable in the way complained of by the learned petitioner.—Their lordships then proceeded to the discussion of the provisions; and several amendments, chiefly verbal, were made, on the suggestion of the lord chancellor.

"The Earl of Westmeath, confessing himself not adequate to the task, said he would not trouble the committee with any law observations upon the subject, but begged leave to move the introduction of one or two clauses, which, we believe, were similar to those adverted to by the learned counsel.

"The Lord Chancellor [Eldon] observed, that what was now proposed, brought on the question of the desired amendments, and the proposed clauses. The adoption of those as proposed, he felt it his duty to resist, as nothing could be more true, or clearer in law, than that for a libel published in England, one could duly be tried by the laws of this country. He meant not now to go into the consideration of the general law, as relating to the publication of libels, but merely to say that he knew enough to be convinced, that were he or any man to write a libel in London, and publish the same in York, or vice versa, no lawyer could say that such would not involve two distinct offences, and for which the libeller might be tried either in the counties of York or Middlesex. With respect to the idea thrown out that there was no opportunity of compelling the attendance of witnesses, he observed, it was the general duty of all his majesty's subjects to attend in the king's courts of law, and that the process issued was the only means of compelling such due attendance. With respect to certain other considerations, which had been adverted to as applicable to the bill in question, he should certainly give the points his best attention, and try whether he could not, either on the report or on the third reading propose a clause, which would be the means of doing ample justice to the country, and to the individual concerned; as he freely admitted, justice could not be done to the country, if it were withheld from the individual. What he proposed would go to obviate any thing which might result from the present bill, in the way of construction, to prejudice the pending cause adverted to, and afford the party the means of compelling the attendance of witnesses on his behalf.—After some farther observations from the lord chancellor, the clauses proposed by the noble earl, who seemed to express himself satisfied with the tendency of what fell from the noble and learned lord, were negatived." 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. 622.

The following is a copy of the act:

STAT. 45 GEO. III. C. 92.

An Act to amend two acts of the 13th and 44th years of his present Majesty, for the more effectual execution of the Criminal Laws, and more easy apprehending and bringing to trial offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and from one county to another. (10th July 1805.)

WHEREAS by an act, passed in the 13th year of his present majesty's reign, intituled, An Act for the more effectual Execution of the Criminal Laws in the two parts of the United Kingdom; and by another act, passed in the 44th year of his present majesty's reign, intituled, An Act to render more easy the Apprehending and bringin to trial offenders escaping from one part of the United Kingdom to the other, and also from one county to another; provision is made for the apprehending of offenders in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, so that such offenders may be apprehended in one of the said parts of the United Kingdom for offences charged to have been committed within either of the other parts of the same: and whereas there is no provision made in the said acts, for admitting such persons to bail, who may be so apprehended for offences which by law are bailable: be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that in case any person or persons shall be apprehended in one of the said parts of the United Kingdom for an offence which was committed, or charged to have been committed, in either of the other parts of the same, under any warrant endorsed in such manner as is in that respect provided by virtue of either of the said recited acts, such person or persons shall and may be taken before the judge or justice who endorsed the said warrant, or before some other justice or justices of the county, stewardry, city, liberty, town, or place, where the same was endorsed; and in case the offence be bailable in law, and such offender or offenders shall be willing and ready to give bail for his, her, or their appearance, according to the exigence of the said warrant, such judge or justice or justices by whom such warrant was endorsed, or before whom any such offender or offenders shall be brought, shall and may proceed with such offender or offenders, and take bail for him, her, or them, according to the exigence of the said warrant, in the same manner as the judge or justice who originally issued the same should or might have done; and such judge or justice or justices so taking bail as aforesaid shall take the recognizance or bail bond of the said offender or offenders, and of his, her, or their bail, in duplicate, and shall deliver one of such duplicates to the constable, or other officer or officers, or person or persons so apprehending such offender or offenders as aforesaid, who are hereby required to receive the same, and to deliver or cause to be delivered such recognizance or bail bond to the clerk of the crown, or clerk of the peace, or other proper officer for receiving the same, belonging to the court in which by such recognizance or bail bond such offender or offenders shall be bound to appear, and such recognizance or bail bond shall be as good and effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, and of the same force and validity, as if the same had been entered into, taken, or acknowledged before a judge or justice or justices of the peace of the county, stewardry, city, town, liberty, or place, where the offence was committed; and the said judge or justice or justices so taking bail as aforesaid, shall transmit the other of such duplicates to the court of exchequer of such part of the United Kingdom in which such bail shall be taken, there to be kept of record; and it shall and may be lawful for the court, in which any person so bound to appear shall forfeit his or her said recognizance or bail bond, to transmit a certificate, testifying the forfeiture thereof, under the seal of the court, or under the hand and seal of one of the judges or justices of the same, to the court of exchequer, in that part of the United Kingdom in which such recognizance or bail bond shall have been taken; and it shall and may be lawful for such court of exchequer to proceed upon such certificate to levy the sum so forfeited, in the same manner in which they may proceed upon any recognizance or bail bond, taken and forfeited within the same part of the United Kingdom, and estreated in due course, into the said court: provided always, that if such offence be not bailable in law, or such offender or offenders shall not give bail for his, her, or their appearance, according to the exigence of such warrant, the said judge or justice or justices before whom such offender or offenders shall be brought, shall remand him, her, or them, to the custody of the constable or other officer or person who shall have apprehended such offender or offenders, and such constable, officer, or other person shall proceed to convey such offender or offenders into that part of the United Kingdom wherein the offence was committed, by such ways and means as are provided by the said recited acts respectively.

II. And whereas it may happen by reason of the difference in the law prevailing in the said different parts of the United Kingdom, that the judge or justice or justices before whom any offender or offenders shall be brought, under such warrant so indorsed, may not know whether the offence mentioned in such warrant be or be not bailable; for the better information therefore of such judge or justice or justices in that particular, be it further enacted, that in case any person suing out such warrant shall show, by affidavit or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the judge or justice granting such warrant, that it may be necessary to execute such warrant in a part of the United Kingdom different from that in which such warrant is issued, and it shall appear also to the judge or justice granting such warrant, that it is granted for an offence for which it would not be lawful for any judge or justice or justices, before whom such offender or offenders might be brought, by reason of the endorsement of such warrant as directed by the said recited acts, to admit such offender or offenders to bail, such judge or justice granting such warrant shall, upon the face of such warrant, write the words "notailable;" and in all cases in which such words shall not have been so written, it shall and may be lawful for the judge or justice or justices, before whom any offender or offenders may be brought under such warrant so endorsed, to admit such offender or offenders to bail.

III. And whereas it is fit to provide for the appearance of persons to answer in cases where warrants are not usually issued, and to give evidence in criminal prosecutions in every part of the United Kingdom; Be it further enacted that the service of every writ of subpoena, or other process, upon any person, in any one of the parts of the United Kingdom, requiring the appearance of such person to answer or give evidence in any criminal prosecution in any other of the parts of the same, shall be as good and effectual in law as if the same had been served in that part of the United Kingdom where the person so served is required to appear; and in case such person so served shall not appear according to the exigence of such writ or process, it shall be lawful for the court out of which the same issued, upon proof made of the service thereof to the satisfaction of the said court, to transmit a certificate of such default under the seal of the same court, or under the hand of one of the judges or justices of the same, to the court of King's-bench in England in case such service was had in England, or in case such service was had in Scotland, to the court of justiciary in Scotland, or in case such service was had in Ireland, to the court of King's-bench in Ireland; and the said last-mentioned courts respectively shall and may thereupon proceed against and punish the person so having made default, in like manner as they might have done if such person had neglected or refused to appear in obedience to a writ of subpoena or other process issued out of such last-mentioned courts respectively.

IV. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that none of such last-mentioned courts shall in any case proceed against or punish any person for having made default by not appearing to give evidence in obedience to any writ of subpoena or other process for that purpose, unless it shall be made to appear to such court that a reasonable and sufficient sum of money to defray the expenses of coming and attending to give evidence, and of returning from giving such evidence, had been tendered to such person at the time when such writ of subpoena or other process was served upon such person.

V. Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any judge or justice to endorse, by virtue of either of the said recited acts or this act, any warrant, unless the same shall appear to have issued, if in England or Ireland upon some indictment found or information filed, or if in Scotland upon some libel or criminal letters raised and passed under the signet of the court of justiciary, against the person or persons named in such warrant, or unless the same shall appear to have issued in respect of some capital crime or felony mentioned in such warrant; any thing in this and the said recited acts contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

VI. And be it further enacted and declared, that in all cases in which any warrant or certificate shall, by virtue of either of the said recited acts or this act, be required to be acted upon in any part of the United Kingdom, other than that in which the same was originally issued, it shall not be lawful for any court, or any judge or justice, to proceed to enforce or act upon the same, until it shall be proved upon oath to such court, judge, or justice, that the seal, signet, and signature upon the same, are the seal, signet, and signature respectively of the court, judge, or justice, whose seal, signet, and signature, the same respectively shall purport to be.*

VII. Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing in this act contained shall, with respect to any prosecution depending before the passing of this act, be deemed or taken by any court to alter or affect in any manner the construction of the said act of the 44th year of his majesty's reign, if any question should arise whether such prosecution be authorized by the true intent and meaning of the said act.]

The indictment* was opened by Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Attorney General.—Gentlemen of the Jury; It is with very considerable pain, and serious concern, that I rise to address you on this most extraordinary and important case; a case in which I have had the singular misfortune of being obliged, in my character of law officer of the king, to bring before this high court of criminal judicature, one of his majesty's learned judges, and to charge that learned judge with the offence of being author and publisher of an anonymous libel against the government of his sovereign;—an offence, gentlemen, the most alien, as it seems to me, from every sentiment of a liberal and ingenuous mind, from every habit of liberal impression, from every sentiment of honourable feeling, from every idea of the principle which guides the duty of the defendant's exalted station; and which ought to have so guided him, both as a judge and a gentleman, as to have restrained him from committing that offence which is imputed to him upon this record. As it is, however, gentlemen, I am compelled to bring it before you, and it was with great pleasure that I observed the attention which you paid to the distinct and full opening which my learned friend Mr. Abbott, at my request, has made to you, of the charge as stated on the indictment; not merely, because by such opening and such attention, I think myself relieved from the necessity of painfully directing your attention to parts of the libel, with a detail which perhaps might otherwise be indispensable, but because from the circumstance of your now having heard it stated, you must already be acquainted with its general nature, and with the quality of the libel which I am now prosecuting before you and this learned court. The question is, who is the author of this libel? Whether this prosecution is well or ill instituted; whether it be well or ill directed as against the learned judge, are questions on which you can form no opinion, much less judgment, until the facts are established; but now, having heard attentively the libel read, no man can doubt what the character or quality of it is, and consequently I feel satisfied, that as attorney general, and public prosecutor of this indictment, you will think me justified in the character and description I have given of it.—I think you must be satisfied, as I am, that it is a libel of the most mischievous nature, in personality most scurrilous, most unfounded, most malicious, most scandalous, against the character, the honour, the ability, the station, of those who are most distinguished in Ireland, for character, for honour, for ability, for station; and further, you must be convinced it is most studiously and immediately directed against the character, the talents, the integrity of that noble lord who is at the head of the administration of the law and the equity of that part of the United Kingdom, in the purity of which the public have a deep interest; a character, which a judge, I should have thought, would have been the first to have vindicated, and unquestionably the last to have defamed. But, gentlemen, the purpose of this libel is obvious, as it seems to me; and its intent is as mischievous as the means are cruel, by which that intent has been attempted to be effectuated. The object unquestionably was, to revile and degrade the whole system of his majesty's government in Ireland at that time; and in the language of the record, to stir up the subjects of the king to hatred and dislike of his majesty, and of his government; and to cause it to be believed, that the people of that part of the United Kingdom were oppressed, aggrieved, and injured by that government; by reviling, traducing, vilifying, and defaming persons employed by the king in that government. This was intended to be accomplished by low personal abuse of persons who were no otherwise obnoxious to it, than that they had been raised to their high stations by the royal grace and favour of their sovereign, who had exalted his learned judges for their talents and their virtue, to arduous and laborious posts of trust and power, in that part of the United Kingdom.

Gentlemen, who are those that are most entitled to respect, but are reviled and vilified in this libel? The first in rank, and the foremost in this libel, is the earl of Hardwicke, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, the representative of the king there; and, as such, independent of his virtue, entitled to respect. Gentlemen, it would be the utmost presumption in me, to affect to eulogize my lord Hardwicke; but this I can say of him, as he is the object of this author's slander, that he is a man, who, notwithstanding the diversity of sentiment which on many points have divided the people of that part of the kingdom, has had the peculiar good fortune, or, I would rather say, the peculiar merit, of having united all in one common sentiment of unanimous respect, and as representative of his king I may say loyalty, to his person and government: such is the character of the earl of Hardwicke, whom the author of this libel has selected as the object of his slander. The next person who is the object, and who is made to stand the brunt of this libel, is my lord Redesdale, the lord chancellor of Ireland. On the merits, the talents, and the virtues, public or private, of that noble and learned lord, undoubtedly I, for obvious reasons, could not without great impropriety enlarge; the very means I have of being best acquainted with his qualities, and most highly esteeming them, are the very reasons which would make it peculiarly unseemly in me to dwell on them; but, gentlemen, you will, I am persuaded, and every liberal man will feel, that no nearness of connexion, where his honour and integrity are impugned, can impose upon me the necessity of such silence as to pass over his character, instead of meeting, as I am bound to do, foul and deliberate slander with unequivocal contradiction. For of all my learned friends who are now around me, and who are indeed the common friends of that noble and learned lord, there is not one who would not testify to his ability, integrity, and fitness for the high station which he fills; his superior, in fitness for that station, could not be found among all the subjects of his king; and for high honour and absolute integrity, he is as far beyond the reach, and above the want of any praise of mine, as he is out of the power of the defendant, or any other man, to injure him by slander.

To these two characters are to be added those of Mr. Justice Osborne, and Mr. Secretary Marsden. Mr. Justice Osborne is one of the judges of the court of King's-bench in Ireland, a respectable and distinguished character, both as a lawyer and an individual; his office entitles him to respect from every man, particularly from a brother judge, but his conduct in that office has procured him the esteem of every person who has had the pleasure to know him; he is a man of learning and integrity, whose life has been devoted to the service of the public, in which he has evinced honour and integrity. To these characters is added Mr. Marsden, a gentleman undoubtedly in a subordinate situation in government, when compared with those whom I have just mentioned, but holding a respectable situation, requiring attention to great state affairs, secretary to the lord lieutenant; a gentleman of unexceptionable character and conduct, who, from his situation and his services, is entitled to respect and regard. Gentlemen, to these we must add other persons connected with the government of Ireland, who are alluded to, and who are also traduced and vilified in these libels; but as they are not stated in the indictment, I will not trouble you with a recital of their names. These truly-estimable characters are, by this libel, held up to the hatred and contempt of the people; they are held up as incapable and ignorant, corrupt and sanguinary men; and as such, objects of execration and public infamy; they are stated to be "greedy speculators and blood-thirsty assassins."

But, gentlemen, when I have described to you this libel, as directed against these individuals, I have given to you but half its character; for whatever may have been the gratification of its author, by reviling these individuals, undoubtedly his whole purpose was not merely that of private malice; the great and main object was, to depreciate the administration of the government of Ireland. He well knew that nothing could more substantially effect that purpose, in the minds of any people who had the happiness to live under the administration of England, that nothing could so effectually alienate the affections of the Irish people from that government, as to induce them to believe that the administration of its law was corrupted—that the fountain of justice was polluted—that their judges were (or judge, at least, was) so corrupted that, in a criminal case of the highest nature, a judge was tampered with by the Crown, to pervert the course of justice—that the lord chancellor, with a fondness for money which was not his own, was taking sums of money from the secretary of the master of the Rolls, and depriving him of all fees, for the purpose of throwing them into the hands of his own secretary, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits—that the same lord chancellor had endeavoured to sap the foundation of justice—that the great seal of that country had been used for the purpose of gratifying the bent of private avarice; and this is done in the language of antithesis, which you know is the common art by which libellers attack the object of their malice—the mask under which they endeavour to cover the grossest libels. In this way the author of this libel thinks he gives himself a sort of cover, and thus he speaks of Mr. Secretary Marsden:—"But I may, I believe, add what men also say, that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty, should have been wrapped round the acts of Marsden, in order to screen him from public disgrace, we might then look for another, but not less fatal end to our liberties and to our constitution, than that which rebellion or invasion could produce. And, in truth, they say that, except as to momentary effects, rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference, if it can be supposed that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice."

Gentlemen, in addition to the description I have thus given you of the libel, I have this aggravation to state which arises from the period of its publication; it was given to the public a few months (I may almost say weeks, but certainly only a few months) after the bursting out of rebellion in Dublin, when the venerable chief justice of Ireland was murdered in the public street, in open day—a period when the state of the public rather required sedatives to compose, than any thing to inflame, the passions of the people: this circumstance marks the publication as peculiarly malicious, mischievous, and wicked.

Gentlemen, having stated this to be the character of the libel; having stated to you the object the author had in view by its publication, and the manner in which he proposed to himself to accomplish that object; I feel that when I have represented it as a libel, coming from such a source, on such an occasion, at a period so critical in that part of the United Kingdom, attacking, as it does, the administration of its justice, I may appear to you, and to my lord, perhaps, to stand in need of some justification or apology, for supposing it possible, that a learned judge should be the author of it; and unquestionably it was only by strong, and indeed irresistible testimony, that that conviction was impressed on my mind; but having obtained that testimony (I will tell you presently how I obtained the manuscript), it was impossible to doubt that Mr. Justice Johnson, the defendant upon this record, was the author.

I find, from indisputable evidence, that the manuscript is of the hand-writing of that learned judge himself, as you shall hear proved by the clear and indisputable testimony of two respectable gentlemen, who have long had a peculiar opportunity of knowing that judge's writing; for they are, and for many years have been, solicitors to the two boards of Revenue in Ireland, those of the Excise and Customs, to which this learned judge had been, while at the bar, for a considerable time, a standing counsel; by which means they had, daily and hourly, most familiar means of acquainting themselves with the variations of the hand-writing of that learned judge; and their testimony will be confirmed by others, who have also had much opportunity of knowing his hand-writing, so that there will be no doubt left of the fact. With such evidence before me, conviction in my mind became irresistible, as I have no doubt it will become in your's; and I am confident you will feel with me, that every circumstance which made it improper for me to accuse such a person until I had full proof, made it absolutely necessary for me to prosecute him when I had such proof; and that every circumstance which made it improbable that such a character could commit such an offence, made it absolutely inexcusable when proved. We might have expected that his knowledge of the law, a sense of the duty he owed to his own character, the duty he owed to the public, to his situation as applicable to the interest of that public; that peculiar allegiance, if I may so say, which he owed to the king, and those who, like him, are on the bench of justice; who may be said to be links in the chain of general tranquillity of the country over which it is their duty to administer the law; but who, by this libel, are rendered, or rather attempted to be rendered, unfit persons to fill their high stations;—all these considerations ought to have been so many securities for the good conduct of a judge: they are, in the first instance, so many pledges of his innocence, and barriers in the way of his committing any offence whatever, and render his guilt highly improbable; but when I find proof of this duty being forsaken, this barrier overthrown, I ask whether the guilt is not aggravated in its enormity tenfold? and whether it does not call with so much the louder voice, for a public prosecution?

Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty, painful as it is to me to execute it, to lay the case before you for consideration; and your's, painful as it is to you, to dispose of it according to the evidence, and to the rules of law; it is to be disposed of just in the same way as any other libel, and a due regard should be had to the character of the learned person who is the object of the prosecution, which may afford ground of more or less probability, that he is not the author of the libel; for the questions for you to consider will be, whether, in fact, he is the author, as I charge him to be; and whether he caused it to be published in Middlesex, as I say he did. Now, as to the question whether the publication be or be not a libel? I really apprehend I shall not have much to discuss. I cannot think that my learned friends, who are of counsel for this learned judge, will dispute that point; I hardly think they will address to a jury of their country, arguments with a view of inducing them to believe that this publication is not libellous. It is therefore unnecessary, as it seems to me, to say more on that head at present.

It now becomes my duty, in the course of proceeding, to point out to you some passages which seem to me to constitute the character of this libel. It was published at large, in two letters, signed Juvena, in the Weekly Register of Mr. Cobbett. The first subject of this prosecution begins with an allusion to the story of the Trojan Wooden Horse, which is stated as a wooden representative of wisdom. He says, speaking of the Trojans, "that they approached it as if it was possessed of authority and power: his wooden head towered above their houses; but though the machine itself was of innoxious wood, the credulous Trojans found its hollow head, and exalted sides, nothing less than receptacles for greedy speculators and blood-thirsty assassins." Having given this description of the wooden horse, the author of the libel proceeds to show, that "the ingenious author of this story did not mean to confine the lesson which it inculcates to the tale of Troy alone; he meant to caution future nations not to put trust or confidence in the apparent innocence of any such wooden instrument, and not to suffer themselves to be led to exalt it into consequence, or to pay it any respect. He meant to tell them, that any people who submitted to be governed by a wooden head, would not find their security in its apparent innoxiousness, and its hollowness would soon be occupied by instruments of mischief." Then, that it might not be equivocal, my lord Hardwicke is represented as this wooden head, Mr. Marsden as the instrument of its rapacity, and the whole is brought home to the Irish government, with my lord Hardwicke at its head; and the people are told, "that they are not to submit to be governed by this wooden head, nor to put any confidence in it, lest they should find it 'filled with instruments of mischief.'" The author of the libel then proceeds to take notice of my lord Hardwicke; and to observe, by way of derision, "that he is in rank an earl; in manners a gentleman; in morals a good father and kind husband; and that he has a good library in Saint James's-square." He observes too, "that but for Mr. Lindsay, he should here have stopped about lord Hardwicke, but that from this Mr. Lindsay," he says, "he further learnt, that my lord Hardwicke was celebrated for understanding the modern method of fattening sheep, as well as any man in Cambridgeshire;" so that, by this, my lord Hardwicke is distinguished for nothing, but the "knowing how to fatten sheep, and possessing a good library." Speaking of the lord chancellor of Ireland, he says, that lord Hardwicke was to be "assisted in all his councils by a very able and strong-built Chancery pleader from Lincoln's-inn;" and this part of his libel he concludes by saying, "the gift of lord Hardwicke to us, at such a period, cannot be compared to any thing else than the prank of Falstaff, at the battle of Shrewsbury, where the knight handed over his pistol to the prince; for indeed, Sir," says he, "by the present to us of lord Hardwicke, that sentence has been proved to us in a bloody truth, which Falstaff said in a good-humoured jest, 'here's what will sack a city;'" that is to say, destroy, and ruin it, for no other interpretation can be given to that sentence.

The next part of the libel respects Mr. Justice Osborne, Mr. Marsden, and my lord Redesdale; and with regard to Mr. Justice Osborne, what is said of him is, "that after the rebellion, as soon as the government had fully recovered its recollection, a commission, directed to five of the judges, issued for the trial of those rebels, who had been arrested for treason committed in the county and city of Dublin. This commission having issued while the judges were on the circuit, was filled up (and very properly filled up), with the names of the five senior of those judges who were then on the circuits which were likely to terminate at the earliest period of time. Such was the reason given by government for the particular selection of those judges named in that commission, and it certainly was a good reason. In some time after this commission had been sitting, it became necessary to issue a new commission for the trial of rebels in the shires of Antrim and Down. In the appointment of this second commission, the principle which directed the selection in the first, was not adhered to. On the contrary, the junior judge of the twelve was very anxiously called out, and placed in the new commission, over the heads of a number of his seniors. This, however, could not, and ought not to have given offence to any of those senior judges; because, whatever opinion of them the government may have manifested in such an appointment, the opinion of the present government upon such a subject (known to be influenced by motives very different from general justice), is too highly contemptible to have any effect upon any of the learned judges in the public mind. The circumstance, therefore, was not at first attended to." And then he proceeds to state "the report of a government newspaper in Dublin, concerning the charge of Mr. Justice Osborne to the grand jury of the county of Antrim; that through the well-timed efforts and strenuous exertions of a wise and energetic government, &c. such crimes as lately disgraced this country, had been effectually checked." And then he adds, "with what amazement the grand jury must have received such a broadside, poured in on the truth of the fact, I cannot, because I was not present, know; but I can very well imagine what the feelings of twenty-three well-informed gentlemen must have been. Their respect, and a thorough knowledge of their duty, would necessarily keep them silent. But, though men remain silent, under the proper awe and control of a court of justice, their language only becomes more strenuous when that re-strait is taken off, and they meet together in private confidence." And again, he says,

"But, Sir, suggestion does not stop here. Men ask, how could (if the learned justice did make any such assertion) the learned justice be led to give credit to a position, which contradicts the evidence of the senses of every man in the kingdom, who was present at, or knew any thing of the transaction? How could a learned judge be supposed to assert that which no man in the kingdom would assert, unless he had some reasons of the same nature as those which prevailed on Mr. Marsden's attorney-general, on the trials for high treason, to assert something of the same kind? Men, Sir, couple the extraordinary selection of the learned justice from amongst his fellows, with the extraordinary assertion attributed to him in a government newspaper; and they ask, if he made that assertion, where did he get his information? Was he ever in Mr. Marsden's audience-room, since the night of the 23rd of July? What passed there? What were the predisposing causes which induced government to select, particularly, that learned justice? Could government have foreseen (and if so, by what faculty), that the learned justice would have given an instruction to the grand jury, so very useful, and so very grateful to the government? What night telescope could have been applied to the eye of Mr. Marsden, which, through the dark womb of things unborn, could have enabled him to perceive, through this little future star, of praise springing from the creative lips of the learned justice? Here, sir, decorum towards you, and towards the public, inclines me to be silent as to other, and perhaps stronger observations;" and then follow passages to which I have already adverted. "But I may, I believe, add, what men also say, that if it were possible the ermined robe of the most awful attribute of his majesty should have been wrapped round the acts of Mr. Marsden, in order to screen them from public disgrace, we might then look for another but not less fatal end to our liberties, and to our constitution, than that which rebellion or invasion could produce; and, in truth, they say, that except as to momentary effects, rebellion and invasion might be viewed with indifference, if it can be supposed that the stained hands of a petty clerk had been washed in the very fountain of justice."

The lord chancellor is distinctly charged in this libel, with intermeddling with matters out of the course of his practice, and of using the great seal for the purposes of giving money to his secretary at the expense of the secretary of the master of the rolls, and other things are alleged that are discreditable to that noble lord.

Gentlemen, I will now advert to the nature of the libel against my lord Redesdale, which is introduced after what I have been stating, by way of contrast between what my lord

Redesdale is charged to have done, and what the late lord Kenyon would have done, if he had been placed in the situation of my lord Redesdale; that is, a contrast is drawn between what my lord Kenyon would have done, and what my lord Redesdale is said in the libel to have done, in the character of chancellor of Ireland; and in reading this part of the libel it is quite impossible for any one to be so blind as not to know he is so introduced. This is an enormous part of the offence contained in this libel, a scurrilous and infamous attack on the character of lord Redesdale, and therefore it is proper for me to call your attention to it—thus it runs:

"It is said of lord Kenyon that he loved money; if so, he loved his own money only, and not the money of any other man; lord Kenyon, therefore, as chancellor, never would have made any rule or order, by the effects of which, the secretary of a master of the rolls would be deprived of all fees, for the purpose of throwing those fees into the hands of the secretary of the chancellor, the better to enable that secretary to discharge the pension of some unknown annuitant on his official profits;"—directly charging, that although lord Kenyon loved money, it was his own money only which he loved, but that lord Redesdale loved the money of other people, and that he would take money out of the pocket of one person to put into the pocket of another, who had no right to it. Then the libel goes on to charge lord Redesdale with defects, and contrasting him still farther with the character of lord Kenyon. "The professional pride and the inborn honour of lord Kenyon would never have suffered him to enter into a combination to sap by underhand means the independence of his brethren the judges; he never would have suffered the great seal in his hands to be used for the purpose of garbling the bench, in order to gratify those who might be contented publicly to eulogize that government which privately they must have despised; nor would he have employed any of his leisure in searching into offices for practices by which he might harass the domestic arrangements of others, whose pride and whose integrity would not bend to his views, and thus double the vigour of his attack, by practising on the hopes of some, and endeavouring to work upon the fears of others." But it would be trespassing on your time to advert to other passages of this libel; enough has been already stated, to prove it to be most slanderous and most foul.

The other question for your consideration will be, whether this libel is brought home to the learned judge? not only whether he is the guilty author of it, but whether he is the publisher of it, as he is charged to be upon this indictment? And it will here be necessary for me to state to you, shortly, the manner in which this was discovered, and how we came to know whose hand-writing this publication is, as it shall appear to you in evidence.

Gentlemen, this libel appeared in Mr. Cobbett's Register in the month of November 1803. He who thus gave forth this libel to the public, was made the object of prosecution; he was indicted, and his trial came on to be heard at the sittings after Trinity term, in the last year; upon that trial he was convicted; and he caused communication to be made to me, representing that he conceived he had been ill used by the author; that he was ready to give up the manuscript, if any means could be found of tracing out the real author. I had but one duty upon that occasion, which was, to receive the manuscript, which was given us, with a perfect understanding, that it was neither expressed nor implied, in any degree, that Mr. Cobbett should thereby redeem himself from his share in the transaction. It was therefore in this manner that Mr. Cobbett communicated this manuscript to us, and then, an opportunity was necessarily afforded of examining the hand-writing; and that took place which I have already told you, namely, that these two gentlemen who had such familiar opportunities of knowing the hand-writing, seeing this manuscript, knew it to be his. It is not a short scrap of paper, like a draft on the back of a letter, such as two lines with a single pen, but an extension of writing, a continued writing extending over several pages, in the course of which there is a great variety of writing, by the accident of having a better pen at one part of it, than at another; or, from one part of the writing being written with more care than another. So that the whole of it displays the character of the hand writing, in such a manner, as that the witnesses cannot be deceived: it is a hand well known to them, it is a free and flowing hand, with which they have been long acquainted, having acquired a minute knowledge of the character of it in its various shades, while they were solicitors, and the learned judge was counsel to the revenue boards; in which situation they were in the daily habit of receiving his opinions on cases which they laid before him as counsel. In this gentleman's writing, as in all others, there is a difference at times; sometimes it is in a free and easy manner, sometimes a little more cramped or stiff; sometimes rather loose and careless; while at others, it is more plain and clear, when care and attention are required; in all which variety, these gentlemen had an opportunity of perusing the hand-writing of this learned judge; and I am told that when the long papers on which these libels are written, are put into the hands of the witnesses, they will not have the least shadow of a doubt of its being judge Johnson's hand-writing: not only will they say, "this we believe to be the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, from the general character of it," (which is all that is required in order to prove a hand-writing), but they will say this: "that from the nature and character of such and such words, we know it to be his, it being the mode he has long ago adopted of writing them, as we know from long acquaintance with his writing." If so, gentlemen, this seems to me to be a case, if I am not deceived in it entirely, which cannot break from under me; for these two gentlemen will be confirmed by the testimony of others, who have had similar opportunities of observing the character of the defendant's hand-writing; and they will state, not only their firm belief, but perfect conviction, that this is the hand-writing of the learned judge, and if so, there will be no dispute whether he be the author of the libel or not.

But it is here to be observed, that we are now trying this learned judge in the County of Middlesex, and not in Dublin: though painful it would be to me, and to you, to hear, after it is proved by indisputable testimony that this learned judge is the author of this libel; yet my learned friends are come here, not to deny the fact, and meet the charge, which weighs so heavily upon the character of this learned judge, but merely to turn us round by saying, "to be sure, you have proved the paper to be of his hand-writing, beyond a doubt, but now you must prove that he published this libel in the county of Middlesex, or else a jury of that county cannot convict him, for the law requires that you should prove it in the county in which it is stated upon the record to have been committed. He admits himself to be a person who has slandered his brother judges, and the representative of his king, but it was in Dublin; and as it was in Dublin that he did it, you must try the cause in the county of Dublin, where it was done, and not in the county of Middlesex, where it was not done." Painful will it be to me, painful will it be to you, gentlemen, to hear such a defence, and painful must it be to my learned friend Mr. Adam, if he shall be driven to the necessity of defending the learned judge in that way; yet I cannot help suspecting that something of that sort is intended, and that it will be attempted. Yet if it be, the question of law on that point will fall, like the fact, from under them; I cannot help thinking that something of that sort will be attempted; because the first attempt that was made to defend this learned judge against this charge, was, not to meet it as a person conscious of his own innocence would have done, and ought to do, by joining issue upon the fact, is he the author, aye or no? not to meet the case upon the merits, but the attempt was, to plead to the jurisdiction of this court; by which it was contended that the case was wrongly brought here; and that attempt, I have little doubt, will be made again, although unquestionably, it will meet with the same fate as it did before. But that such a defence should be set up by the learned judge, is most extraordinary, which will be giving up the merits of his case altogether, for that must be obvious to every one; it will be trying to shelter himself under a point of form; on which you will not receive direction from my learned friend or from me, but you have the happiness to be at present guided in that respect by the highest authority which this kingdom affords for that purpose, by the wisdom of the whole court of King's-bench, to direct you in point of law. I will, however, venture to state to you shortly, that in point of law, the cases of misdemeanors and those of felony differ. In felony there are distinctions between accessaries and principals; but in misdemeanors there are no such distinctions, because in misdemeanors all parties concerned in them are principals; so that if any act be done by one person under the direction of another, that act is, in contemplation of law, done by himself, that is, by him who directed it to be done, as much as by him who actually did it; and therefore, if Mr. Justice Johnson, in Ireland, requested Mr. Cobbett to publish this libel in England, the publication of it in England by Mr. Cobbett, is a publication by Mr. Justice Johnson in England. Nothing whatever turns on the circumstance of his residing in Dublin, any more than if he were in the place where we have the happiness to live; any more than if he resided in Surrey, and employed a printer to print and publish a libel for him in Middlesex. The case they must contend for is, "that if Mr. Justice Johnson was living in Surrey, on the other side of Westminster-bridge, and he had sent to Mr. Cobbett this libel by the penny-post, to be printed and published in Middlesex, Mr. Justice Johnson could not be considered as guilty in the county of Middlesex, for that he must be tried in Surrey." They must contend, and contend successfully to that extent, or they cannot sustain this objection.

It matters not whether from Cornwall or from Dublin, this libel was transmitted to Middlesex (and by the way, Cornwall, though in England, is at a greater distance than Dublin from Middlesex); this is a distinction which makes no difference in the case, according to the law. But, perhaps, I may relieve my learned friends from the desperate and disgraceful necessity of attempting to maintain this untenable position, by telling them, there is a publication here in Middlesex, because the letter, which Mr. Cobbett will prove he received with the post-mark of Dublin on it, was directed and delivered to Mr. Cobbett in Middlesex; not only directed to him in Middlesex, and delivered to him in Middlesex, but also read by him in Middlesex, printed by him in Middlesex, and published by him in Middlesex to the world at large; there is, therefore, an end of the case, and there is no question that that act alone is a publication by this defendant in Middlesex. I will go farther, and maintain, that if Mr. Cobbett, who had so received this libel, had, instead of publishing it in his Register, handed the manuscript to government, that alone would have been sufficient for me to come here before this Court and you, to call for a verdict of Guilty against this learned judge; and therefore, although, I apprehend, something may be said on this point, it is quite impossible for my learned friends to make any real impression upon your minds by that species of defence. But these are points not at all connected with the merits of this case; if they amount to any thing, they are mere matter of technical form,—a legal point, on which, unquestionably, you will defer to the learning of the Bench.

Now, gentlemen, having detained you perhaps too long on this case, I have only one thing more to say to you, which is in some degree already anticipated; to meet observations which may be made to the prejudice of the case, on account of this prosecution being so late after the offence of the publication itself. I have stated to you already, that from the period of Mr. Cobbett's trial and conviction for the publication of this libel in his Register, and of his delivering up the manuscript to us, that we might endeavour to trace out the author, by discovering whose handwriting it was, I had no means of tracing out immediately the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, and therefore there has been no delay on the part of this prosecution. The case of Mr. Cobbett was tried at the sittings after Trinity Term, 1804; this indictment was preferred in the very next term; it is, therefore, not for me, but for the defendant, if he thinks proper, to assign reasons for the delay, whose appearance was not entered sooner, so as to enable us to go to trial. I do not ask for any reasons for it; all I say is, that the prosecution is free from blame on that account. It is not I who have been indifferent to the feelings of the learned judge, by delaying the trial of a charge which so seriously affects his character; whatever fault or whatever merit there is in the delay is not our's, but rests with the defendant.

EVIDENCE FOR THE CROWN.

Mr. Joseph White sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

Take that paper into your hand, sir [The witness taking it.] From whom did you receive that paper, sir?—Mr. Cobbett.

Mr. Cobbett who was defendant in a former case which was tried here?—Yes, sir.

Is it now, sir, in the same situation in which it was when you received it?—Yes, certainly it is.

Mr. Joseph White cross-examined by Mr. Park.

Has it been in your custody ever since, or have you put a mark upon it?—I marked it.

It is marked by yourself?—Certainly.

By which you know it?—Certainly.

Mr. Park.—That is quite enough, sir.

Mr. Erskine.—Call Mr. Cobbett.

Mr. William Cobbett sworn.—Examined by Mr. Erskine.

Give that paper to Mr. Cobbett. Will you look at that paper, sir [Giving him a paper.] Have you seen that paper before?—Yes.

When did you first see that paper, and how did you come by it?—I first saw it in the month of October, 1803.

Was it sent to you?—There are different dates, showing that one of them came before the other.

By what conveyance did you receive that paper?—I received it from Mr. Budd, in Pall-mall, the bookseller in Pall-mall, from his house or shop; which was, at that time, my shop or house, from whence letters of communication came to me.

In what manner did it come to you?—It came to me under cover, directed—

Mr. Adam.—Stop, sir. Have you got the cover here?—No.

Mr. Erskine.—What is become of the covers?—I do not know.

Have you looked for them?—No; it was useless, because they were immediately thrown into the fire; but this I recollect with respect to the covers, that they had the Irish post-mark upon them.

Mr. Adam.—My lords, if they talk of covers they must produce them, otherwise this is not evidence.

Mr. Erskine to the witness.—Have you any doubt that the covers, of which you have just now been speaking, were destroyed?—No, sir; they were destroyed immediately.

Mr. Adam.—Do you know that these particular covers were destroyed?

Mr. Erskine.—He speaks of no other covers.

Witness.—No, I cannot swear that they were destroyed.

Mr. Erskine.—I rather think this is not the time for my learned friend, Mr. Adam, to interpose.

Mr. Adam.—I am asking with regard to the destruction of these particular covers, which must be taken to exist, unless proved to be destroyed, and therefore cannot be talked of unless they are produced.

Mr. Erskine to the witness.—Have you any doubt that these covers were destroyed?—None at all.

Mr. Park.—We must examine farther into the covers, for they are written directions on the letters; and I submit to your lordships, that my friends cannot interpose in the midst of our examination.

Lord Ellenborough.—As far as we have got, we have, from the witness, probable evidence of the destruction of these covers, as it seems to me. We have such probable evidence of the destruction of the thing, as to let in parole evidence of its nature; if you, in your examination of the witness hereafter, can change it, that will be evidence for you to support your objection to the parole testimony.

Mr. Erskine to the witness.—Having said that you received these letters under cover, and that you have no doubt the covers were destroyed; what mark was on this particular cover?—It had an Irish post-mark on it.

What address was on the cover?—To Mr. Budd, No. 100, Pall-mall.

Being the office which received communications for you, and from which they were forwarded to you?—Yes.

Was Mr. Budd's the place where, in the publication of your Register, you referred communications to be sent?—In the first place I received, in the same hand-writing as the other letters, an anonymous letter, requesting of me—

Mr. Adam interposing.—What is become of that letter?—It was published in the Register.

What is become of it?—I believe it was destroyed.

Mr. Erskine.—Will you state what were the contents of the letter of the same hand-writing, which you believe to be destroyed?

Mr. Adam.—My lords, surely this is going too far: Mr. Erskine is now proposing to give evidence of some other letter, which, for aught that appears, has no connexion whatever with those which are the subjects of this trial, not connected with those covers which the witness thinks he destroyed, and which your lordship says there is probable reason to suppose were destroyed, and upon which your lordships think that parole evidence of their contents becomes admissible. The witness only says he believes the letter which Mr. Erskine is examining to was destroyed.

Mr. Erskine to the witness.—Have you any doubt of that letter being destroyed, any more than the covers you have been speaking of?—None at all.

Will you relate, sir, the circumstances under which this letter came to be directed to Mr. Budd?—I received a letter, inquiring of me whether it would be agreeable to me to receive, from Ireland, certain useful and true information respecting the state, respecting public affairs in that country.

Mr. Adam.—My lords, my learned friend, as I humbly submit to your lordships, is going now quite beyond that which the case warrants. He is now seeking to ask the contents of a paper which the witness received, without establishing any connexion whatever with that which is said to have been destroyed; which is going beyond the boundary.

Lord Ellenborough.—Hereafter he is to apply this evidence, in some shape or other, to the case, as it appears; he is endeavouring to show why he cannot produce it, which is, because he thinks it is destroyed; non liquet that it will have any bearing on the case; it cannot affect the defendant, unless it be a part of his correspondence. The purpose is to show how the letter came to be directed to a particular place; but I take it for granted, they desire this evidence to be given, to show the manner in which the correspondence took place between the witness and somebody in Ireland.

Mr. Park.—But how does all this affect the defendant?

Mr. Adam.—If this is not afterwards made to apply to the defendant, it will of course go for nothing.

Lord Ellenborough.—Whether from the defendant or a stranger, is immaterial for our purpose; it cannot affect the defendant, unless it be applicable to some act of his: it tends to account for his address, and that is all it purports to do; it does not address itself to any thing else.

Mr. Erskine to the witness.—You were saying that a letter, of which you are speaking, is in the same hand-writing.—

Mr. Park.—This is proceeding to prove hand-writing by comparison, which is not evidence.

Lord Ellenborough.—This really is nothing more than to account for the letter being directed in a particular manner, and really it is hardly worth a contest. As to the hand-writing in that letter, there is nothing in this evidence to affect the defendant, and it does not signify a farthing. Let the witness proceed.

Witness.—In case it was agreeable to me to receive such communications, I was desired to say where I should wish them to be directed to; and, in the next number of my Register, I, of course, did say, I wished them to be directed to Mr. Budd's, No. 100, Pall-mall.

Mr. Erskine.—Did you, sir, subsequently to the time of your giving in your Register that public reference to Mr. Budd, receive that which you now hold in your hand?—Yes, I received both; that was received first, which is dated the 29th of October; both addressed to Mr. Budd, and which Mr. Budd sent to me in consequence of an order he had from me.

Did you, in consequence of having received them, publish them in your Register?—Yes, I did.

What is the date of the second?—The date of the second is, the 2nd of November. One is dated the 28th of October, and the other is dated the 2nd of November.

Both your house, and Mr. Budd's, I understand to be in the county of Middlesex?—Yes, sir, in Pall-mall, and Duke-street Westminster.

Mr. Cobbett cross-examined by Mr. Adam.

You do not live at No. 100, Pall-mall yourself?—No, sir.

Where do you live?—At No. 15, Duke-street, Westminster.

You lived there at the time this publication was inserted in your Journal?—Yes, sir.

Did you receive them at your house, or where did you receive them?—At my house in Duke-street.

Then, if I understand you, Mr. Cobbett, this paper that you hold in your hand, first came to No. 100, Pall-mall, addressed to Mr. Budd?—Yes, sir.

Did they come open to you?—The first was opened by Mr. Budd. After the first, I requested him not to open the next, but to send them to me as he received them, the next therefore was not opened.

Then Mr. Budd sent them to you?—He sent them to me.

By whom did he send them to you?—I do not recollect, sir.

Mr. Cobbett, you mentioned that these covers had a mark upon them; where are they now?—I do not know, sir; they were destroyed, I think.

You think?—Yes.

Did you ever search for them?—No, sir.

Have you never searched for them since?—No, never searched for them; I was looking into the drawer, where perhaps these papers were thrown, as others were, and I know that I have never seen them; and I believe, sir, in answer to your question, that the office was searched; and that at the time the letters were received the covers were torn off, and thrown into the fire.

And that you suppose, from its being your usual custom?—Yes.

Have you made any recent search for them?—No, sir.

Mr. Erskine.—I have no farther question to put to Mr. Cobbett at present, but he will be so good as not to go away, since we may have occasion to examine him. But one question I forgot to ask: I believe that is your Register [putting a number of his weekly Register into the hand of the witness]?—Yes, it is.

[Mr. Cobbett was desired by the attorney-general to stay.]

Mr. Richard Waller sworn.—Examined by Mr. Garrow.

Mr. Waller, do you exercise any public office in Ireland?—I do.

What is the office you hold?—Solicitor to the commissioners of the customs, sir.

How long, sir, have you filled that office?—Upwards of three-and-twenty years, as principal; and I was in the office before that.

Is there any person at the bar who acts as standing counsel to the board? any consulted as counsel to the board? at the bar, sir, of this court as counsel to the board there?—There are always two counsel to the commissioners latterly, formerly there was only one.

In the course of your duty, had you frequent opportunities of communicating with the gentlemen who act as counsel to the board?—Very frequent.

Did you receive directions from them as to your conduct in your office, as to carrying on proceedings, and so on?—Almost daily consulting with them.

Have you occasion frequently to have written opinions from gentlemen standing in that relation to the board?—Very frequently.

Was Mr. Robert Johnson, now one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland, ever in the situation of counsel to the board to which you are the solicitor?—He was.

As nearly as you can recollect, for how long a time?—As I recollect, very nearly ten years.

During that period, sir, had you very frequently personal communications with him?—Very frequently.

Did you very frequently receive writings from him?—I did.

Did you frequently see him?—I did.

Did you become well acquainted with his hand-writing?—I did: I think as well as I could be with that of any one.

Mr. Garrow.—Give the witness the letter of the 29th of October. Will you be so good as to look at that paper [giving him the letter, the witness looking at it]. I believe, sir, you have had an opportunity of examining it very carefully, before you came here?—I did twice; I have examined this in June 1804, and in November last [instant he meant], and now in this court.

You carefully examined it?—I did, carefully, for I signed my name to every page.

Do you believe that to be the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—Witness. [Looking at the whole paper again.]—I do, sir.

Have you any the least doubt that it is his hand-writing?—I do not feel that I have a doubt in my mind but it is his hand-writing; there are some little words here and there I do not know; they may be the printer's marks, but what I mean is, that I do believe the body of it to be Mr. Justice Johnson's writing.

Will you look at the top of the first page, and which you take not to be his hand-writing?—I do not believe that is his hand-writing [pointing at a part of the paper].

Tell us what that is?—I declare I do not know.

Mr. Cobbett looking at it said, it is long primer, indicating to the printer the characters in which he was to print it.

Mr. Garrow to the witness Mr. Waller.—As to the body of the letter, you say you entertain no doubt of it?—Indeed, sir, I have as little doubt as any man can have on any subject.

[The witness looking at the other letter.]

Mr. Garrow.—Have you examined with equal care, that paper?—I did, and put my name to each, indeed each side.

With the exception of like notes, which are of the hand of the printer, have you the same opinion of that as of the other?—I have no doubt; I entertain as little doubt that it is the hand of Mr. Justice Johnson, as I can on any subject whatever.

Lord Ellenborough.—Are the dates 28th or 29th, dates put on this, or on the other side of the water?

Mr. Cobbett.—The 29th of October is the date which came on one of the papers.

Lord Ellenborough.—As to the other, what do you say, the second letter?

Mr. Cobbett.—That letter had no date when it came, and 1-8-0-3, were written on it by a young man belonging to me; the figures 1-8-0-3 were written by my direction.

Mr. Garrow.—And “affairs of Ireland?”—They were written by me, to make it correspond with others.

Mr. Garrow to the Court.—“Irish affairs,” were written on it, and Mr. Cobbett wrote on it “affairs of Ireland,” to make it correspond with others.

To Mr. Cobbett.—With directions for the manner in which it was to be made?

Mr. Cobbett.—No, sir, that was made by another.

Mr. Erskine.—That is in your Register of the 28th of November?—Yes, sir.

Lord Ellenborough.—The copy you have now shown him, is his published copy?

Mr. Erskine.—Exactly so, my lord; this evidence is necessary merely as matter of form.

Mr. Richard Waller cross-examined by Mr. Park.

Were you the sole officer of the commissioners of the board of customs, Mr. Waller?—I am the sole solicitor of the customs. The office which I hold is solicitor to the commissioners of the board of customs.

Have you any partner in the office?—No, I have not.

How long has Mr. Justice Johnson ceased to be counsel to the board?—I believe he was made a judge, I rather think, in the month of June 1801.

Then from that time, of course, all connexion as to your office (though probably private friendship had not) ceased as between you and him?—Except meeting him in the streets, I had no connexion with him; neither did I often see him, except on the bench, afterwards.

You had no acquaintance, or business to transact with him, after that time?—Certainly not, that I recollect.

Mr. Justice Johnson was in parliament in Ireland for a great many years before the Union?—He was, sir.

And for ten years of that period filled the office you have alluded to very ably?—I believe he has held another public office. Do you mean previous to his being counsel to the commissioners?

That I want to know from you, whether it was at one, or at different times, you will be so good as to tell us?—I had no acquaintance with Mr. Johnson before, but I did hear that he held another office under government.

It was a confidential situation he had in your board?—Certainly he was a confidential servant of government.

Did he hold this office you have alluded to, in your board, at the period when the Union between Great Britain and Ireland took place?—He did, and he was then a member of the House of Commons.

He was then a member of the House of Commons?—He was, and he was a member of the House of Commons in the last parliament of Ireland.

You had no opportunity of seeing his hand-writing since he was a judge, you only met him in the street, no intercourse of civilities past between you afterwards?—I do not recollect any communication, but there might be affidavits, or something of that sort, signed by him.

You said you have seen the paper which I have in my hand [meaning one of the libels], three times I think; once since you came last to England, and twice before?—I did.

Where? In England, or Ireland?—In England, every time I saw them.

In November, and at the time you were before the grand jury?—I did.

Did you see them in the preceding June, or at the time of Mr. Cobbett's trial?—No; I saw them in Mr. White's hands afterwards.

I would beg of you to look at these papers, they seem to me to be remarkably well written; did Mr. Justice Johnson always write so clearly and so neatly as that?—No, he did not.

His opinions were not so written?—Not quite so small.

Nor quite so fair?—His general hand was free, but more like the size of the words "affairs of Ireland."

Mr. Park.—The words "affairs of Ireland," is quite a different hand, I only wish to have that understood, my lords. The first letter contains at the top of it, "affairs of Ireland," which the witness says is more like the common writing of the defendant.

You admit this writing is much more fair and small than the general hand of the learned judge?—It is much fairer and smaller than his common writing.

You hold another office under government, I understand?—I have no other office under government; I am general agent to the University of Dublin, and I have another office, but not under government.

Mr. Richard Waller re-examined by Mr. Garrow.

You have stated, that the learned judge's opinions were not generally written either so small or so fair as this. They were not intended to be printed, I believe?—Certainly not, they were for our direction.

Mr. Garrow.—Not intended for the press?—They were not.

Mr. Charles Ormsby sworn.—Examined by Mr. Wood.

Mr. Ormsby, do you hold any office in Ireland?—No, sir.

Are you acquainted with Mr. Justice Johnson?—I am, sir.

How long have you been acquainted with him?—I suppose twenty years.

Thirty years?—Twenty.

You are an attorney, I believe?—I am, sir.

An attorney in Ireland?—Yes.

And you are acquainted with Mr. Justice Johnson?—I have seen him very often write franks; I have seen him write franks; and opinions of his writing I have seen, which I am sure were of his writing; and also pleadings corrected by him. I am in partnership with Mr. Reeves, and by that means have seen his opinion, when he was counsel for the revenue in Ireland.

Have you sufficient acquaintance with his hand-writing to know it when you see it?—Yes, I have.

Now sir, have you examined that paper before? [putting one of the libels into the hands of the witness]—I saw it this time twelve-months.

Did you look it over carefully?—I did, sir.

Lord Ellenborough.—Is that the paper of the 29th of October?—Yes, my lord.

Mr. Wood.—Having examined it carefully, be so good as to tell us, whether you believe that to be Mr. Justice Johnson's hand-writing?—There are a few words, I see, that are not his hand-writing; but the general tenor I do apprehend to be his hand-writing.

Can you read the words which are not his writing? [The witness looking at the paper.]

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—Is the general body of it his hand-writing?—For instance, at the end, "I am yours," is a different hand-writing; and 586, and 545, are not his writing.

Lord Ellenborough.—But the general body?—The general body I apprehend to be his writing.

Mr. Garrow.—The parts he points to, as not of the defendant's hand-writing, are annotations of the editor.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—Are the words, "I am, sir, yours," the annotations of the editor?—I apprehend so, my lord.

Mr. Cobbett.—These were words put in by myself; "I am, sir, yours," were in, but I was afraid the printer would make a mistake, and I put the same words up here [pointing at the place in the paper], to be more intelligible to the printer. As to the bottom of the first page, the words were not written by me, but by a person who was in my house, which is a reference to a former letter: the words are, "for the introductory letter, see page 586; and for letter 2, see page 545."

Mr. Justice Lawrence to Mr. Cobbett.—Written by some person in your office?—Yes, my lord.

Mr. Wood to Mr. Ormsby.—Now, Mr. Ormsby, what do you say to the second?—The words "affairs of Ireland," are not of the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson at the beginning; but the general writing I believe to be his hand-writing, from the best opinion I can form.

Lord Ellenborough.—Do you mean the writing at large, with that exception?—With that exception, my lord.

Mr. Garrow to defendant's counsel.—Do you wish to ask this gentleman any questions?

Mr. Ormsby cross-examined by Mr. Richardson.

Do you know that Mr. Justice Johnson held a confidential situation under the crown, besides being counsel for the commissioners of the customs?—He was barrack-master, and afterwards counsel to the revenue board.

Do you know when he ceased to be counsel to the revenue board?—Immediately preceding his being a judge, in 1801.

Was it immediately after the Union?—I suppose it was before that time.

You had an opportunity of seeing his corrected pleadings?—Yes; and I have had franks from him, before he was a judge; and I have seen his signature, since he was a judge, such as a signature to affidavits; but I do not recollect seeing any of his letters immediately after he was a judge.

Was the character of his hand-writing to the corrected pleadings, as correct as that?—They were rather of a looser hand than this—this seems to be written more close; but the casting of the letters is the same, particularly the letter I; and the corrected pleadings was rather a wider hand.

Lord Ellenborough.—Do you speak to opinions?—To opinions, my lord, and the corrections of pleadings. The letter I, in particular, is like the letter he signs his name, Johnson. The hand-writing to opinions, or pleadings, was what I call a more scattered hand.

Mr. Richardson.—Is this as large as the hand to pleadings?—No; this seems to be a contracted hand.

He wrote a worse character in pleadings?—It was a looser and a larger hand, and not written with the care which appears in this, of putting so much on the paper.

Why so, this is on a large sheet of paper: I want to know whether his hand was as fair and equally well written as this generally?—I do not know exactly how to describe it otherwise than as I have done, it was a looser hand, as if not to write so much on the same sheet of paper.

Of what age is Mr. Justice Johnson?—Oh, sir, he is upwards of fifty, or about fifty. When I knew him first, I am sure he must be a man of thirty; I knew him first when he was acquainted with the marquis of Downshire: it was there I knew him first.

Mr. Joshua Nunn sworn.—Examined by Mr. Abbott.

Will you state what you are, Mr. Nunn, what is your situation?—My situation is that of second remembrancer of the court of Exchequer; I am one of the deputies there, and one of the secondaries there.

Are you acquainted, sir, with Mr. Justice Johnson?—Yes, I am.

How long have you known him?—I have known him since the year 1792.

Have you ever seen him write, sir?—I have. Frequently?—Yes, frequently.

Are you acquainted with the character of his hand-writing?—Yes, sir.

Will you look at that [showing to the witness the letter of the 29th of October] have you seen that before?—I have, sir.

Have you examined it?—I did, sir.

Tell me whether you believe that to be in the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—I do believe this to be of the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson; that is, the body of it. There may be some alterations in it, which I cannot exactly swear to.

Will you point out those which you consider as not being his hand-writing?—The words "as its," I cannot say to be his. There seems here, at the bottom also, something which is not his.

Will you read that at the bottom which you think not his?—"For the introductory letter see page 586; and, for the second letter, see page"—[The witness then looking at another paper].

Have you seen that before?—I have, sir.

Did you examine it?—I have.

Carefully?—I did.

Do you believe that to be the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—I do, sir.

You say you believe it to be his hand-writing; do you observe in it any alteration not his?—Yes: "affairs of Ireland," at the head, "third letter" also, I think are not of his hand-writing.

Lord Ellenborough.—Mr. Ormsby speaks to both of the letters?

Mr. Garrow.—He does, my lord.

Lord Ellenborough.—Mr. Ormsby, do you speak of both as being of the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—Yes, I do, my lord.

Mr. Joshua Nunn cross-examined by Mr. Richardson.

Are you still clerk to the commissioners of the revenue?—No, I am not.

How long since have you ceased to be?—Since the year 1794.

What situation are you in now?—Deputy of lord Donoughmore in the court of Exchequer, and one of the secondaries of the second remembrancer.

You have not seen the defendant write for some years, have you?—Not since he was made a judge.

I think you said you left this office in the year 1799?—No, I did not.

You have not seen the defendant write since he was made a judge?—I do not recollect that I have.

Mr. John Edwards sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

Mr. Edwards, I believe you are an attorney?—I am.

Were you at any time clerk in Mr. Waller's office?—I was in Mr. Carr's.

What was he?—He was solicitor to the land department of the revenue; the excise department, which is called the land department there.

Was Mr. Justice Johnson's situation, as counsel to the board, a part of the inland department of the revenue?—It was, Sir: he transacts business in both.

How long were you clerk to Mr. Carr in that department?—I was articled as a clerk to him in the year 1794, and continued until the time of his death in 1802. I served an apprenticeship to Mr. Carr.

Mr. Carr is dead, you say?—He is.

Had you frequent opportunities of seeing the writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—I had, frequently.

Can you form any judgment of a paper being his hand-writing or not, when you see it?—I suppose I could.

Look at that paper [showing him one of them] What is the date of that?—29th October, 1803.

Look at the body of that paper, and tell us whether you know whose hand-writing it is? Have you had an opportunity of looking at it before?—I saw this paper, I think it was this day week [looking at the paper.]

Do you believe it to be his hand-writing?—I do, sir. From the best opinion I can form, I believe it to be Mr. Justice Johnson's hand-writing; I saw the paper on Saturday and Sunday last.

You did not attend here, sir, on the bill before the grand jury?—No, sir, I did not—[The witness then looked at the other paper.]

Seeing the general character of the hand-writing, do you speak to that also?—I see there are some words interlined, which I cannot believe to be his hand-writing.

Whose hand-writing do you conceive the general body of it to be?—I conceive it to be the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, according to the best opinion I can form of it.

Mr. John Edwards cross-examined by Mr. Adam.

Of what age were you when you went to Mr. Carr's office?—I think about sixteen years.

You have not had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Justice Johnson's writing, or examining any of his correspondence or hand-writing since 1801?—No, sir.

You know Mr. Justice Johnson, of course?—I do.

Do you know of what age he is?—I cannot say; he is an elderly man.

Is he not very infirm?—Yes, he is very infirm.

I understand he was very ill lately?—Some time ago in Ireland, I understood he was very ill.

Mr. Carr's office was an office connected with the revenue?—Yes.

And while you were in Mr. Carr's office, did Mr. Justice Johnson visit there at all?—Several times.

Lord Ellenborough.—What situation of life are you in now?—I succeeded Mr. Carr as solicitor to the revenue, my lord.

Mr. Adam.—That you have told us already; you were not examined before the grand jury, and you never saw this writing until within a week ago. When were you subpoenaed?—Last Saturday week.

For the first time?—For the first time.

Mr. Attorney General to defendant's counsel.—I suppose you do not put us to prove that my lord Redesdale was lord chancellor of Ireland at the time of this publication?

Mr. Park.—You should not put us into an unpleasant situation, by making us appear to object to what every body knows to be true; but you had better pursue your course without appealing to us.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Now, my lords, to satisfy the averments on the record, we are going to prove that these gentlemen named on the record, and who are the objects of these libels, held the offices which they are stated to hold, and that the innuendoes apply to them.

Mr. Charles Crow sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You come from Ireland, do you not?—Yes. You were there in the year 1803, I believe?—I was.

In the secretary of state's office?—I was, in October and November in that year.

Was lord Hardwicke lord lieutenant?—He was.

Was lord Redesdale lord chancellor then?—He was.

And Mr. Marsden in the secretary of state's office?—He was, sir.

Was Mr. Justice Osborne a judge then?—He was, sir, one of the judges of the court of King's-bench there.

Lord Ellenborough.—What was Mr. Marsden?—He was under secretary of state, my lord.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Have you looked at these letters, the printed letters?—I have.

Whom do you understand the Cambridgeshire Earl to mean?—Lord Hardwicke.

Whom do you understand by the Chancery pleader?—Lord Redesdale.

And Mr. Marsden?—Mr. Alexander Marsden.

Mr. Attorney General.—Now, if your lordships please, we propose to read the libel.

Mr. Adam asked the attorney-general if he had closed the evidence for the prosecution.

Mr. Attorney General.—We give no more evidence now.

Mr. Adam.—Have you closed your evidence?

Mr. Attorney General.—We give no more evidence now.

Mr. Adam.—It is my duty, my lords, in this stage of the case, to submit to your lordships, that in the state in which the proof stands, the libel has not been published by the defendant in Middlesex.

Mr. Attorney-General, in his address to the jury, seemed to foresee this objection; and he attempted, as it were, to intimidate us who are counsel for Mr. Justice Johnson, from taking it. My lords, we are here to do our duty, and I cannot admit that counsel for a defendant in a criminal case, whatever the rank or situation of that defendant may be, are to be fettered in the exercise of their discretion, from taking any ground of defence which the law of the country affords. I am sure therefore that I shall have the patient attention of the Court (in a case of such importance, and where there is such a defendant), while I endeavour to lay before them the principles and the authority on which I rest; and I know that it will not be supposed that, because I take this preliminary objection, I have not a good defence upon the real merits of the case.

My lords, in exercising this discretion in the case of Mr. Justice Johnson, I am only placing him in the situation of those, whose characters stand as pure and eminent as any that adorn the annals of this country, at the most important, and ultimately the most fortunate period of our history; when the manly and triumphant exertions of the best patriots established the liberty of their country. Your lordships, who are well acquainted with the history of the laws and constitution, must already perceive, that I refer to the case of the Seven Bishops. Upon the authority of that case I mean to contend, that here is no publication by this defendant of the libel in question proved I might say any where, but I mean to confine it to this, that there is no publication by the defendant proved in the county of Middlesex.

My lords, the attorney-general seems to draw a distinction between county and kingdom; but I contend for none such. He said that the defendant would attempt to say, that which was criminal if done in Surrey, was not so if done in Dublin. But I say, the question is, whether it is proved to have been done in Middlesex, where it is laid to have been done. In the case of the Seven Bishops, the act of writing was in Surrey; but what was required to be proved, was an act of publication in Middlesex.

That proceeds upon this principle, that all crimes are in their nature local; that they must be averred to have been done in a particular place, and if not proved to have been done in that place, the crime is not proved to have been committed at all. Certainty, safety, the nature of human actions, all combine to fix this rule.

In order to lay this matter clearly before your lordships, I will first show your lordships what was proved in the case of the Seven Bishops; I will next point out what was ruled in that case; and applying the principle which the case inculcates, I trust I shall satisfy your lordships, that under the facts of this case, we are entitled to your lordships' judgment, that there has not been any proof of publication in Middlesex by Mr. Justice Johnson, to go to the jury; but, that the attorney-general having failed in that proof, the prosecution must end here, and the defendant go forth acquitted.

In the trial of the Seven Bishops, which I hold in my hand (the edition from which I speak, is that which had the sanction of the name of that eminent judge, Mr. Justice John Powell; it is the same that is to be found in Mr. Hargrave's edition of the State Trials, vol. iv, page 308), it appears that there was considerable difficulty in proving the handwriting of all the bishops to the petition to the king. The prosecutors therefore called Mr. Blathwayte as a witness, who was to prove an acknowledgment at the privy council.

Mr. Blathwayte says (p. 171, of the trial), "I believe this to be the paper that my lord archbishop did own to be subscribed by him."*

Mr. Solicitor-general, says, "Where was it owned? because we would obviate the objection of the county."†

Your lordships will observe then, that the counsel for the crown in the case of the Bishops, put it, that acknowledgment in Middlesex proved publication in Middlesex, and that is what is meant "by obviating the objection of the county."

Mr. Blathwayte's answer to the solicitor-general's question is, "they owned it at the council table, Whitehall. All the bishops owned it." Here then your lordships will observe, that there was the highest of all proof, that the bishops were the authors of the petition; that it was proved by their own admission, and by that admission made in Middlesex.

In the sequel, and from the cross-examination by the bishops' counsel, it appears clear, that the single point agitated was, whether this amounted to proof of a publication.

In page 181, Mr. Blathwayte says, "The first time (as I said before), my lords the bishops were unwilling to own the papers, and did say, they humbly hoped his majesty would not take advantage against them, but that they were ready to obey his command. The second time they were called in, they did repeat it again, that they hoped his majesty would not take advantage against them; after that there was mention made of the paper being published. I remember my lords the bishops said, they had not published it."‡ Then in page 192, Mr. Attorney-General asks Mr. B. this question: "Did my lord archbishop own it to be his hand-writing?"

‡ Ibid, 314.

Mr. B. "Yes, he did, and said he writ it with his own hand, and would not let his clerk write it."*

(P. 193). The Solicitor-General says,—
"Then, my lord, we now pray that we may read it."

Mr. Finch.—"If your lordship pleases to favour me one word, I think it cannot yet be read; and my objection is this:—"

Lord Chief Justice.—"I thought you had made all your objections before, as to the reading of it."

Mr. Finch.—"Pray, my lord, spare us: here are two parts of this information; the one is for consulting and conspiring to diminish the king's royal prerogative; and for that end they did make and write a seditious libel: the other part is, that they did publish a seditious libel. We are hitherto upon the first part, the making and writing of it; both parts are local: until they have proved the making and writing of it to have been in Middlesex, it is not evidence upon this information."

Mr. Solicitor General.—"We have proved it written and published in Middlesex."†

In page 198, Mr. Finch says, "My lord, in short, we say, that hitherto they have totally failed: for they have not proved any fact done by us in Middlesex, nor have they proved any publication at all."‡ This then raises the precise question, how far there is any publication in the county of Middlesex to go to the jury; and that question is founded on these facts: 1st, That there was a publication, for the paper appeared in council, coming from the king. 2nd. That it was addressed, and intended to be presented to the king. Lastly, that it was owned in Middlesex by the defendants.

After a great deal of argument upon the question, the lord chief justice (in page 221) says, "the Court is of opinion, that its coming to the king is publishing."

Mr. Justice Powell.—"Aye, my lord, if it be proved to be done by them."§

By which the real question is put in issue, whether in fact there is proof of the publication being by their act or agency, or of its coming from them.

In page 222, one of the counsel for the prosecution says, "after it comes into Middlesex it must be taken by presumption, to be subscribed and published by them there."

Lord Chief Justice.—"No; we ought not to do any thing by presumption here."

Mr. Justice Powell.—"No, by no means, we must not go by presumptions, but proofs."

Lord Chief Justice.—"I will not presume it to be made in Middlesex."||

And in page 230, the Chief Justice says,

* 12 Howell's State Trials, 316.

† Ibid.

‡ Ibid, 319.

|| Ibid, 336.

"Mr. Finch, you may observe (and I am sure you do observe as well as any body in all cases) but, I say, you may observe, that they are off of every thing but causing it to be published; now that does lie upon the king's counsel to prove, that my lords the bishops did cause it to be published, FOR THEIR OWN-ING OF THEIR HANDS DOES NOT AMOUNT TO A PUBLICATION."*

Then, after more argument, the solicitor-general concludes his observations thus:

"Say they, it is agreed to be published in Middlesex; but it is not proved to be published by us."

Lord Chief Justice.—"No, they do not say so; they agree it was in Middlesex, but not published."

Mr. Justice Powell.—"Mr. Solicitor, they do agree it was in Middlesex, but not published, to be sure, nor by them."

Lord Chief Justice.—"Mr. Solicitor, I'll tell you what they stand upon: they say you ought to prove it to be delivered to the king by the bishops, or somebody employed by them; for upon that went the resolution that was in Williams's case, that he sent it to the king; but here is no body that proves it was delivered to the king in this case; so that, how it came to the king non constat."†

It is clear, then, that the question for the Court was this, whether they had proved a direct act of publication in Middlesex by the defendant, or given evidence which amounted to publication there, or led to that inference. The doctrine contended for was, that the most manifest intention to publish was not publication; that, on the contrary, all that was admitted, and the authorship proved, but to make good the publication in the particular place—a matter essential to establish the crime, and therefore necessary—in order to make out such proof of the publication as ought to go to the jury, it was necessary to make out a direct act of publication; and the final judgment of the Court upon this point, and to this effect, is given in page 235.

Lord Chief Justice.—"I will ask my brothers their opinion; but I must deal truly with you, I think it is not evidence against my lords the bishops."

Mr. Justice Holloway.—"Truly, I think you have failed in your information: you have not proved any thing against my lords the bishops in the county of Middlesex, and therefore the jury must find them not guilty."

Mr. Attorney General.—"I will put you but one case, my lords. A man has an opportunity secretly to deliver a libel into the king's hands, when nobody is by; and so there can be no proof of the delivery."

Mr. Justice Powell.—"It is a dangerous thing, Mr. Attorney, on the other side, to convict people of crimes without proof."

Mr. Attorney General.—"But shall a man

be permitted thus to affront the king, and there be no way to punish it?"

Lord Chief Justice.—“Yes, there will sure; but it will be a very strange thing, if we should go and presume that these lords did it, when there is no sort of evidence of it: it is that which I do assure you I cannot do. We must proceed according to evidence, and forms and methods of law.”*

So the Court decided, that there was no evidence of publication to go to the jury.

There cannot be a doubt, then, that the principle inculcated by this decision is, that the most distinct and unanswerable proof of authorship, the most manifest intention to publish,—that those two things, the writing proved, and the intention to publish proved in the very county, are not considered as acts of publication by the defendants in the county. But that it is necessary to go farther, and to prove an act carrying that intention into execution, and this upon the soundest principles of substantial justice, because, an unexecuted intention is no crime; because, to constitute the crime, there must be proof of the intention being carried into effect in a particular place, viz. in the place charged, for in the language of the chief justice, how it came to the king non constat.

Accordingly, after much delay, lord Sunderland came into the court in order to cure this defect in the evidence. I will not detain your lordships with reading his evidence. I can state the substance of it with accuracy. Lord Sunderland proved that two of the bishops came to his office; that they had the petition with them; that they desired him to say which was the best way of delivering it to the king; that they desired him to read it, which he declined, but said that he would acquaint the king with their desire, which he did; and the king commanded him to say, they might come when they pleased. He then went back and told them so; on which they went and fetched the bishops. When they all came, they went into the bed-chamber, and then into the other room, where the king was.

By this testimony the intention was proved to be executed, or a presumption raised that they had published the libel in Middlesex, by delivery to the king.

But in the case now under consideration, there is no proof whatever to establish that Mr. Justice Johnson published the libel, or caused it to be published in Middlesex. I do not mean to contend, that personal presence is necessary to prove publication; it is, no doubt, clear, that a person may publish by transmitting the libel to the place of publication; but I contend that there is not any act of transmission by the defendant proved in this case. The libel appears to have been written in Dublin, and Mr. Justice Johnson resident in Dublin—

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—To maintain your argument, you must admit that he wrote it.

Mr. Adam.—I do not admit that as a fact; I shall prove the contrary; but I admit, for the sake of this argument, that there is at present, prima facie evidence that he wrote it.

Now, my lords, admitting that, still there are ten thousand persons in Dublin who might have sent it to England; and observe how the evidence stands—Mr. Cobbett has proved that the papers signed Juvena, came in an envelope; the loss of which has been thought sufficiently proved at present, to admit parole testimony of what was upon it. Mr. Cobbett proves that the Dublin post-mark was upon it. Now that does not establish it to have been put in by the defendant, by whomsoever it was put into the post-office at Dublin, it would equally have had the Dublin post-mark. Mr. Cobbett gives no proof of the hand-writing on the envelope; it is not proved to be the defendant's; he does not prove that he received it by the usual course of the post, but that it came to him from Mr. Budd; not brought by Mr. Budd, but by another person, and he does not know who that person was; so that the transmission is completely disconnected with a post-office delivery, and not entitled to any of the presumptions arising from the course of that office; and if it were, it is not connected with the defendant by any mark which establishes it to have been transmitted by him. Admitting, for argument, that it was composed by him, and that it lay in his bureau, it may have been stolen from thence, and transmitted by another, and have appeared equally to have been his transmission. Granting that he not only wrote it, but that he intended to have published it; that it appeared from the paper itself that it was intended by him that he should send it for publication, still, until the act of sending is proved, it rests merely in intention, and the case of the Seven Bishops has established, that the most manifest intention to publish is not sufficient. In that case there was a manifest intention apparent by the acts of the parties, and by the paper itself, to publish, and this was all connected by what passed at the privy council, and by the paper being produced there by other persons than the bishops, to have been in Middlesex; a publication, too was proved in Middlesex, but all this was held not enough. It must be proved that the bishops had performed the act of publication, and the intention to do so, however plain, was not enough, as it would be making the intention to commit the crime equal to the commission of it. So in this case, where all proof of an act of publication, or procuring the publication, is wanting, there is no act of transmission brought home to the defendant; there was a fact of publication proved, that is, proof that the paper was sent to Mr. Cobbett, in Middlesex, but in the language of the lord chief justice, in the case of the Seven Bishops—from whom it came to him non constat. That is the point to be proved in this case: it is not proved from whom it came; it is not proved that it came from the defendant; and therefore there is no publication by the defendant proved in Middlesex, to go to the jury.

This, my lords, I hold to be the inevitable conclusion, applying the principle established by the case of the Seven Bishops to the facts of the case now under consideration, and therefore there must be an acquittal, there being no publication proved for the jury to consider.

Mr. Park.—My lords, this is a very serious case to the defendant, for he must take all the consequences after conviction, as if this point had never been submitted to your lordships—

Mr. Attorney General.—I believe I can save a great deal of trouble to the Court: the objection, as it seems to me, is premature, for part of the objection now insisted upon, may be done away by the internal evidence of the written document which we propose to read; and the jury may find, that not only this libel was published by Mr. Cobbett, as he has already proved, but it will appear on reading the thing itself, that the defendant desired Mr. Cobbett to publish it in Middlesex; and the difficulty has all arisen from my learned friend's taking an objection to evidence before it is given; which objection will be done away by that very evidence, when given.

Lord Ellenborough.—Suppose the defendant had said to Mr. Cobbett, "I desire you to publish this in the county of Middlesex."

Mr. Erskine.—My lords, I am persuaded that after the paper is read, your lordships will not hear a word of objection to it as evidence.

Mr. Park.—I was about submitting to your lordships, that I feel myself bound to admit the fact of Mr. Cobbett's publication in Middlesex, and also, for the sake of the argument (although afterwards we shall show the contrary in evidence), I shall admit the manuscript to be of the defendant's hand-writing; but then, I submit to the Court, that before any evidence can go to the jury on this issue (which is, whether any act was done by the defendant in the county of Middlesex or not,) there ought to be some fact established, of Mr. Justice Johnson having actually caused or procured Mr. Cobbett to do this in the county of Middlesex, which cannot be done consistently with the rules of evidence, in the way which the attorney-general proposes; because, if that prevails, every man may be subject to the acts of any other who may have access to his papers; so that what a man may write in his closet, for his own amusement, or for the chance of publication after his death, when party heats and animosities may cease, may burst upon him, by its appearance in the world, when he had no intention it should do so, but had studiously intended to conceal it. Thus, whatever a man writes may make its appearance before the public against the intention of the author.

The Court will understand me as arguing now, as if I were bound to admit that Mr. Justice Johnson wrote this libel in Dublin; doing so with a protest against the fact; but doing it as a foundation for my argument, that he wrote it in Dublin, contemplating, in his closet in Dublin, to send it to Mr. Cobbett to be published in this metropolis, in the county of Middlesex, as stated in this record to have been actually done; but then, I contend, there is no proof of his having sent it. The paper is found in the hands of Mr. Cobbett, who publishes it in his Register; but for any thing that appears (and your lordships are to presume nothing against the accused), another person might have come to the possession of this paper writing, and have sent it to Mr. Cobbett. The case is put by one of the counsel for the Crown in the trial of the Seven Bishops, and he receives an answer by Mr. Justice John Powell, that the publication so contended for will not do, for that proof of an act done in Surrey, does not lead to any conclusion of another being done in Middlesex by the same party, although it be done by somebody. If I send a letter from the county of Surrey to the county of Middlesex, or procure it to be sent there, it is evidence against me as to what was done by another with that letter in Middlesex. There is not a question upon that, for if it was a letter in the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, and sent by him from Dublin to be published in Middlesex, that is a publication by Mr. Justice Johnson in Middlesex; but that is not the present case, upon the evidence now before the Court; for supposing, as I have always done, for the sake of the argument, that the letter is of the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson, your lordships are left without any proof whatever of his having taken any step, in Dublin, towards sending it to England to be published; for any thing that appears, some other person may have had access to his escrutoire, and possessed himself of this paper; and, without the defendant's knowledge, sent it to Mr. Cobbett to be published here; and that, I submit, is the fair presumption, until they prove the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson to the envelope, which they not only have not done, but which they have not even rendered probable.

Lord Ellenborough.—You contend, that it must not only appear that the defendant wrote the envelope, but that they must also prove it was transmitted by him to this country.

Mr. Park.—Yes, my lords, then there would be a case to go to the jury; but here we have no fact done by the defendant in the county of Middlesex, nor any act done in Dublin to further the letter from thence to the county of Middlesex. Thus, for instance, the writing a letter in the county of York, is no proof of the publication of it in the county of York. This is like the case of Algernon Sidney: papers were found in his study, and, because they were there found, he was convicted as for publishing them. But so repugnant was that determination to the principles of our law and natural justice, that the determination was afterwards annulled by act of parliament.

Lord Ellenborough.—And if this paper-writing had only been found in the study of Mr. Justice Johnson, he never could be convicted for a libel.

Mr. Park.—My lords, I am anxious to discharge, as well as I am able, my duty towards my client; and I will not, unnecessarily, take up your lordships' time; but really there does seem to me to be a great deal in this point. It is admitted then, that if this paper had been only found in the defendant's study, they could not give it in evidence against him; now I contend that the present is no more than that case; for, supposing he were the author of this paper, then it would, upon this evidence, amount to no more than that the defendant was amusing himself, in his study in Dublin, but without intention of publishing in England the subject of his thoughts in private. I say, my lords, it can amount to no more than this, unless they were to lay before your lordships some act of transmission from Ireland to this country; and for that reason, I really do not see how this case can be distinguished from the case of Algernon Sidney; for upon this evidence, supposing the paper to be of the defendant's hand-writing, there is no proof it ever went from the defendant's desk by any act of the defendant. I submit also, that this is the same case as that of the Seven Bishops. The archbishop of Canterbury had never before been out of his palace at Lambeth, but a learned judge was of opinion, that, as the petition was signed at Lambeth, and as it was owned by the bishops that they intended to present it to the king, the presumption was, that as the king's council was held in Middlesex, and as the bishops asked an audience of the king, and the petition was afterwards seen in the king's hand, it was delivered to the king in Middlesex. But the judges held, that owning it in Middlesex was not sufficient; that the prosecutor must go farther, in order to connect the bishops with the act of publication in Middlesex, which was the charge against them in that prosecution; and Mr. Justice John Powell, a judge as much respected for his learning, and esteemed for his integrity, and of as high an authority in the law, as any learned judge of his day in Westminster-hall, was of this opinion. And in answer to the case which was put by Mr. Justice Lawrence, I would say, if a man were to put a letter in the post in Exeter, you must prove his hand-writing in that county; and his putting it in the post there, directed to a person in Middlesex, may be a circumstance to go to the jury to consider, whether he was not connected with the publication afterwards in Middlesex; but without it, and on mere proof of the hand-writing in Exeter, such a person could never be convicted of a libel published in Middlesex, although he might be convicted as the author of it in Exeter, or in the county of Devon. So here, my lords, if this learned judge wrote this paper, and did any act upon it afterwards, he might have been convicted for it in Dublin, as far as I know; but Mr. Cobbett does not appear to have received it from Mr. Justice Johnson; the envelope is not proved to be of his hand-writing; it is not proved to have been put into the post in Ireland by him, nor is there one act proved to have been done by him in Ireland towards its publication; there is, therefore, I submit to your lordships, a chasm in the evidence.

The first paper, your lordships will observe, comes to Mr. Cobbett from Mr. Budd, in an open cover; that cover is not produced, but it is said to be destroyed, and parole evidence was, therefore, admitted, to give an account of it, and the account only is, that it is destroyed, as the witness believes; no proof is attempted to be given of its being of the hand-writing of the defendant. Mr. Cobbett only tells us it had the Dublin post-mark upon it, and that he received it opened from Mr. Budd; Mr. Budd is not called; Mr. Budd sends this paper by a messenger to Mr. Cobbett; that messenger is not called as a witness. In order to make out that this paper was sent by this defendant from Dublin to Mr. Cobbett in Middlesex, it should appear, that the defendant did something towards its transmission; something done by him in Dublin should be shown, as his putting it into an envelope there, or something of that kind; some act should be proved to have been done in his personal presence, or the envelope should be proved to be of his hand-writing. We are here upon a libel published in the county of Middlesex by Mr. Cobbett, said to have been written and sent by Mr. Justice Johnson to Mr. Cobbett, to be published by him in the county of Middlesex. All the evidence which has been given in support of the charge, has been confined entirely to that of Mr. Justice Johnson being the author. Nothing is proved concerning the animus—the intention of the learned judge in Ireland, about publishing it here. Supposing him to have written the libel in Ireland, and to have done no more, he cannot be guilty of that which is imputed to him upon this record, namely, of having "caused the libel to be published in the county of Middlesex:" not only is there no evidence of the fact, but there is no evidence that the learned judge had any such intention.

Mr. Lockhart.—I humbly submit to your lordships, that a particular averment, of which I say there is no proof, ought to receive as material support in evidence, as any other averment upon the record, however essential to the substance of the prosecution; for the law of evidence is as much alive to the protection of innocence, as to the detection of guilt. The very inference which your lordships are called upon to make in this prosecution, was rejected on the trial of the Seven Bishops, to which case I would humbly beg leave to call the attention of the Court; which your lordships know was the case of a libel as well as the present, and which your lordships well know too, was a petition to the king, containing internal evidence of its object, which was to pray the king, that his majesty would not insist on enforcing his command on the petitioners. It was framed in the county of Surrey, by the petitioners; it was presented to the king, and found in his hand in the county of Middlesex. The Bishops were asked whether it was their writing? they acknowledged the manuscript to be their's, and this acknowledgment was made in the county of Middlesex; and yet, my lords, this was held not to be sufficient evidence of an act done by the Bishops in the county of Middlesex, and for what reason? because it was possible, although highly improbable, that some other person might have delivered the petition into the hands of the king. That I apprehend to be the reason, as there appears to be no other—improbable though it was, that any other person should have presented that petition—on which it was held there was not sufficient proof of any act done by the Bishops in the county of Middlesex. I submit to your lordships, that the present is no more than that case. Let us suppose the libel in question to be found in the hands of Mr. Cobbett, brought to him by the post, which is not the fact here; is it not as probable that this libel was sent by any other person to Mr. Cobbett, as by the learned judge who is charged with having done it? I say, my lords, is it not as probable that any other person might have inclosed this libel in a letter to Mr. Cobbett, as that any other person than one of the Seven Bishops delivered that petition to the king? If it be on account of the gross improbability of evidence tending to prove persons guilty, who are in reality innocent, that such evidence is rejected, because of the detriment it may cause to the administration of justice, I say this evidence is unfit to be received to go to the jury against the defendant; because he ought not to be put in peril, but on such evidence as is, by the law of the land, considered sufficient to put him upon his defence. And here I would again call your lordships' attention to the case of the Seven Bishops. When they were asked whether the petition was of their hand-writing or not, they were silent at first, but afterwards they admitted it to be their's, from motives which are well known to all who are acquainted with that part of our history. The petition was found in the hands of the king, in the county of Middlesex; and it was full as probable, in that case, that the bishops presented the petition to the king, as that the present defendant sent this manuscript to Mr. Cobbett; and yet, in that case, the evidence was held insufficient to prove a publication in the county of Middlesex. I submit to your lordships, that this species of evidence should be held insufficient to go to the jury, because the reception of such evidence may be detrimental to innocence, and because also it might have that effect in this case.

Mr. Richardson.—My lords, in this case I will admit there is prima facie evidence, that the papers in question are of the hand-writing of the defendant, and that they were found in the hands of Mr. Cobbett, and by him published; but then, as to the manner in which they were sent to him, I submit to your lordships the evidence is not sufficient to go to the jury. The first paper, as appears by the testimony of Mr. Cobbett, was brought to him in an envelope, by some person, but he knows not whom; or rather from some person, but he knows not whom. There is no evidence whatever to go to the jury, that these papers, thus sworn to be of the hand-writing of the defendant, were in the envelope thus sent;—there is no evidence whatever, that the paper was taken to the post-office in Dublin, which is the first step to be taken towards its transmission from that country into this;—there is no evidence whatever, that they were received in the post-office in this country, except the post-mark which Mr. Cobbett spoke of;—neither is there any evidence of the papers received by Mr. Cobbett, being the same papers that were received in this country from Ireland; for, as to the first paper, it appears that the packet was opened by Mr. Budd, before it was sent by him to Mr. Cobbett; and Mr. Budd does not appear to give evidence. And your lordships are now called on to say, that this shall affect a defendant criminally, without evidence of any thing to connect him with that envelope.

But, in the opinion of Mr. Cobbett, it seems there was the Dublin post-mark on this envelope; I say, my lords, "the opinion of Mr. Cobbett," for I do not think it can be carried farther, especially as Mr. Budd, who first received the packet, does not appear to inform us of the fact. This applies to the first packet. As to the second, it appears that Mr. Cobbett received it in an envelope unopened; but still, I submit to your lordships, there is no evidence to go to the jury in this case, for there is no evidence that any of these papers were received at the post-office; and that the established rule of law, "that of giving the best evidence which the nature of the thing is capable of affording," is not complied with on this occasion; and no presumption is to supply the want of such proof, nor can secondary evidence be received instead of it. They might have proved that these letters were received at the post-office in this country, and that they were delivered in the due course of the post to Mr. Budd, and by him delivered to Mr. Cobbett, which would be the best evidence, and which the law requires. Now what evidence is there, that these papers were received from the post-office? None. It is with them to supply that defect, and they might have done it: they might have proved it by the person who delivers such letters. Non constat, therefore, that it was delivered from the post-office. Then it stands thus, that Mr. Cobbett receives in Duke-street, Westminster, two papers, inclosed in some unknown envelope; non constat by whom sent, non constat by whom received. It is said, by Mr. Budd, but that is not proved; because Mr. Budd himself should have been here to prove that fact. Mr. Cobbett proves that he received them as coming from Mr. Budd; but that they came from Mr. Budd, does not appear, because the messenger who is supposed to bring these packets from Mr. Budd to Mr. Cobbett, is not here. Why then the whole matter rests upon the bare evidence of these letters being of the hand-writing of the defendant.

My lords, the writing itself is stated to be evidence of an intention to publish. Here, my lords, I would beg leave to consider the case of the Seven Bishops: in that case, it was proved that the paper charged to be a libel, was in the hand-writing of the defendants, directed to the king's most excellent majesty.—[Here the learned counsel read the title of the petition of the Seven Bishops to king James the second.]

My lords, that case afforded the very best evidence that can be given, of intention to present a petition to the king; for the bishops were found waiting for the king, expressing a desire to present a petition to his majesty; they were admitted into the royal presence; the petition was afterwards found in the hands of the king; so that there could not possibly be stronger evidence of intention to present a petition than this, nor a greater probability of its being actually presented, which was the only act to be proved to have been done by the Seven Bishops in Middlesex;—surely much stronger than the evidence carries this case, and yet it was there held insufficient to prove an act done in Middlesex. Here the libel is found in a state of publication in Middlesex; but I submit to your lordships, that there is a link wanting in the chain of evidence; which link is to show, that this libel was brought into Middlesex by the agency of this defendant. My lords, I say, that as the paper comes to Mr. Cobbett, nobody can tell, upon the evidence, from whom; therefore there is no publication, nor any act done by the defendant towards the publication, for a material link is wanting in the chain of evidence, that of showing that the paper came into the county of Middlesex by the agency of the defendant. That was the deficiency in the evidence on the trial of the Seven Bishops. There was the very best of all possible evidence in that case, as to the intention to present the petition to the king; the petition was written in Surrey; the bishops acknowledged it to be theirs; they were charged with having presented it to the king in the county of Middlesex; but there was no evidence of any one act being done by them in Middlesex, although the inference was almost irresistible, that they did present the petition to the king in Middlesex; yet, as there was no proof of it, the link was wanting in the chain of evidence, and it was held insufficient. I do beg leave to call your lordships attention to this point, as it appears illustrated by that case; and to remind your lordships, that the period in which the trial of the Seven Bishops took place, was one in which evidence was as favourably received for prosecutions, especially such as were immediately at the instance, and under the direct influence of the crown, as any in the whole of our history; but the want of that link in the chain, as I have already stated, made the Court declare there was not evidence to be sent to the jury.

My lords, as to what was thrown out by one of your lordships, that if a person in one county writes, or causes to be written, a letter to another person, and causes it to be received in another county, and that other publishes that letter, it shall be taken to be a publication by the author of the letter, or the person sending it, in the county in which it is received and published; that I certainly admit; and sir Bartholomew Shower puts that case, and Mr. Justice John Powell answers it. "The law is as the recorder said, and I have no disposition to controvert it." But here is no evidence of any sending, or causing it to be sent; that material link in the chain, which might have been procured, is wanting: it is not proved by the postmark of the letter, if that was any evidence at all; that mark, such as it was, is lost. The officer of the post-office could speak to one of these points. But there is no evidence that the person was in the place from whence the libel came; there is no evidence even, that the defendant was in Dublin at that time; or that he ever sent it to the post-office; or that any such letter was received there. Even the person to whom it was directed is not here; but somebody conveys these papers to Duke-street, Westminster, and all this utterly unconnected with the defendant; I therefore submit, that unless your lordships over-rule the case of the Seven Bishops, this cannot be sufficient to go to the jury.

Lord Ellenborough.—There is nothing in the judgment the Court is about to pronounce on this point that will over-rule,—nothing that will tend to over-rule,—nothing that is meant to over-rule the doctrine laid down in the case of the Seven Bishops. But it is most extraordinary that it has not occurred to any gentleman, that there is no question of the fact of publication here; for that the act of publication by Mr. Cobbett took place in the county of Middlesex is unquestionable. The only question therefore is, whether the defendant procured that act to be done; for if he did, Mr. Justice Johnson is responsible for the act to which he has been accessory. And although surely much and important evidence is to be collected from the papers themselves to show whether the defendant applied to Mr. Cobbett to publish them; yet we are now called upon by the defendant's counsel, before we have read these papers for the purpose of seeing whether there has been this procurement or not, to say that there has been no procurement. Whether there was or not such procurement, it will be left to the jury to determine.

As to the case of the Seven Bishops; those most reverend and moral persons were called upon, before they knew that a prosecution was to be commenced, to say whether the petition was their writing; some were supposed to answer in the affirmative, and this being a species of extorted confession, could not avail before a court of justice constituted as that was; whereupon the evidence of lord Sunderland was called forth, on which it was held that there was evidence to go to the jury to determine whether the bishops did in fact deliver the paper to his majesty and solicit his majesty to receive it, and thereby published it in Middlesex. I incline to think that there was then evidence to go to the jury. But what was the paper itself? A libel? No; it was a fair, decent, loyal remonstrance to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased not to enforce his authority in the exercise of an important prerogative of the crown, by commanding these his most reverend subjects to conform to his will by reading his royal proclamation. This petition was indeed called a libel; but was it a libel? No. Where however is the analogy between that case and the present? Here is a paper, which every body admits to be a libel, published in the county of Middlesex; and if the thing be, as undoubtedly it is, a libel, the only question is, whether the defendant procured it to be published in the county of Middlesex. I will not observe on the communication which took place, by letter, previously inquiring how the future correspondence should be directed, and even how the writer should subscribe his own communications. I think there may be, as the attorney-general has stated (and he would not mislead the Court, by stating that to be in the libel which is not to be found in it), internal evidence of the fact now in question, which would be manifested by the reading of the papers; so that if we were to refuse admitting this as evidence to go to the jury, we should be defeating the ends of public justice.

The question is, whether Mr. Cobbett published this libel by the procurement of the defendant? if he did, the offence is established; for, by the law of the land, the publication is as much the act of the person who procures it to be done, as it is the act of him who does it. God forbid that we should violate any of the sound principles of the case of the Seven Bishops, or of any other on which the rights and liberties of the subjects of this country so much depend. We are not violating any principle whatever of law or justice, or the practice of courts of justice; we are proceeding in the fair open path of our public duty, by receiving, and therefore we ought to receive this evidence, and lay it before the jury for their consideration.

Mr. Justice Grose.—I am of the same opinion.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—I am also of the same opinion. The case of the Seven Bishops bears no analogy to this. They were prosecuted for a petition which was presented to the king; which petition it was thought fit in those days to call a libel; it was framed in Lambeth-palace, and delivered to the king, but where delivered to the king did not appear; and in order to fix a delivery to the king in the county of Middlesex, inferences were attempted to be drawn; but hand-writing in the county of Surrey, was all that was proved, or rather that an admission of it was made by some of the bishops in Middlesex; now it would be extraordinary that a hand-writing admitted in a county, could be taken as proof of publication in that county; and that was all the proof in that case, except that of one of them having the petition in his hand when he asked an audience of the king in council, in the county of Middlesex; it was charged to be a publication in the county of Middlesex, of which there was not one tittle of proof—that is a case which, therefore, bears no analogy to this. Here is proof of a publication in the county of Middlesex; proof of that paper having come to the hands of Mr. Cobbett, in the county of Middlesex; and the question is, whether or not this defendant sent it to Mr. Cobbett. Mr. Cobbett having received previous letters, inquiring whether or not it would be agreeable to him to have communications of this sort, and there having been an advertisement in his Register, stating in answer that it would be so, Mr. Cobbett then receives, in the hand-writing (as it stands at present) of the defendant Mr. Justice Johnson, these manuscripts. Whether the paper so received be or be not of the hand-writing of the defendant? Whether or not, it was sent by the defendant, or by another person? are questions surely for the jury to exercise their judgment upon. How they will exercise that judgment is another matter.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—I am of the same opinion. Previous communication in the county of Middlesex, from whom is not now the question, but previous communication is proved to have taken place with the witness Cobbett; desiring to know, whether letters respecting the public affairs of Ireland, would be acceptable to him? and if so, whither they should be sent? to which a public communication is made by way of answer, stating whither they are to be sent, which is followed by the reception of the letters now before us; the letter itself (I do not speak of the direction), stands at present proved to be in the hand-writing of the defendant. It is objected that there is no proof that these letters came by the post, or by what means they came; whether they came by the post, or by a private hand, stands at present subject to answer and observation; but they appear upon the evidence at present before us, to be of the handwriting of the defendant; and, supposing them to be so, it is to be collected by the jury, and by them determined, whether they were delivered in the county of Middlesex to Mr. Cobbett, with intention to be published or not? I cannot entertain a doubt, that that is evidence to be sent to a jury: what conclusion they will draw, is another question. In the case of the Seven Bishops, the publication was not proved; it was admitted by some of them, that they were the authors of the petition to the king, but proof of the publication was wanting.

[Here the libels were read from the manuscript, by one of the officers of the crown, and the ingrossed indictment compared with it by the other, in which there were a few trivial errors, but none of a nature to invalidate it; adding a short postscript not printed, to one of the letters, where all the blood was supposed to be drawn to the heart of the empire, and the extremities were cold, &c.]

Mr. Garrow.—I have a question or two to put to Mr. Cobbett, if you will give me leave, my lords.

Mr. Cobbett re-examined by Mr. Garrow.

You have stated to the Court and the jury, that the first communication you received on the subject has been destroyed?—The letter has not been destroyed, the greater part of it was published in the Register some time before the second was published.

Mr. Garrow.—You are not attending to my question?—Yes, I am sir; part of it was omitted.

Did that letter give you any intimation of the manner in which your correspondent wished you should announce your receipt of his communication, and accession to his future correspondence?—He asked me whether it would be agreeable to me to receive true and useful information respecting that country; if it would be agreeable to me, he desired me to say so, in the next number of the Register which should be published after the receipt of his letter.

In what manner were you to say it in your next number?—In order that the people of the post-office in Ireland might not intercept his letters, he requested me to address him, or to give a hint, as if the correspondent lived at York, which I did accordingly.

Is this your next number in which you did give the hint, as if your correspondent did live at York?—I believe that is the one in which I gave the hint, in which I did give the intimation "the York correspondent will find his answer, &c."

VOL. XXIX.

Mr. Adam.—How is this evidence, my lords?

Mr. Garrow.—In consequence of this, a second and a third were published?—After the first, it was stated in the Register, "the York correspondent will find his answer at Mr. Budd's, No. 100, Pall-mall."

In consequence of this, other letters were sent to Mr. Budd?—Yes.

Mr. Cobbett cross-examined a second time by Mr. Adam.

You have been talking of the first letter?—Yes.

Do you mean to say that letter is destroyed?—Yes.

How do you know?—I do not believe it is in existence at any rate. I will explain why; I sent the manuscript to the press, there it is with the printer, if not destroyed; sometimes a manuscript is destroyed, and sometimes it is not destroyed. Two of these letters, and only these two, I believe, remained. I do not know whether the fourth did not remain; the fourth remained, I believe, since the prosecution commenced; the fourth was not complained of by any body, but the first letter was destroyed by the printer or by me.

Did you see it destroyed?—No, I have not; when I came to look at these two papers, and I think the fourth, they were kept; and the others, thinking them of no consequence, were all destroyed.

The first letter, you say, was sent to the printer, and you have never seen it since?—I do not know whether he destroyed it, or I destroyed it myself.

Lord Ellenborough.—If it existed, it would have been returned to you?—Yes, sometimes they are sent back, sometimes not sent back; for if the proof is sent to the printer, the copy is sent back.

Mr. Adam.—But the last time you saw it, was when you found it at the printer's?—I do not know.

Have you been to look for it at the printer's office?—No.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—The first letter never was printed, introductory of the correspondence? ask him that, Mr. Adam.

Mr. Adam.—It is in the publication, my lord.

Mr. Park.—That which appears upon the face of things here, would seem to be first, but in point of fact, it was published the second.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—I want to know whether that introductory letter to the correspondence was ever printed?

Lord Ellenborough.—Stating, "If agreeable to you to receive true and useful information," and desiring it to be published.

Mr. Garrow.—That, of course, could not be published.

Mr. Adam.—Was part of that letter published?—Yes; but that part, which related to the mode of transmitting was not, of course; because it was of no use to any body, but to the author and myself.

Look whether that is not a portion of that letter which you published?—Yes, and it is stated so here in the note.

Was the letter you received sent to the printer?—That letter was, with the part relating to the correspondence left out, which I considered as of no use; the whole was sent to the printer, all but that part.

Have you ever received it back from the printer?—I do not know; from the irregular manner of the course of business, it is impossible I should know.

Have you ever been to the printer's for it?—No.

Lord Ellenborough.—The probability is, he would not send it back again.

Mr. Adam.—They ought to have called the printer to prove it destroyed.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—You mean that the first part was sent to the printer's. Cobbett says it was not.

Mr. Adam.—The original of it was only struck through with a pen.—[to Mr. Cobbett.] Do you say struck through with a pen?—As a mark of what they were not to print.

Do you know whether that was received back?—It is impossible for me to know; it is impossible for any one concerned in printing to know.

Mr. Adam.—I submit that this is not evidence of the destruction of it, and that they should show the original.

Mr. Park.—They give it to the printer with all the parts of the letter, some of which are struck through with a pen; the witness says that he sent it to the printer, and that he never saw it again, but that he never searched for it; I submit to your lordships, that the proof is defective in this case, for that they ought to have called the printer, to show that he had, or had not, destroyed the letters, or to show that he had searched for, and could not find it; and that this evidence should be completely before us, before this case can go to the jury.

Lord Ellenborough.—I think he says it was the usual course for letters to come back to him, but this paper did not; that he searched where it was most probable to be found, and that he could not find it; he found the others; which shows that the escrutoire or bureau wherein he searched, was the natural place for the custody of such papers, because it is the place wherein he found all the rest.

Mr. Adam.—Your lordships will think it right that we should suggest to the Court our objection on the ground of the defectiveness of this evidence; that the admission of it, and its being held sufficient to go to the jury, may remain in your minds, your lordships will take a note of it.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—The better way will be to take Cobbett's evidence down, for the purpose of deciding on the question, whether it ought to go to the jury.

Mr. Adam.—The short objection is, that there is no proof of a search having been made at the printer's office, to decide that it is lost, in order to let in secondary evidence, instead of producing the paper itself.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc.—No proof of any search ever having taken place at the printer's office. Mr. Cobbett, the fact is, you never searched at the printer's?—No, my lord, only where I found the others.

Mr. Justice Lawrence.—Is it usual, in the course of business, for printers to preserve such manuscripts?—No, my lord; after the printing is done, they throw it into a large place, and it is destroyed of course.

Mr. Garrow.—What the printers do preserve they send back to you?

Mr. Attorney General.—What they do not themselves destroy?

Witness.—What they do not destroy, they send back to me.

Mr. Park.—Will your lordship be pleased to ask Mr. Cobbett, whether it is not very usual for printers to file the papers which they do not send back.

Lord Ellenborough.—Is it usual for the printer to file papers which he does not send back?—With some printers, and for certain works, they may, for aught I know; but for mine, it never was the custom.

Mr. Garrow.—We now propose to read the Dublin Gazette of the 29th of April 1802, to show that my lord Redesdale took the oaths of his office.

Mr. Park.—We will first ask, by way of form to support our objection, where the printer lives; to show that he is within reach of the process of the Court. Where is your printer's office situated, Mr. Cobbett?—In Great Queen's-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields.

Mr. Attorney General.—That is our case, my lords.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Adam.—Gentlemen of the jury; I am now to address you on the part of the defendant;—a most anxious duty, considering the rank and character which he holds, and the offence with which he is charged.

The defendant, you know, is a supreme judge in Ireland. You have already heard, that previous to the Union he had long been a member of the Irish House of Commons, and continued a representative in the parliament of his native country, until the Union put an end to the existence of the legislature of that country. You have heard, that during a great portion of his life he has enjoyed situations of great trust and responsibility in the law, particularly as counsel to the boards of revenue; and it is manifest, that obloquy is as likely to be attached to the discharge of the duties of that station, as to any legal situation under the crown, yet there is not a whisper to the prejudice of his character.

This defendant, then, up to the period of the Union with Ireland, appears to you in proof as a diligent servant of the state, and member of parliament. Gentlemen, the seal to that great national compact, which united the three kingdoms in one, was hardly cold, when the seal was put to the defendant's patent as a supreme judge, by the advice of the same confidential servants of the Crown, who were the authors of the Union, and who are now the ministers of the king. Gentlemen, is it likely that they would have selected at that time, and under those circumstances, a person whose principles unfitted him for that high and responsible situation, one who was prone to other and to criminal acts, inconsistent with the dignity and probity of the judicial character? or that Mr. Justice Johnson, who in all his former life had been a supporter of the government in parliament, and placed in executive situations of great trust, should, when clothed with the robes of magistracy, advanced in years, and visited with bodily infirmity, become a libeller of the government which elevated him, and a traducer of the fame of those who hold political and professional situations of highest dignity and respect? Such a prosecution against such a person, excites the utmost anxiety in my mind, who have to conduct his defence, and cannot fail to create the most lively interest and deliberate consideration in yours.

Mr. Attorney General has thought proper to enforce his arguments by stating the aggravated nature of the offence, and the characters of those who are libelled. It seemed to me as if he had been misled into those topics by the present appearance of the Court; and to imagine, because he saw four judges instead of one,—the usual constitution of the Court when juries are assembled,—that he was speaking in aggravation of punishment after the party had been convicted, and not in order to obtain the verdict of a jury finding him guilty. But, gentlemen, I do not state this to complain of it; on the contrary, you shall not hear from me that this publication is no libel; it forms no part of my case to extenuate its malignity: I deny that the judge, this defendant, has any connexion with it; I mean to satisfy you by proof that he neither published it, wrote it, nor composed it; consequently, that he has no interest whatever in the character of the thing published.

Gentlemen, I have as little interest in finding fault with the manner in which Mr. Attorney General endeavoured to excite you, by the picture he drew of the persons libelled, and which he did with peculiar elegance and taste, in the character he gave of the noble and learned person with whom he is so nearly connected. All that he said of that noble and learned person, whom we all know and value as he does; all that he said of lord Hardwicke, Mr. Justice Osborne, and Mr. Secretary Marsden, I am ready to adopt and make my own; because the more he exalts their name and reputation, the more he describes the libel to be virulent, the less likely was a person in the exalted station of judge, with the purity belonging to that character, to be guilty of this offence.

Gentlemen, I shall, by proof contradicting that which you have heard, reduce this to a mere question of probability. Whether it is probable that the learned judge could be the author of a libel on such persons, will be the question for you to determine. He could not be moved to such an act by any rational motive of interest, or any vindictive disposition to resentment. If he looked for farther preferment, to whom could he apply but to the lord lieutenant and the chancellor? Mr. Marsden was a person to be courted, not to be offended; and Mr. Justice Osborne being the youngest judge on the bench, much his junior, could not be an object of his jealousy or his malice. It will be your duty, gentlemen, in the consideration of this case, to refer to all these circumstances as the grounds of your verdict. If there are no corroborating facts, and you must observe that there is not one, not one circumstance of collateral evidence tending to connect the defendant with the publication in question, and as there is nothing but the mere proof of hand-writing to induce a belief that this gentleman was the author, I will venture to say that you must acquit.

I wish not to consume more time than my duty requires; but there is still one important subject for preliminary observation. Mr. Attorney General has alluded to the measures taken by the learned judge to prevent this question being tried here, and he has reserved himself on that subject, in case it should be entered into by me.

Gentlemen, I desire it to be understood, that I enter upon it with no invidious object: I mean to make no complaint. My purposes are to set the defendant fairly before this tribunal without prejudice, and to show you how importantly the transactions in Ireland in respect to the place of trial, bear upon the fact.

In this part of the case it is material to attend to dates. At the sittings after Easter term, Mr. Cobbett was tried for this libel; and, about the same time, a bill depended in parliament, to secure the trial of persons, being in Ireland, who had committed offences here, and to bring them here for that purpose. That act received the royal assent on the 20th of July, 1804. In the month of November following, the bill of indictment was found against the present defendant, and his person was taken in Ireland, under a warrant to bring him here. When this arrest took place, nothing had been provided, but the power to bring the parties here; there was no power to accept bail, and he had no means of compelling the attendance of his witnesses. It was not till the 10th of July, 1805, twelve months after the passing of the former act, that this second statute, giving this most important power, received the royal assent. If the learned judge had submitted to the law, as it then stood, defective in that most essential feature of justice, the means of obtaining testimony (and acknowledged to be so defective by the legislature itself, when it passed the amending act), he must have been tried without the power of securing to himself the presence of those, whose evidence must establish his innocence.

That he had good grounds for doubting that the statute applied to his case, is clear from this; that there were three judges of opinion, that his case was not within the law; three of the contrary opinion; of course, the execution of the warrant was suspended. Can it be inferred then, that the agitating such a question, under such circumstances, could imply any thing like a sense of guilt? or was it not a duty which the defendant owed to himself, to ensure a trial where he could have all the means and attributes likely to obtain justice?

I can assure you, gentlemen, it was not a wish to avoid, or a fear to encounter this tribunal, which directed his conduct:—he knows the sagacity, the intelligence, the lenity, the conscientious disposition of an English jury, superintended by an English Court. Could he have transferred this tribunal to Dublin, he would have been perfectly satisfied. It was not the aversion to convey an English Court to Ireland, but to have himself conveyed to England, that actuated him. It was most reasonable, under the defective powers of the law, as it stood antecedent to the 10th of July, 1805, that he should have been so actuated. Even now, how defective is that power! He is loaded with all the expense of bringing his witnesses here.

Gentlemen, the situation of a puisne judge, in the supreme courts of England or Ireland, is full of dignity, and of the first consideration; but unless there has been a previously successful practice at the bar, or the aid of private fortune, it is not above mediocrity in point of income: it is unable to accomplish more than the common expense of living in a manner suited to the dignity of the office. The defendant is not ashamed to have it said, that the expense of the trial is too much for him to bear; and that to have brought all the witnesses who would have been useful in his defence, to England, would have pressed him to the ground. But no expense, in bringing witnesses here, could have placed him in the situation he would have enjoyed by being tried there. He has lived long and respectably there; he is known to all the bench; he is looked up to by a numerous and independent bar; he is the friend and acquaintance of all public men: they all know his character; many know his hand-writing, on which this question singly turns, without one collateral fact to aid it, and with every presumption against the libel being his. No event could have occurred in the cause, but there would have been a witness of credit and reputation, known to the tribunal and knowing them, ready to be produced. Here he is unknown; except my learned friends who are his counsel with me, and myself, there is not one who hears me, who ever saw his person, or knows his character.

The number of his witnesses can be but few: he could not afford to bring more. He must rest upon their testimony, without the power of adding to it. The witnesses are not known to you: they come from another country, and you have not the means of appreciating their testimony by a knowledge of their characters.

This is a hard state of things, where the whole depends upon a belief of hand-writing, positive and negative. But, gentlemen, I address a patient and most attentive tribunal, incapable of prejudice, and sure to administer justice in mercy.

That this gentleman belongs to another country, that he was born and has always lived in Ireland, will raise no prejudice in your minds, but will render you more scrupulously anxious to weigh the testimony by which the question is to be decided.

Gentlemen, here are two questions for you to try. The first is, the publication; the second, whether the defendant wrote the libel in question? They may be said both to turn ultimately upon the same proof—the belief of hand-writing.

The Court has not decided that there is proof of publication; it has only decided that there is evidence of publication for you to consider. It still remains, therefore, with you to say, whether the publication has been proved.

It is material to observe, that the counsel for the prosecution thought it necessary to try to mend their case in this respect, by calling Mr. Cobbett again; they endeavoured to get from him the loss of the first or introductory letter, so as to give proof of the hand-writing and contents of that letter. Now observe how this stands: Mr. Cobbett says he sent it to the printer, and that he never saw it more; but he does not otherwise prove it to be lost. To have proved it lost or destroyed, they should have called the printer, who would have had to prove what he did with it; and if he proved it lost or destroyed, the evidence of its contents might have been given. But at present there is no evidence that you can rest upon, connecting the first or introductory letter, with the letters set forth in the indictment. Even if there were an opening to such evidence, what does it amount to, but that it appears to Mr. Cobbett to have been the same hand-writing with the other papers? But this is no evidence for you to act upon in a criminal case, as a proof of publication. To resort to this evidence does not advance the case for the Crown, in point of proof; but shows, by bringing Mr. Cobbett forward again, that they did not think the case sufficient without it.

The question of publication is founded, as you have already heard, on the doctrine to be derived from the case of the Seven Bishops.

It is not enough to prove intention, or even solemn deliberate resolution to publish; it is necessary to prove an act of publication, otherwise it is to be supposed that the intention was not executed. In this case there is no proof of any step having been taken towards publication by the defendant. The Dublin post-mark proves nothing. The letter may have been put into the post by ten thousand people of that city, without the authority and privity of the defendant, and there is no proof of either. There is nothing to connect the defendant with the cover in which it was transmitted; they do not even attempt to make it out to be addressed by him. Supposing him, for argument's sake, to have written it, it is perfectly consistent with that fact that he should never have sent it; and it is essential, on every principle of justice, that it should not be presumed or inferred without proof.

A fact in the history of the literature of this country, affords the most convincing evidence of the danger of a contrary doctrine. If the doctrine contended for by the prosecutors were sound, lord Bolingbroke might have been convicted of a libel for publishing the Patriot King, though it is perfectly well known that lord Bolingbroke, the author of that work, did not publish it, but that Mr. Pope, secretly, and without lord Bolingbroke's knowledge, did publish it. The question then being, whether there is proof of Mr. Justice Johnson having published Juvena in Middlesex, by sending it from Ireland, he being resident there; I submit confidently, that there is no proof that he did any act to send it hither; and the presumption arising from what is contained in the letters themselves, cannot be resorted to; but if it were, it then brings the whole to the question of what credit is due to proof of hand-writing?

And this is chiefly to be considered in the second question which you have to try.

Gentlemen, there are many singular features in this sort of evidence, well worthy of consideration. You will remark, that the positive evidence of the witnesses, who say they believe this to be his hand-writing, cannot be encountered by any negative evidence, except that of belief that it is not his writing.

But before I enter upon the topics which this part of the case suggests, I wish to draw, from the purest source, a doctrine of the utmost importance in all criminal trials.

That revered and excellent judge, Mr. Justice John Powell, in the case of the Seven Bishops, so much referred to, says—"I think you have not sufficiently proved this paper to be subscribed by my lords the bishops."

The Solicitor General says—"What, not to read it?"

Mr. Justice Powell.—"No, not to read it: It is too slender a proof for such a case. I grant you, in civil actions, a slender proof is sufficient to make out a man's hand, by a letter to a tradesman, a correspondent, or the like; but in criminal cases, such as this, if such a proof be allowed, where is the safety of your life, or any man's life here?"*

Gentlemen, I do not contend for a different principle of evidence, but for a more strict attention to it; a more anxious leaning not to be satisfied with presumptive proof. In the ordinary transactions of civil life, in writing a note or bill, in sending a letter on business, in acknowledging a debt, there are concomitant acts which are easily traced, and afford the means of repelling the affirmative by negative proof of facts and circumstances; but in this case it is impossible. Here is no proof of a habit of public writing, no proof of particular time, or particular instruments of writing, no single fact on which negative proof can rest. To make out a negative, you must prove, in this case, every fact inconsistent with the affirmative proof of belief, or similitude of hand-writing. There are no means of establishing a negative in this case, but by proving all that he did, night and day, from the date of the first letter of Juvena, to the publication of the last. Can such an impossible proof be called for, to satisfy you of the innocence of the defendant? and will it not be sufficient to answer the evidence of the belief of the hand-writing by negative belief, by proof that it is not believed to be his writing?

Gentlemen, in this matter of hand-writing, and the credit due to the sort of testimony by which it is established, I shall be under the necessity of going somewhat more into general principles than is usual in this place.

Judicial tribunals instituted to judge of the acts of men, are not eye-witnesses to those acts: all justice is distributed through the medium of proof by witnesses; you, in that place, do not see the act which is to be the subject of your judgment: you have not the highest of all demonstration in matter of fact, your own ocular inspection, the evidence of your own eyes; but where the witnesses are competent in capacity, unbiassed by interest, and the truth is secured by the dread of the punishment of perjury, you have that upon which you can safely proceed; you have what may be termed legal demonstration, the highest testimony of which the subject is capable, founded on this clear intelligible principle, that if the witness speak truth, the fact to which he speaks must be true. But in speaking to hand-writing, where the witness has not seen the thing actually written, but speaks from his general knowledge of the hand, to his belief of a particular piece of writing which he has never seen before, he does not give that testimony which I have termed legal demonstration, for the witness may speak truth, he may be as pure and unsullied as an angel, and yet the fact to which he speaks may be utterly false; that is, the writing which he believes to be, from his idea of similitude, the writing of a certain person, may not be the writing of that person.

In all such cases, of which there are many instances in the law, it is most important to have the fact supported by corroborating circumstances; it is testimony of so doubtful a nature, so liable to mistake, so marked with this most material and important distinction, namely, that you cannot depend on the truth of the fact, though you may depend on the truth of the witness, that it is always supported by concurring testimony, to render the proof complete. As I have already said, there are no means whatever of meeting it with negative testimony, to prove that the paper was not written by the person whose hand-writing is the subject of inquiry.

This negative testimony may be more easily obtained in ordinary transactions of life. A person may account for his time and his acts, to falsify testimony of hand-writing to a bond, or a bill, or a letter; but to such a charge as this no such testimony can be had; therefore, in the language of Mr. Justice Powell, if such proof is allowed to prevail, without any thing to support it, where is the safety of any man's life?

I am sure therefore, gentlemen, that you will not permit this evidence to make an impression on your minds, especially when you consider the case which I have to lay before you.

But first, let us examine the testimony of the witnesses for the crown. You must see from the way in which I consider this case, that I do not mean to impeach their credit as honest men. Mr. Attorney General is at liberty, with regard to their veracity as men, to consider them, in the language of the civilians, as omni exceptione majores; but the subject matter of their testimony is perfectly the reverse, it is the most uncertain, the most liable to mistake, that can be adduced in a court of justice.

Many persons write alike; having the same teacher, writing in the same office, being of the same family, all these produce similitude in hand-writing, which in common cases, and by common observers, is not liable to be distinguished. The hand-writing of the same person varies at different periods of life: it is affected by age, by infirmity, by habit. In this case you will observe, that all the witnesses say that the libel is more correctly written, the letters better cut, than the defendant's usual writing. Now, gentlemen, is this probable? these witnesses have not seen him write, nor been accustomed to see or examine his hand-writing for five years from this time; and the writing in question is written three years later than their habits of intercourse with his hand. Here are five years for loss of memory, and three years for the change of the character in writing, precisely at the time of life when the hand becomes less vigorous, the letter less clearly cut, and when, if there is any disease, or approaching disease, affecting the system of the nerves, or any paralytic debility, all those defects increase.

In hand-writing, the evidence, by the law of England, is now fixed. It was fluctuating for a considerable time; and even after the act reversing Algernon Sydney's attainder, which declared that comparison of hands was not legal evidence of hand-writing, it was not quite settled; but it was often contended, that comparison of hands should be considered as good evidence. Now, and for a long time back, the great variety of transactions, from the extent of commerce and paper circulation, has rendered it perfectly fixed, and universally known; and there is not any person who has been twice in a court of justice, who does not know it as well as any of us, who pass our lives here.

The proof is now entirely confined to belief from recollection. The witness must have been accustomed to see the person write, or to have corresponded with him; by these means he must have attained a knowledge of his hand; writing by the same person being always performed in the same way, having a distinct character, different from the rest of the world, like the features of the face, so that you come to know the writing, as you know the countenance; but with this consideration, that recent acquaintance, frequent inspection, or want of opportunity to inspect, must make a great difference in the credit due to the witness; and the power of imitation, as well as accidental similarity, must have an influence in diminishing the credit due to the belief.

The person who deposes to writing, must first, from habit, have formed an abstract picture in his mind, of the writing; and he must, upon the moment, apply that to the particular instance. To render him a witness of credit, he must have the knowledge of writing generally, and be in habits of knowing the particular writing in question; and he must be left to the fair operation of his mind, without leading or prepossession. For the character of writing is much better known by its general aspect, than by minute examination; for example, when I look at the writing of my friend who sits by me, I say immediately on inspection, knowing his hand, 'that is Mr. Park's hand.' I do not find it necessary to look at the cut of particular letters, or the form of particular words. This last implies a want of acquaintance with, or correct memory of the general character of the hand; the mind has not obtained the abstract idea, and is therefore correcting it by particular features.

The witnesses for the prosecution stand in this predicament—they speak to the cut of particular letters, and not to the general hand merely—they have inspected this before—they come here not with correct original general knowledge of the hand from recent habit and inspection, but with a belief confirmed by recent and repeated inspection of the particular papers. They were led to this belief by being brought to this country for the express purpose of inspecting Mr. Justice Johnson's writing. They were shown it in July 1804, soon after Mr. Cobbett had delivered up the manuscript; again before the grand jury; and again since they came here last: thus impressing on their minds what might first create, and afterwards confirm their belief: not brought to it by asking whose writing it was, but whether it was the defendant's.

They are none of them persons in habits of familiar intercourse or correspondence with him, but all clerks in office, or attorney's clerks, who knew his writing in his official or professional character five years ago.

It is a most singular feature in the proof to support this prosecution, that instead of bringing the companions and equals of Mr. Justice Johnson, those who live in his society, and discharge the same or similar duties with him, persons who know his writing up to this hour, the prosecutors should have sought such witnesses as those they have adduced. That instead of confirming the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury, by persons of high respect and known character, equal to the defendant in rank, acquainted with him and his habits of writing, they should proceed in a sort of anti-climax in their evidence, beginning with Mr. Waller, a person who knew his writing officially, by being in the revenue department, to which the defendant was counsel, and ending with Mr. Edwards, not a witness on the bill of indictment, but brought now to help out the case—a young clerk, who had very little opportunity of seeing him write, who was only fourteen years of age when he became acquainted with the defendant, and not twenty-one when all intercourse ceased. This is strange corroborating testimony, when the whole bar and bench of Ireland was open to the subpoena of the crown.

But the terms in which the principal witness speaks, are extremely important, and deserve your most particular attention. Mr. Waller does not speak with certainty but with doubt. He is asked whether he believes it to be the hand-writing of the defendant, and afterwards whether he is certain of it. And he says, "I am as certain of it as it is possible for any man to be on such a subject." So that Mr. Waller admits uncertainty in the subject-matter, and his answer implies that he may be mistaken in the particular instance.

Gentlemen, this evidence, unsupported by any fact, contradicted by the rank, the situation, the habits (for where is the proof of his having dealt in such matters before?) of the defendant, ought not to influence you to believe that he is the writer of this libel.

But, gentlemen, you cannot hesitate to disbelieve that he is the author, when this testimony is encountered by negative proof, by witnesses who will prove that they do not believe it to be his hand-writing;—witnesses who live in habits of constant correspondence with him up to the present time; who cannot be mistaken as to their knowledge; who have the most perfect means of knowledge; who are not like the witnesses for the crown, proving a similitude of the particular writing, from an antiquated knowledge of the general hand, and who were confirming a belief which they had been guided to form by previous inspection, and a prepossession that they were to see the defendant's hand-writing. The witnesses whom I shall produce to you must speak without preparation or previous knowledge of the writing in question, which they have never seen, but which will be submitted to them now for the first time, and which they will speak to from a thorough knowledge of the writing of the defendant.

If this tribunal had sat in Dublin, instead of sitting here, I should have been able to have called a numerous audience to corroborate that testimony. The trial being, in what, to this gentleman, is a foreign country, deprives him of that advantage. I am farther instructed, that I shall prove to you that the habit of forging franks, frequent in this country, was still more frequent in Ireland; that he was from his professional situation, exposed to this more than any body; and it is less surprising, therefore, that something should have been produced resembling his hand-writing.

Gentlemen, under these circumstances, I am quite sure that you will see that I am venturing a proof which implies the most thorough consciousness of innocence on the part of the defendant. And you will not fail to recollect, that the higher the crime, the more strict ought to be the proof. The nature of the crime with which the learned judge is charged, may be deemed more weighty, and may be ranked in a higher class of offences than belongs to it in the scale of criminal actions, from the consideration of the character and station of the person who is charged with it. What would be a light offence in a person in the ordinary walks of life, becomes a high crime in a person whose time should be devoted to the distribution of justice, and whose pursuits and habits should be totally alien to publishing what may be thought a libel. You will not fail to bear this in your minds, and to require that the proof should be more clear and satisfactory in proportion.

Gentlemen, this is a charge of libel or defamation, unsupported by collateral proof, or by any corroborating fact. It rests on evidence liable to mistake—on evidence which may be all false, and yet the witnesses pure. It is reduced in short, as I said at the outset, to a question of probability.

Is it likely then that a person who held official situations of high consideration;—a person formerly a member of parliament;—a person always in the habit of supporting government; not in the practice of anonymous publications;—the first person promoted to the bench on the completion of the Union, and that too by the very ministers who accomplished that work, and who now fill the councils of the king;—that such a person, now clothed with the revered and sacred character of a judge in the supreme tribunals of his country, should be guilty of composing and publishing such a libel, where there was no motive whatever to induce him to it, but every thing to produce a contrary impression? It is not credible.

Under these circumstances, you will consider whether it is possible for you to pronounce a verdict which shall sully the purity of the judicial character of your country.

Gentlemen, you will not fail to recollect, that the ermine of Ireland and of England is the same; that without offence to the respected and respectable tribunal which here presides, I might suppose the charge to be made against a judge of this country;—with what anxiety and hesitation would you weigh the testimony!—In your minds any distinction founded on national partiality cannot be supposed to exist. You will recollect that the judges of Ireland dispense the same law, live under the same political system, are educated in the same seminaries, guided by the same morality, practise, profess and believe in the same religion with the judges here. When you contemplate such a character, accused of such a crime, resting on such proof, to be met by contrary testimony, I am confident that you will find this venerable judge, highly respectable for his learning and his talents, to be—Not Guilty.

EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENDANT.

Sir Henry Jebb sworn.—Examined by Mr. Park.

What are you by profession?—A surgeon, but I practise physic also. I hold a rank in the college of physicians, which obliges me.

Have you been long acquainted with Mr. Justice Johnson?—A very long time.

How many years?—About thirty years; considerably more than twenty.

Has your acquaintance with him been intimate?—Extremely so.

What aged man is Mr. Justice Johnson?—I should suppose somewhere near 60.

Have you attended him in your medical capacity?—Yes.

Is he, or has he been, in an infirm state of health?—He is at present considerably amended, but for some years back he has been extremely ill.

Has his illness affected his nerves?—Materially: he had a paralytic stroke, and lost the use of one side.

How long ago is it since he was so afflicted?—Perhaps a year and a half. He has been complaining for two or three years; he was apprehensive there was something on the brain, from the symptoms that appeared; but his disorder was paralytic.

Have you, in the course of this your intimate acquaintance with him, been in the habit of corresponding with him by letters?—Constantly, every week; it depended on the state of his health. I have been intimately acquainted with his hand-writing for twenty years.

Has your acquaintance with his hand-writing continued down to the present time?—Constantly.

Look very carefully at these papers, because you cannot have seen them before.

From your knowledge of his hand-writing, do you believe this is the hand-writing of judge Johnson?—I do believe this is not the hand-writing of judge Johnson. [The witness in this answer referred to the first libel, dated 29th October.]

Look at this (the libel of the 28th November)?—This strikes me to have less similitude than the other.

Your opinion is, that it has less similitude to his hand-writing than the other?—So it appears to me.

Is that hand-writing a lesser or fairer hand than judge Johnson writes?—It is not easy to describe what in hand-writing is similitude. His hand in general was larger and freer, and the turns of the long-tailed letters are different from his.

From your idea of his hand writing, by seeing it for so long a period, do you think this is his hand-writing?—My belief is, that it is not.

Your belief is not founded on comparison?—No; from my long knowledge of his habit of writing.

I think I understand you to have said that your acquaintance with his hand-writing has gone on without interruption?—There never has been an hour's interruption.

Sir Henry Jebb cross-examined by Mr. Attorney General.

Am I to understand you, that you think there is no resemblance between this and the defendant's general mode of writing?—No; there is a general resemblance between all hand-writings, or they could not be read; but this is very dissimilar to judge Johnson's.

Do you mean then that there is no other resemblance except that general resemblance which exists in all hand-writings?—It is not easy to draw this distinction: I think a person who was not acquainted with his manner of writing, might be led to say there was; a person not so intimately acquainted with his writing as I am, might think so.

Then you think it has some resemblance to the hand-writing of Mr. Justice Johnson?—Yes.

Is it more like what he wrote three or four years ago?—I do not think there is any difference in that respect, the paralytic disorder has not affected his hand-writing; it was his side that was affected.

The right side, I believe?—Yes.

Do you recollect the period?—Yes, he was just recovering from it at the time of his arrest. I happened to be visiting him at the time he was arrested.

In the beginning of 1805?—Yes, in January.

But I think you say there is not now any material alteration in his hand-writing from what it was formerly?—I think not.

Then you think that those who were acquainted with it three or four years ago, may be equally well acquainted with it now as you are?—Certainly.

I think you make a distinction between the second libel and the first, and that there is less similitude between that than the other; from which I conclude, that you think one has more similitude than the other?—One appeared to me to be more cramped than the other.

You mean not so fair?—Yes.

Not so loose a hand?—I am at a loss to describe the difference in hand-writing: it is like the difference in the features of a man's face.

The difference, however, you think would strike any one?—I think it would.

You have had frequent opportunities of seeing Mr. Justice Johnson's hand-writing?—Yes.

Have you ever seen any writing of his that was prepared for the press?—I believe I may.

Do you recollect whether you have or not?—I do.

Written with more care?—I do not know I ever saw any that was prepared to go to the press.

Perhaps you never saw any of his writing, in which it was his object to crowd a great deal into a little space?—I have seen him writing, to crowd as much in as he could.

Was his hand then so cramped?—On all occasions I have seen him write a larger, freer hand.

What, when crowding any thing on a brief?—Indeed I have.

Have you had any opportunity of seeing writing, so resembling judge Johnson's writing, as to impose upon you?—I have seen hand-writings I could not distinguish from his.

You have seen some you could not distinguish from his?—Yes.

Have you had any occasion to know, that in these instances the hand-writing you saw was not his?—I certainly had.

How long ago may that be?—Some very short time; about a week before I left Dublin.

About a week before you left Dublin, you had an opportunity of seeing hand-writing that you could not distinguish from his?—I had.

Had you an opportunity of knowing whose hand-writing that was?—I had not.

Where was it the defendant produced it?—At my house in Stephen's-green.

Upon what occasion, and for what purpose was it shown to you?—The occasion was this: I was told that there was a person in Dublin who wrote so like judge Johnson, that it could not be distinguished; that he had written these letters; and that he would come forward and avow himself; but that his father held a place under government, and he was afraid he would be turned out if it was known; that he would write over these papers on blank sheets, to be previously marked by the company, in order that it might be ascertained that judge Johnson never wrote them. I marked the papers, and went into another room. I waited two or three hours till they were brought from another house.

And judge Johnson told you they were written by that person?—He did.

Is that like judge Johnson's hand-writing?—I do not think the copies I marked were like that hand-writing.

This was about a week before you came from Ireland?—A short time.

It took place with a view to your giving evidence?—Yes, for they made me put the initials of my name.

Did you ever see such imitation of judge Johnson's hand-writing, before he was charged with being the author of this libel?—Yes, imitation of franks, and such as that.

You understand that judge Johnson understands who the author is?—I do not know.

Then how could he communicate it to you?—It was not he, but another gentleman, who came and said he would produce the man.

It was not an accidental meeting?—No, not accidental.

Mr. Justice Johnson was present?—Yes.

Did he bring forward this gentleman, or did he come in?—He came in.

Did he come by appointment?—I do not know.

Did he say he expected him to come?—I cannot say he did, but I apprehend so.

It was the letters of Juvena that were copied?—They were letters as if sent from Dublin.

Who was present besides himself?—A Mr. Tom Johnson.

Is he here?—Yes, he is opposite [The witness pointed to a gentleman under the jury-box].

Who else?—A Mr. Irvine.

Who else?—I do not recollect.

Give me leave to ask you who this gentleman was who came in?—He is a gentleman who lives in Chatham-street; I do not recollect his name. He is an intimate friend of Mr. Johnson: I think his name is Card, but I am not sure.

Sir Henry Jebb re-examined by Mr. Park.

I do not understand you, as saying that there is no similarity between this hand-writing and judge Johnson's?—No.

But a great diversity?—Yes, a diversity that makes my belief that it is not his.

This business of the meeting (which is new to me) I understand you, happened a week before you came from Dublin?—Yes, before I left Ireland.

At your house?—Yes.

Judge Johnson came to your house?—Yes.

And some gentleman said he would come forward, if he could screen his family?—Yes.

Do you believe it was any of Mr. Johnson's family?—I do not.

But you did not understand that this bringing him forward was under judge Johnson's control?—Certainly not; the meeting was to copy the papers, so as to enable us to prove the negative.

Mr. Attorney General.—Do I understand you, that this is remarkably dissimilar?—It struck me more so on a superficial view, than on an accurate examination.

Dr. Hodgkinson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Lockhart.

Are you a fellow of the university of Dublin?—I am a senior fellow of the university of Dublin.

Are you related to Mr. Johnson?—Nearly related.

Have you been long acquainted with him?—Yes.

How long?—Upwards of twenty years.

Have you corresponded with him?—Frequently, almost constantly, I may say, without interruption.

Without interruption?—Yes.

Have you ever seen him write?—Frequently.

Look at this.—I have looked over the greater part, I have not looked over the whole.

From your general knowledge of his character of writing, do you believe that to be his hand-writing?—I do not believe it to be his hand-writing.

Look at the other.—This is so totally different a hand, particularly in the beginning of it, from what judge Johnson writes, that I have no hesitation in saying it is not his hand-writing, as I believe.

Dr. Hodgkinson cross-examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I understand you to say, that it is so totally unlike, that you have no hesitation in saying it is not his?—This latter paper is (particularly in the beginning of it) very unlike.

With respect to the first, you seemed to take pains to look over it?—I did so, because an abstract piece of writing of this kind having been produced to me now for the first time, at a distance from my own country, it is necessary I should carefully examine it, and especially as at first view it has some general appearance of the character of Mr. Justice Johnson's hand-writing; but on narrowly and carefully examining it, it is materially different: I find it much smaller writing, a more confined hand, and many of the letters differently cut from judge Johnson's mode of writing, particularly some years past his hand-writing has been larger even than formerly, so that I have no hesitation in saying it is not his hand-writing, as I believe.

You were at the same distance from your native country when you looked at the second paper, and therefore why did you take less time in looking at it than at the first?—This latter is so very unlike judge Johnson's writing, particularly in the beginning of it, that it took me less time to form an opinion of it than of the first paper writing.

Then you have no doubt as to this not being his hand-writing?—It is not, particularly in the beginning, at all like it. I will not say there are not some words like, but the general appearance of it is very unlike.

Did you look at the word "could"?—I did not particularly observe that word in these papers.

How do you spell it?—C-o-u-l-d; I believe it is usually so spelt.

How does judge Johnson spell it? does he spell it with the "l," or without it?—I have found that he has spelt it both ways.

Can you take upon yourself to say, that you took particular notice of the words should and could, to see how he spelt them in the papers now shown to you?—Certainly not particularly; it was hardly possible to do so under the circumstances, and in the manner in which they have now been produced to me; nor do I believe that he has spelt them in the papers now shown to me.

It was the general character then of his hand-writing that you looked at?—Yes.

You said that you had seen his writing frequently; what was the nature of that writing?—Letters and notes.

When written?—Some a long while ago; some within these few months.

I believe you have paid particular attention to the words could and would in judge Johnson's writing?—In the papers now shown to me I did not, it was scarcely possible for me to do so under the circumstances in which I have now first seen them; in other writings of his I have certainly done so, and have seen him several times and on different occasions spell these words in both ways.

I take it you observed that circumstance before this prosecution?—Certainly long before.

Who was it that pointed it to you that the words could and would were spelt that way?—Without an "l." I had heard it, I believe, rumoured through the four courts in Dublin, that that circumstance had been fastened upon by the prosecutors, and that it had left no doubt of his being the author of these papers.

You heard it by common rumour?—Yes.

Then as you have heard there was that distinguishing feature, I should think that on referring to these letters you would take particular notice of it?—Having heard the observation, I in consequence of it have looked over, and examined many writings of judge Johnson's, some written many years ago; and I have found that he spelt these words both ways, therefore, even if it had been practicable, I should not probably have directed my attention to this circumstance upon the present occasion.

I am sure you must have shrewdness enough to see that it would be very material to observe whether could and should were wrote in the usual way that they are written or not?—I think I have already explained why, even if practicable, it is not probable that I should now direct my attention to that circumstance; judge Johnson, like most other persons, writes them in both ways.

What would you say to his writing them differently since the prosecution?—Of that I know nothing, not having observed it.

Have you ever seen any writing so like judge Johnson's, that you could not distinguish it from his?—I have seen writing that I have been informed was not his hand-writing, but so like, that at the first view I should have thought it was his.

How often have you seen hand-writing of that description?—On three or four different occasions.

In what country did you see the hand-writing first?—In Ireland.

At whose house did you see the hand-writing?—The first time I ever saw it, was in the house of his brother, Mr. Thomas Johnson.

At what time first?—About a year ago.

About 1804?—Yes.

Some time about the latter end of 1804 you saw that piece of writing in his house?—I did.

You have seen more writing that was like his, perhaps?—Yes, some others so like to his, that at the first blush I should have thought it his writing.

You never heard of the son of a gentleman in office having written these papers?—Never, certainly never.

What was the nature of this writing?—It was produced to me by his brother, to show how easy it was to counterfeit the judge's hand-writing.

You agreed it was so like his, that nobody could distinguish it?—That I could not distinguish it.

This was the latter end of 1804?—It was, as near as I can recollect.

By whom was this written?—I do not know.

I am not asking you what he told you when by yourself, but in the judge's presence?—He never told me in his presence.

What was the nature of the paper?—It appeared to be a note addressed to some person.

What was the second paper?—A brief with marginal annotations.

Who produced that?—Sir Henry Jebb, if I recollect right. They were so like the judge's hand-writing, that I could not distinguish them from it in the view I had.

Where was this?—In Ireland.

Where?—In sir Henry Jebb's house.

Then you have seen these papers twice only?—Yes, I have seen some of them since that.

Who showed them to you?—I have seen some of them since I came to town, in judge Johnson's lodging, and shown to me by him.

Then these papers, one of which Mr. Johnson showed you, and the second of which sir Henry Jebb showed you, you afterwards saw at judge Johnson's in London?—That which Mr. Johnson showed me I never saw afterwards, that which sir Henry Jebb showed me, I did.

What did judge Johnson say to you?—He showed them as writing so like his, that any person might mistake them.

Then judge Johnson was present at this latter time, and produced to you this writing as a proof how like any man could write to him?—Not how like any man could write to him, but how like some could.

These were briefs?—Yes; briefs addressed to him on the cover.

Marked with his name as mine is? that I hold in my hand is marked "Mr. Erskine;" delivered to him as counsel?—They were briefs delivered to him as counsel, I believe, when he was such.

And he showed them to you, to show you that there were annotations on them so like his writing, that the difference could not be known?—Yes, could not be known at least by me. I speak only of myself.

Did he communicate to you who the gentleman was who had favoured him with these annotations?—No, never.

But you are sure they were on his briefs?—Yes, on briefs addressed to him.

You say this has no resemblance to his hand-writing?—No, I do not say that; I only say I do not believe it is his hand-writing.

When were you first served with a subpoena?—On Monday last.

And had you no previous notice that you would be examined as a witness in this cause?—No, I came to this country principally on my own business; but I never conceived I was to be examined as a witness until Monday last, though judge Johnson had repeatedly expressed a wish to have me and others of his intimate friends with him on this awful occasion.

Dr. Hodgkinson re-examined by Mr. Lockhart.

Though there is some of the writing which you say it is difficult at first view to distinguish, on account of a similarity to the general manner of judge Johnson's writing, can you take upon you to say, whether you believe it to be his or not?—I think I have answered that question already; but I say again, I do not believe it to be his hand-writing.

Lord Ellenborough.—How do you know these annotations on the brief were not his hand-writing?—I take it only from what he told me; he said so.

As I understand from you, the judge showed them to you?—Yes.

[The jury desired to see the papers.]

Sir Henry Jebb re-examined.

Did you ever show Dr. Hodgkinson any briefs, with minutes of Judge Johnson on them, which he never wrote?—I showed him copies of letters: there are also briefs written in the same way.

How did you know these not to be the actual hand-writing of judge Johnson?—The brief was drawn out as a lawyer's brief, without annotations. Mr. Irvine and myself put our initials on it; it was taken away, and in three or four hours afterwards the brief was brought back, with annotations so like judge Johnson's, that we could not distinguish them. Judge Johnson had never been out of the room.

Lord Ellenborough.—Could not this have been done by two briefs, one with annotations, and the other not?—It is impossible not to be deceived.

Is the gentleman who carried the briefs out and into the room here?—No, he is not here.

[Mr. Adam produced the brief.]

You know who wrote it?—Mr. Card, I believe.

Mr. Archdale sworn.—Examined by Mr. Richardson.

How long have you been acquainted with Mr. Johnson?—Fourteen or fifteen years.

Have you been intimate with him?—Very much so.

Have you had opportunities of being in correspondence with him?—Yes.

Have you had opportunities of knowing his hand-writing?—I have seen him write lately, and for the course of ten years have seen him write.

I believe you are assistant to Mr. Waller?—I was.

Had you repeated opportunities of seeing judge Johnson in business?—Yes.

Were they as frequent as Mr. Waller's?—More so.

Are you from that well acquainted with his hand-writing?—I am.

Is he an intimate acquaintance of yours?—Indeed, sir, he is.

Is he any relation of your's?—No.

Have you examined the manuscript sufficiently to form a judgment?—I have.

In your judgment, is that the hand-writing of judge Johnson?—In my judgment of judge Johnson's writing, it is not.

Have you any doubt?—Upon my word I have no doubt in the world.

Have you examined that?—I have.

What is your opinion?—My opinion is, that it is not judge Johnson's hand-writing, nor do I think it any way like it; no similitude at all to it.

Mr. Archdale cross-examined by Mr. Erskine.

How many years were you in this office, that gave you so familiar an acquaintance with judge Johnson's hand-writing?—Ten years.

Likeness of hand-writing has been compared with the features of the face: I should suppose judge Johnson's face is familiar to you: should you be as long looking at his features to see if you knew him?—I have not a sharp eye, and I would not be staring in any man's face. You should give one time to look over it. I could have said it at the first blush; but I did not wish to give an answer, as if I had come prepared.

Then you think they were written by different people?—I should think they were.

You are so clear that the two papers are written by different people, as that neither was written by judge Johnson?—I am.

Did Mr. Waller or yourself come first into the office?—Mr. Waller, several years.

Was Mr. Johnson counsel to the board when you came in first?—I don't believe he was.

Have you any doubt?—I think he was not; for counsellor Beresford was then counsel to the board.

Are you in office now?—I have not been in office some years.

Did you resign?—I did.

Voluntarily resign?—Yes.

When?—In 1789.

Did not judge Johnson continue to be counsel to the board?—I believe he did.

Then Mr. Waller was longer at the office, while judge Johnson continued counsel to the board, than you were?—Yes, but he had not the opportunity of being with him I had, for I used to go and correct the acts of parliament with him.

You do not think Mr. Waller was so well acquainted with his hand-writing as you were?—Not so well as I.

Have you been at any of these meetings which we have heard of?—No, but I have seen some notes.

Where?—At Dublin.

At whose house?—At Mr. Fleming's, in Smock-alley.

How long ago?—About three weeks ago.

Was Mr. Johnson there?—No.

What notes were they?—Two covers of Robert Johnson's name: attempting to imitate his name, probably.

And who was it wrote them?—It was a Mr. Fleming, I believe.

Is Mr. Fleming here?—I do not know.

What is he?—I do not know any thing of him, good, bad, or indifferent: I heard him called Fleming.

How came you to be there?—They brought me.

Who?—A Mr. Giffard.

Who is Mr. Giffard?—I believe he is a barrister.

How came you to go with him?—Because he asked me, and I am not afraid to go any where.

What, do you go any where you are asked? Suppose any man you do not know, was to meet you this charming foggy evening, after you leave the court, and should ask you to take a walk with him to White-chapel, would you go?—I would.

Mr. Erskine.—You would. Well, I know I would not; and all I have to say farther is, that I wish you a pleasant walk.

Mr. Archdale re-examined by Mr. Richardson.

Though you are no longer in the office of solicitor to the revenue, do you hold any other public office?—No.

What are you doing now?—I am doing business for a Mr. Barlow.

Have you been acquainted with judge Johnson up to the present time?—Yes.

And his hand-writing, the same as you formerly were?—Yes.

Was his hand a freer hand?—A freer and larger hand.

Mr. John Giffard sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adam.

Is your residence in Dublin?—Generally.

Are you acquainted with judge Johnson?—I am.

How long have you known him?—A great many years; more than thirty years: within these fifteen or sixteen years more intimately than before.

Have you been in the habit of corresponding with him?—But little in the habit of seeing him write.

How late have you seen him write?—Within this week.

Are you capable of forming a competent judgment of his hand-writing?—I can form a judgment; it will be for you to say whether it is competent.

Can you form a belief?—I can.

Now you have looked at that paper, do you believe it to be judge Johnson's hand-writing?—I believe it is not.

Look at the other. Do you believe that to be his hand-writing?—I believe it is not.

Mr. John Giffard cross-examined by Mr. Garrow.

Is your opinion of both the papers similar?—One is more like the judge's than the other.

That is, his is more like the first?—The one is a cramped hand; the judge's is a loose dashing hand, like a clerk.

Then there is some resemblance of the cut of the letters; but it is like the hand of some one not waiting to take pains?—No, not taking pains.

Where is it like, and where unlike?—It is not such a hand as a man writes with very great freedom.

That is, not such a one as the judge writes?—No, it is not.

Now as to the second?—There is some similarity in all hand-writing.

What do you mean? Do you mean to say all O's are round?—No, sir; all O's are not round; but I say all English writings have a likeness to one another, otherwise they could not be read by Englishmen.

Then all Irish writing is alike too, I suppose?—English and Irish writing is the same. I thought we were all one kingdom. Is there any difference?

In what does it resemble judge Johnson's writing?—The letters have something, at the first look of them, of his manner, till you come to look into them.

What, just as your face and mine are alike, till you come to look into them?—Oh, sir, you do me honour.

Am I to understand then, that there is no more resemblance between this writing, than there is between two faces which happen to have a nose and a pair of ears? In what respect is it more like judge Johnson's than yours?—It is larger than mine, though not so large as judge Johnson's.

Does the cut of these letters resemble judge Johnson's letters?—If you suppose the transverse lines to be parallel to the plane of the horizon, then the writing shown me is more perpendicular to that plane than judge Johnson's.

You could not then be imposed on so much as to believe it his?—No.

Then if I wrote in a similar hand to that, an invitation to you to dinner with judge Johnson, should you think it came from him, and attend accordingly?—As for that, in an invitation to dinner, a man seldom considers the writing.

Suppose that had imported to be an invitation to visit your friend, should you have thought it came from him?—If it had come to me as a card, I should have put it in my rack; and when the day came, I should have gone to dinner.

Should you have acted upon it?—I certainly should.

Then it would have presented itself to you as the letter of your friend?—It would; but if any man had called upon me, and asked me whether I thought it his, I should have hesitated, and examined it more carefully.

Are you acquainted with Mr. Archdale?—I have seen him here and in Dublin.

Of what profession are you?—At present I am of none. I held an office in the revenue, but was turned out by lord Hardwicke.

Why?—For that being a Protestant, I moved a petition which was presented to the imperial parliament, praying them to sustain the king and constitution.*

* As to this, see 2 Plowden's Hist. Ireland from the Union to 1810, p. 40.

How do you know this was the cause of your dismissal?—Lord Hardwicke told me so.

Have you a son?—I have that honour.

Is he of any profession?—He is a barrister.

Do you know a person of the name of Fleming?—Yes. He is an alderman in Mer-rion-row. He did live in Smock-alley, but he has retired to the polite end of the town. He was lord mayor in the year of the rebellion.

Has he a house in Smock-alley?—He has not lived there for three years. He has an interest in the house; his name is over the door. I believe his relation who lives there has assumed his name.

What business does that person carry on?—A card-maker: such cards as ye play with.

Are you acquainted with him?—Not so intimately as with the alderman.

Nor your son?—I cannot tell.

Did you ever see Mr. Fleming write?—I have seen the alderman write, and the other person is clerk to the commissioners of array, or as they are called with us, deputy governors of militia. I am one of those commissioners.

You have seen him write?—Yes.

As you think this is not judge Johnson's hand-writing, do you know whose you think it is?—No.

Do you think that Mr. Fleming did not write it?—The alderman did not: he is decrepid with the gout.

Do you think it is like his nephew's?—Now I call it to mind, the nephew writes a dashing hand, something like judge Johnson.

You say, sir, that this writing is larger than yours, and that judge Johnson's is larger than yours; this writing, then, may be judge Johnson's?—O, sir, that is a gross non sequitur.

Mr. John Giffard re-examined by Mr. Adam.

Did you know alderman Fleming when you were sheriff of Dublin?—I did.

Was it only in that way you knew him?—I knew him long before I was sheriff.

How often did you discharge the duty of sheriff?—Never but once, and in a time of great turbulence.

You know the other Mr. Fleming well?—I have dined with him, and sat at the board with him, where I am deputy-governor, &c.

Now after all the questions that have been asked of you, considering these papers again, do you believe them to be judge Johnson's hand-writing?—I do not.

Mr. Cassedy sworn.---Examined by Mr. Park.

What is your christian name?—David.

You reside in England?—Yes.

You are an apothecary?—I have been.

Are you an Irishman by birth?—I am.

Have you known judge Johnson for any time?—From my earliest youth, for twenty-five years.

Were you educated with him?—In the same city,

Has your intimacy with him continued?—Always.

Have you ever seen him write?—I have.

Have you been in the habit of corresponding with him?—Generally to this day.

Have you seen him when in England studying the law?—Always.

Are you able to form a belief as to his hand-writing?—I should think so.

Look at that paper?—There is some resemblance.

From your knowledge of the character of his writing, do you believe it to be his?—I rather think it is not, for his is a more diffuse and larger hand.

Is the character of that hand-writing more stiff than you think the judge would write?—I think it is.

Look at the other paper?—I do not think the second is so like as the first.

Putting the same question again to you, do you think either of these his hand-writing?—I think neither.

REPLY.

Mr. Attorney General.—Gentlemen of the Jury; When I had occasion before to address you, I certainly was very strongly impressed with an idea, that Mr. Justice Johnson had strangely misconducted himself, in not taking the earliest opportunity of endeavouring, upon the merits and the facts, to have disproved the only sources from which the facts were to be brought home to him. I had thought that, under the circumstances of so disgraceful a charge, no opportunity would have been lost to have cleared him from the foul stigma it attached to his character; but if Mr. Justice Johnson could not have been defended from this charge, by other testimony than that which he has produced, I do not wonder that he shrunk back from that hour in which he was to be called upon to enter upon his defence to the accusations against him; for I have no hesitation in saying, that much as I thought the charge itself disgraceful, yet it is nothing compared with the manner in which he has been defended. I have no doubt that there is not a man in the box, among the respectable jury I have the honour to address, nay, not an infant of fifteen years of age, who could be imposed upon by a story such as that you have heard from the defendant's witnesses.

My learned friend has told you, that he hopes there will be no prejudice excited in your minds, by the difference of the defendant being an Irish, and not an English judge. I am sure there will be no prejudice on that account. He hopes you will deal out the same measure of justice, as if the defendant were one of the judges of this part of the United Kingdom, and that you will administer the law the same way, as if it were one of the twelve judges of England who was before you.

I hope that, in your consideration of this case of the judge, who is the defendant, you will have in your minds all that association of ideas which men usually have, when they refer to the character of a judge. We who sit here know, from the observations we are daily in the habit of making, that in the character of a judge is included every thing honourable and virtuous; every thing one would wish to embody of excellence and perfection, is so associated with the character of a judge, that those virtues cannot fail to present themselves to the mind of every one who contemplates it. I wish, I repeat, that the same ideas of veneration and respect may be associated in your minds, when you are forming your judgment on the case of Mr. Justice Johnson; but I wish you also to consider, whether, if he had been innocent, he would have been playing off those tricks in Ireland, bringing forward these witnesses, not to prove that there is no resemblance in these libels to judge Johnson's writing, but that the person who is the real author would be ready to deliver himself up, but for circumstances connected with his family; that this person, who writes so like him now, has before written so unlike him, that there is not the least resemblance. It is clear they would impose this proposition on your understanding, that the man who wrote these papers so like judge Johnson, that the witnesses believe they are his, yet has written that which is so unlike, that no one can believe it could have been written by him; and it is such witnesses as these who are called to answer the four witnesses I have produced, and to prove that they are perjured! It seems to me that you must be completely satisfied, and that I need hardly make any more observations; but let us look a little into the probability of the testimony on the part of the defendant, for this is the point of the case. Let us look to the nature of the story they have told you.

You find that judge Johnson was, at the latter end of last year, charged with being the author of this libel. One of the witnesses, Dr. Hodgkinson, speaks to his seeing some of the hand-writing in imitation of his, so early as last year. The idea you find was entertained, that it might be useful to have some person to bring forward, whose writing was like judge Johnson's. It seems that at some house where Mr. Johnson was, a Mr. Card came in, and represented that he was ready to carry a blank paper with the initials of the company marked on it, out of the house for two or three hours, and that it should be brought back filled up with writing exactly like that of judge Johnson, and then they would be sure that he had not written it. Well, the first observation I make is, that which suggested itself to the Bench, whether this could not be done by two briefs previously prepared, one with annotations, and the other without them. What is this case? Here is a paper identified by the gentlemen present: it is taken away, and afterwards produced by

Mr. Card, and it is said that the writing was so like the judge's, it could not be distinguished. Then all you have to consider is this: either the writing has been forged and copied, or the initials have been forged and copied. If the writing had been previously copied by judge Johnson himself, he might have desired the gentlemen to put their initials to a blank paper; then all that would be required would be to copy the initials, or if that was not the case, the whole would be to be re-copied in imitation of the original. Which do you think is the more probable, that a person should be able to copy the writing over a long paper, or the initials only? Certainly it would be much easier to do the one than the other, so that you see it is perfectly reconcileable, that the whole of the writing that was brought there, might be the hand-writing of judge Johnson.

There is another observation to be made on this part of the case. What is it the witnesses prove? they prove what was the feeling of judge Johnson on the subject. His feeling was, that it was necessary the witnesses before they came into court, should see some hand-writing like his. They all come here and state that they have seen a brief with marginal notes resembling the writing of the judge. At Mr. Johnson's lodgings this brief is shown to some of them who had not seen it before, and it is supposed to be the writing of the same person who wrote the two letters; and when this is done, they come here and all swear positively that although the first has some resemblance to the defendant's hand-writing, yet the second has none at all. Now if they say there is no resemblance at all, it is impossible that these gentlemen can be otherwise than perjured; because the opportunity Mr. Waller had of knowing the judge's hand-writing is equal to theirs, and they tell you, as my learned friend was instructed to tell you, that the disorder with which Mr. Johnson had been afflicted was a palsy, but that his hand-writing was not altered or affected by it. How then can our witnesses be said to have no knowledge of his hand-writing, when it is exactly like what it was when they had such opportunities of being acquainted with it? They say there is no alteration in his hand-writing; if there is not, then Mr. Waller and the other witnesses for the prosecution, are every way competent to give evidence of it. It is not only Dr. Jebb and Dr. Hodgkinson, but the other witnesses for the defendant, who tell you they have seen writing so perfectly resembling Mr. Johnson's, that they could not distinguish it. There is Mr. Archdale too, whose evidence is very extraordinary. He tells you how he saw the writing: that he went to the house of Mr. Fleming; that he was led there by a Mr. Giffard, though he hardly knew any thing of him; that he went with him to Mr. Fleming's, for no other reason, as he told you, than because he was not afraid to go any where. He is called upon by Mr. Giffard, and is brought to Mr. Fleming's house, and there he sees him write franks, and imitate judge Johnson's name; then how does this bear on the case? I revert to what I have already said, that if this evidence is believed, it amounts to this: that the hand-writing which we charge to be judge Johnson's, if it is not his, is the hand-writing of some one who writes so like him that the witnesses cannot tell the one from the other.

In this state of the case on the part of the defendant, and considering the evidence you have heard in support of it, it seems to me that all the testimony we have produced is confirmed and strengthened, and that the case on the part of the prosecution is so established, as to render it almost unnecessary for me to trouble you with any farther observations.

But I have been told that the learned judge considers he has been unnecessarily pressed with the expenses of this prosecution, and states his inability on that account to bring forward all the witnesses that were necessary to his defence. I confess I do not see what he has to complain of in this respect. Mr. Justice Johnson has a brother in this country, who must of course be well acquainted with his hand-writing, and yet, notwithstanding this paucity of witnesses in support of the defence, he is not called upon. This is a material circumstance for your consideration; but what are the difficulties of which he complains? It has been stated to you, that by the operation of a late act of parliament under which he is tried, he could not have had process to compel the attendance of his witnesses without the other act of parliament which has been mentioned to you; but when my learned friend says that all the opposition and delay to prevent the trial being brought forward, arose merely from the difficulty the defendant had in obtaining the testimony of his witnesses, he tells you that which is not correct. I have a right to say in answer to his assertion, that the delay has not originated in any fault of those who have had the conduct of the prosecution. I have also a right to say, that the prosecution could not be supported by any other evidence than what was to be found in England, and consequently it could not be tried any where but in England; all we knew was of the publication in this country. The trial must of necessity have been where the offence was committed, and for that reason it has taken place here. But I have it in my power to say, that a Dublin jury might have been had, if the defendant would have consented that no difficulty should have been thrown in the way as to the proof of publication.

It is in answer only to this topic, urged by the defendant's counsel, that I trouble you with the mention of these facts. If the defendant assumes the right of stating a number of circumstances which can only be answered by assertions, he has no reason to complain if I make them also. I have an equal right to complain of his assertions, and to meet them by counter-assertions. You may put both out of your consideration if you please; but if the one is to be attacked, the other is open to be attacked too.

With respect to the other, and principal point, namely, the hand-writing, there are two questions turning upon it, namely, first the identity of the hand-writing; and secondly, how far the evidence fixes the fact of publication. One question is, whether the hand-writing is judge Johnson's? which is quite a distinct consideration; the other is, whether, supposing that to be proved, it proves the second link in the case, that is to say, the publication in England? Now I apprehend, that if the hand-writing is proved, I may prove out of the publication itself, that this was a writing procured by the defendant to be published in this country.

What my learned friend has supposed with regard to a desk being broken open, and the manuscript stolen out, goes for nothing; for I have shown you that in some of the letters, the defendant notices a former one, and laments and expresses his regret at its having been published, if it could have had the effect of injuring the feelings of Cambricus. Out of that very text I maintain that I prove it to be the publication of the defendant. My learned friend has stated to you the case of the publication of the "Patriot King," by Mr. Pope. It may be true that lord Bolingbroke wrote it, and that Mr. Pope obtained the manuscript without his knowledge, but this is quite a different case. If the defendant wishes you to believe the manuscript was stolen from him and published without his knowledge, let him show that his desk was broken open; that after he had written this scandalous libel, he reflected and thought better of it; that he locked it up, intending to keep it from the public eye; and that some person afterwards surreptitiously obtained it, and sent it to the press.

The question here is, whether you have not evidence from which you must conclude that the person who wrote the libel, wrote it in order that it might be published in England? You have the same evidence of the publication as you usually have of the publication of a bill of exchange, by the person signing it. If you prove his hand-writing you need not show that it was not stolen from him afterwards by somebody else. The mere circumstance of its being found in a course of circulation, is sufficient to establish the whole of the case. So here, when you find that the whole of the libel is in the hand-writing of the defendant, you must infer that he wrote it for the express purpose of giving it to the public. He introduces it to the publisher here by a previous letter, stating his knowledge of the affairs and political state of Ireland, and asking him whether his communications on the subject of the public affairs of that country would be acceptable to him. Then after all this introductory evidence of the fact, these libels are produced in the hand-writing of the defendant. Can you doubt for a moment, that the publication was by his procurement? The case in my opinion is as clear as the evidence in the case of the Seven Bishops was disputable. Then as to the evidence of its being the hand-writing of judge Johnson, I have proved it by witnesses who have spoken to their knowledge of his manner of writing. But there are some material observations that ought not to be omitted. If this were a question whether a forgery had been committed, you would consider whether the person who was supposed to have forged the hand-writing of judge Johnson had any interest in doing so; if you feel that he could have no interest in forging it, that circumstance alone affords a presumption of its not being forged. There is no colour for supposing that the person who is stated to have forged the defendant's hand-writing in 1803, had any reason which could have actuated him to do so. The witnesses say generally, that he wrote so like the judge, it could not be distinguished. My learned friend says he is of opinion that the witnesses spoke from their honest belief, as to the libels being actually the hand-writing of the person who was in the habit of writing like the judge; and yet the witnesses themselves tell you that they do not bear any resemblance at all to it. My learned friend also says, that the first blush is most to be considered in the testimony of witnesses to hand-writing; and that when they come into court with their minds prepared to identify it, they are more likely to speak to it as that of the person to whom it is attributed. I beg leave to ask you, whether the inference is not directly the other way; and that when witnesses come prepared to negative hand-writing, they may not be actuated by an inclination, which induces them to deny the resemblance where it really exists, though it may be ever so strong.

Our witnesses have told you, that the libel is not written in the usual hand-writing of judge Johnson, but more in the style of a person endeavouring to get as much as possible into one sheet of paper. What is the evidence on the other side? That it is not so free a hand as the judge writes: if so, then it is not so free as the writing of the other person, whose hand resembles his: it is unquestionably the writing of the one or the other; it is the writing of judge Johnson, or it is the writing of Mr. Fleming, or Mr. Card. That which bears so much dissimilitude to the writing of judge Johnson, must be dissimilar to the writing of Mr. Fleming or Mr. Card. That two things which are equally alike to a third, must perfectly resemble each other, is a proposition which cannot be controverted. It is clear that one or the other must have written the libels; and yet the defendant's witnesses tell you the writing bears no resemblance to that of either of them.

VOL. XXIX.

But it is supposed we have called worse witnesses than we might have produced. Upon this point I have only to observe, that although the office of the defendant, as counsel to the Revenue-board, terminated in 1801, four years ago, it is not four years since these libels were written, for they were published in 1803; but this difficulty is got over by the evidence, that the hand-writing of the defendant has not in the least degree altered from what it was when the witnesses speak to their knowledge of it. What is the remedy proposed by the defendant's counsel? that we should call people from the post-office, who were in the habit of seeing his franks. Why, though it is true he used to frank when he was a member of the Irish parliament, yet he ceased to do so in 1801 when he was made a judge. But let me ask, if evidence drawn from any source can be accurate, must not that which we have produced be peculiarly so? What proof of hand-writing can be more complete than what we have given you? We have produced to you Mr. Waller, the solicitor to the commissioners of Customs, and Mr. Edwards, who was clerk in the solicitor's office, besides other witnesses. These were persons who had constant opportunities of seeing the defendant's writing, and knowing it under every shade and aspect, whether written as he ordinarily wrote, or closer, or more diffuse. There is not the slightest imputation on the characters of these witnesses. The case of my learned friend is simply this, that they may be mistaken. If they speak falsely, they must speak corruptly. Their testimony is, however, to be compared with that of the defendant's witnesses, who say there is no resemblance between the hand-writing of the libels, and that of the defendant. Mr. Waller tells you he really believes it to be his hand-writing; the other witnesses say the same. You will weigh the degree of credit to be given to the witnesses on both sides; you will bear in your minds what they have respectively proved, and distinguish between the probability of the evidence on the one side and on the other; and I entertain no doubt, that your verdict will be perfectly consistent with the justice of the case.

SUMMING UP.

Lord Ellenborough.—Gentlemen of the Jury; This is an indictment against the honourable Robert Johnson, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland, for a libel. The first consideration is, whether the paper that has been proved (whatever may be its quality), was published by Mr. Justice Johnson? The second is, whether, if the paper was published by him, it is a libel? The latter point it may be as well to dispose of in the first instance. No question is made as to the publication itself being a libel; nor indeed could any question be agitated upon that subject, for it certainly does, in various ways, libel and traduce the king's government in Ireland, vilifying and degrading the persons entrusted with the first offices of the state in that part of the United Kingdom, particularly the lord lieutenant and the lord high chancellor. It defames the lord lieutenant as a man only fit to be a feeder of sheep, states that his head is made up of particles of a ligneous tendency; and then, comparing it with the Trojan Horse, adds, that notwithstanding its supposed innoxiousness, its hollowness would be soon filled with instruments of mischief. As to the lord chancellor of Ireland, it degrades him in terms no less libellous; it states him to have cut off from the secretary of the master of the rolls certain fees of office, for the purpose of throwing them into the hands of a creature of his own; and it puts a very invidious contrast between the character of the lord chancellor and the late lord Kenyon. It likewise traduces Mr. Justice Osborne, and states him to have acted corruptly, under the influence of Mr. Marsden, the under secretary of state, whom it accuses of having washed his stained hands in the very fountain of justice. It contains also other language of reproach, equally defamatory, applicable to all the persons mentioned in the publication. With respect to all this, it must be quite unnecessary to detail it you; you have heard it stated at large in the opening of the case, and therefore it would be superfluous in me to repeat all the particulars at length.

There can be no doubt in the world, that it is a very gross and scandalous libel, highly injurious not only to the characters of the persons it defames, but to the government of the country. No question has been made with regard to its libellous tendency; if it had been raised, you could not have hesitated one moment. The point is then reduced to this question, whether, supposing it to be a libel, it has been published by the defendant in the county of Middlesex? There is no sort of doubt as to its having been published there; it there reached its destination, and was printed by Mr. Cobbett in his Political Register; the only question is, whether this publication was caused by the transmission of the manuscript from Dublin? Now, whether that is brought home to the defendant, depends on the evidence, and I will state the whole of that evidence to you.

The noble and learned judge proceeded to recapitulate the whole of the evidence on both sides, verbatim, commenting, as he went along, on the testimony of the respective witnesses. First, as to the evidence of Mr. Cobbett, he observed, that the strict inquiry made on his examination, with regard to the covers, was to ascertain with certainty whether those covers, which were addressed to Mr. Budd, contained the libels in question. His lordship added, that it was obvious, from the evidence of Mr. Cobbett, that he had received a previous overture, on the part of the person who afterwards sent him the letters signed Juvena; that he noticed it, by giving it an answer in his subsequent number; that such notice was acted upon by the author of the libels, who transmitted the letters, which appeared to have been written by the defendant; that the postscript to the letter of the 28th November recognized the antecedent letter of the 29th October, and showed that the person who wrote the last letter wrote the first.

His lordship read the letters signed Juvena; and remarked that the question was, whether the jury would not think themselves warranted in connecting the proposal to give the communications, with the letters which were afterwards written by somebody or other? Speaking of the second letter, he said, does not this plainly refer to the former letter? it evidently does refer to the context of the first; and the two letters being in the same handwriting, you are to determine whether they were not both sent for publication by the same person.

The next evidence, said his lordship, is that which relates to the fact of the handwriting. This evidence is necessarily coupled with the overture made to Mr. Cobbett; and the fact is to be made out by proof, that the defendant was actually the writer of the libels. The evidence on that part of the subject is what I am about to state to you.

His lordship read over the evidence of Mr. Waller, Mr. Ormsby, Mr. Nunn, and Mr. Edwards, without any particular comment, farther than that, from the official situations they held, they were persons who appeared to be every way competent to identify the handwriting of the defendant.

Having finished their testimony, he said, the libel was then proposed to be read; but a question was raised by the counsel for the defendant, as to proof of the hand-writing being proof of the subsequent publication in the county of Middlesex; and the precedent of the case of the Seven Bishops was urged in support of the objection. Certainly to have admitted, as sufficient, such proof of publication as was brought forward against those reverend characters, would have been unjust, and contrary to every known and established principle of the law of evidence; but in this case I was clearly of opinion, that the precedent did not apply; for I thought, and I still think, that the hand-writing having been proved, there was in the libel itself a sufficiency of internal evidence, to be left to you to say, whether the person who wrote it was not the person who published it. On the part of the defendant there were called, in order to negative the fact of the libel being the defendant's hand-writing, the following witnesses:—

[Here his lordship read the evidence in support of the defendant's case.]

The first witness, Dr. Jebb, would have you believe, that a gentleman of the name of Card had come forward, and said he would avow himself the author, but for his apprehensions that his avowal would be attended with the destruction of his family. It is very extraordinary that this person, whoever he is, who writes so like judge Johnson that their writing cannot be distinguished, should have written that which is produced to-day, and stated by the witnesses not to bear the least resemblance to his character of writing; but it seems there have been some kinds of experiments made, with a view to ascertain whether another person could not write like the judge; and it is said, that after the company present had put their initials on a paper, it was taken away, and afterwards brought back, in order to enable them to give evidence, that judge Johnson's hand-writing could be successfully imitated by that person. One is at a loss to conceive why this imitation of his hand-writing should have taken place; if it were only for the purpose of having it believed, that another was in possession of the faculty of imitating his character, I do not see how it is at all consistent with that view and object, that witnesses should be brought forward to prove, that this is not like his writing in any degree. The course of the examination of the witnesses tends to the inference, that although two persons wrote so much alike that their writing could not be distinguished, yet that what is supposed to be the hand-writing of one of them, has no resemblance to the character which it professes to have imitated. The utmost of this experiment is, that in the opinion of the witnesses two persons wrote alike; but that result might have been attained by the person who made the experiment having brought into the room a brief on which judge Johnson had antecedently written, with a view to its being presented at the end of two or three hours. Whether there is any thing in this observation, it is for you to judge; but the only conclusion I can draw is, that it appears very inconsistent, that a person should be said to write so like judge Johnson, that the style of the one cannot be distinguished from the other; and yet that witnesses should afterwards come into court, and pretend that there is no similitude between their writing.

His lordship made no observations upon the evidence of Dr. Hodgkinson.

As to Mr. Archdale, his lordship still addressing the jury, said—It may be necessary for you to attend to the demeanor of this man. He has said, upon his oath, that if, upon his going out of court at this late hour of the evening, any person whom he did not know, were to ask him to walk with him to Whitechapel, he would go with him; and he also tells you, he went to a house in Dublin, only because he was not afraid to go any where: such a mode of giving evidence in a court of justice, certainly throws great discredit on the testimony of any witness.

As to what has been told you by the next witness, Mr. Giffard, respecting lord Hardwicke's having turned him out of office because he was a Protestant, it is a libel on that noble lord's character, to suppose there can be truth in such a statement. If it were possible that lord Hardwicke, or any other man, had been base enough so to have acted, it is not at all probable that he would have been hardy enough to have avowed it, as the witness tells you he has done.

Gentlemen of the jury—this is the evidence on the one side and on the other; and in deciding whether the defendant has been guilty of the crime imputed to him, your judgment will turn principally upon the fact, whether this is or is not his hand-writing. There is one very strong circumstance which I should not omit to mention to you. It is stated that judge Johnson knows the person who actually transmitted this libel from Dublin to the publisher in this country. If he is really acquainted with this fact, it is singular, and almost incredible, that, aware as he must be of the perilous situation in which he stands, he should, from a false principle of tenderness towards the family of such a man, prefer concealing him, to the injury and utter destruction of his own character, instead of bringing him forward to meet that punishment and disgrace he so well merits, if he is the real delinquent. Having such a man in his power, and omitting to produce him, is past my comprehension. Whether it is probable, or at all reconcileable with the general experience of mankind, it is for you to say. If you believe this to be the hand-writing of judge Johnson, you will have no question to decide as to the quality of the publication, but you will find him Guilty. If, upon a review of the whole of the evidence, and comparing it together, you should be of opinion it is not his hand-writing, you will in that case pronounce him Not Guilty. With these observations, I leave the question of his guilt or innocence in your hands.

The jury retired to the judges' chamber, behind the court, for about a quarter of an hour, and returned with a verdict of GUILTY.

The trial commenced at ten o'clock in the morning, and concluded about nine at night.

MR. TALBOT.—May it please your Lordship—Gentlemen of the Jury—In this action, John Thomas Troy is the Plaintiff, and Henry Delahay Symonds is the Defendant. The declaration states, that the plaintiff is a loyal subject of the king, and that he has never been guilty of any kind of treason or misprision of treason, and until the publication of the libel complained of by this action, had never been suspected thereof. It also states, that the plaintiff is a person professing the Popish religion in Ireland, and that he there exercises the function of a Roman Catholic priest, and that he is commonly known by the title of Doctor Troy. The declaration then alludes to a certain exhortation published by the plaintiff, recommending to the persons to whom it was addressed, a quiet and peaceable demeanor, and also refers to a correspondence between the earl of Fingal and lord Redesdale. It also states, that in the year 1798, there was a dreadful rebellion in Ireland, and that on the 23rd of July, 1803, there was an insurrection there. It then charges that the defendant knowing the premises, but maliciously intending to deprive the plaintiff of his good name, fame, character, and reputation, and to bring him into great infamy and disgrace, and to cause it to be believed and suspected that he had been guilty of treason or misprision of treason, printed and published the following libel:—

“ Lord Fingal then mentions, as striking proofs of the loyalty of Catholics, the Address of Dr. Coppinger to his flock at Cloyne, which recently appeared in the newspapers, and the late Exhortation of Dr. Troy in Dublin.

“ Nothing affords such strong evidences of Popish dissimulation in Ireland, as the exhortations of the Romish clergy, and the loyal addresses of their flocks. They have commonly been found to be sure presages of a deep-laid conspiracy against the Protestant state; and after it has exploded in rebellion, their clergy generally lament, from the altar, the delusions of the people, and their treasonable conduct towards the best of sovereigns, and the only constitution that affords any degree of rational liberty; though from the nature of their religion they must have known, and might have prevented it. The dreadful rebellion of 1798, accompanied with such instances of Popish perfidy, must convince the reader, that no reliance is to be placed on the oaths or professions of Irish Papists to a Protestant state. Dr. Troy must have known all the circumstances which preceded the insurrection in Dublin on the 23rd of July, 1803, and yet he did not put government on their guard. The present administration are convinced of his treachery on that occasion, and yet, for many years past, he had been treated at the Castle with the utmost respect, and had even received favours for some persons of his own family. His Exhortation then, to which lord Fingal alludes, must be considered as a mockery of the state, an insult to the understandings of his Protestant fellow-subjects, and an unquestionable testimony of his want of candour.

“ By his orders, exhortations composed by himself were read in many Popish chapels in his diocese, on the morning of the 24th of July, and a few hours after the insurrection and massacre had taken place in Dublin. The reader must be convinced by the following moral evidence, that these exhortations were framed previous to that dreadful event; there was no allusion to it in any of them, and the distance of the chapels in which they were read from the metropolis was so great, as to make it physically impossible that they could have been framed, and sent to them, subsequent to that catastrophe.”

There are other counts, gentlemen, charging the libel in different forms, to the plaintiff's damage of Ten Thousand Pounds.

The defendant has pleaded that he is not guilty of this libel, and that is the issue which you have now to try.

The Honourable Thomas Erskine;—Gentlemen of the jury; I am much indebted to my learned friend for the clear and perspicuous manner in which he has stated the complaint which Dr. Troy makes upon this record, because by it you must already be aware of the importance of the cause you have to decide. If the solicitor-general, who was my justly successful adversary in the last cause, obtained large damages for an assault only on the person,* how much more loudly does the present call for your serious consideration. In that case the passions of the defendant were inflamed probably from great provocation; but that was held to be but little mitigation when the plaintiff's body was wounded and disfigured; how much greater then is the injury, where there is a wounded spirit, when the injury is not done to the body but to the mind, and when the offence does not arise from the sting of provocation, but was committed in cold blood. The case I have alluded to was only a sudden quarrel, yet as it was in a public place where many persons were present, it was justly observed by the noble judge that though public example could not strictly nor directly apply in a civil action for damages, yet it could not be lamented when it had an indirect and almost unconscious effect on the minds of a jury in such a case. How much more then here when an unoffending individual has been so unjustly and publicly calumniated; but I should be myself a calumniator, if I described Dr. Troy as only innocent and unoffending, when with the highest possible merit, he stepped forth as a minister of religion in a most perilous crisis. If he had consulted only his own quiet, and preferred his own safety to his duty, he could not have been assailed by this anonymous libeller; but because possessing an extensive influence over the members of his communion, he employed it to recall the disaffected to their allegiance under the most solemn and impressive sanctions of the religion they professed, what injustice can be more disgraceful and disgusting than with the full knowledge of this exalted virtue, to make it the very foundation of scandalous defamation. It is this which Dr. Troy so justly complains of as a depravity of the most dangerous character.

Gentlemen, I do not wish to overstate the plaintiff's title to approbation and admiration. Indeed I am but ill qualified to become a disclaimer upon the merits of the Catholic church, being not only a Protestant, but a native of that part of his majesty's dominions where the national church may be said to be the very contrast of the Romish communion; and its faith as described by a celebrated writer being the very protestantism of the protestant religion. We feel, and none more than myself, that nothing has more contributed to keep alive animosities amongst mankind, and to retard the great work of reformation ordained in due season to unite the whole Christian world, than alienation from those who differ from us in religious creeds. It is an evil, however, which, thank God, is most happily passing away, and Dr. Troy has always done his part to accelerate its progress. I wish to avoid all political allusions; but this I may say with truth, that though many great and eminent men in parliament have differed on this momentous subject, and although it has strongly agitated the Roman Catholics who seek emancipation, yet the controversies have been every where discussed with exemplary moderation; and of this I am also confident, that whatever may have been the opinion of the lord chief justice on this subject, and though adhering to the opinion he delivered in parliament, he will nevertheless tell you (as his country has a right to expect from him), and impress it upon your attention in the decision of the matter now before you, that Dr. Troy, though a Roman Catholic, and as such holding tenets different from himself and from you, is entitled to the same measure of justice as any other man however distinguished by his zeal for the religious system which all of us profess. If Dr. Troy, instead of a sincere Christian teacher, had been a traitorous hypocrite, secretly wishing for resistance to authority, as has been wickedly imputed to him by the defendant; if he had been, in fact, an abettor of rebellion, instead of a dissuader from violence, making use of his religious station as a cloak only to conceal his real disposition, the truth of this might have been pleaded as a justification, and being proved, the defendant must have had a verdict; but no such plea having been put upon the record from the consciousness that it was incapable of proof, the plaintiff stands before you in point of law, what he is known to be in fact, an innocent and meritorious person.

In actions for libels and defamation I have often said, and I now repeat it, that no money can be a compensation for calumny—character cannot be compounded for by money; if a slanderer, instead of putting me to the cost and trouble of an action, were to send the largest sum to my bankers, should I be happier on that account, when my estimation in the world was tainted? it is therefore an imperfection in our law, but for which there is no remedy, that neither criminal nor civil justice can restore to the calumniated sufferer what he has lost. All that your verdict can do, and that you will take care it shall do, is, that the reproach, and your judgment of its falsehood, will go down to posterity together; so that whoever shall read this Anti-Jacobin Review hereafter, will know at the same time that the plaintiff's reputation had been vindicated by a British jury from its scandalous injustice.

Gentlemen, Dr. Troy is a Roman Catholic priest, and titular archbishop of Dublin. The government of England is tolerant, and though its indulgences have advanced by slow degrees, yet the Catholic and Protestant world have of late been drawing much nearer together. It is a delicate subject to touch upon. The ways of Providence are awful and mysterious throughout the whole course of this lower world. We see bitter contests and sanguinary conflicts arising out of a religion established to give peace upon earth, but in the same manner nature, through all its stages towards perfection, produces a turbulent commotion in its discordant parts; but we know that in the end there will be universal harmony in the Christian world. In the mean time it is most difficult to reconcile differences of religious faith—it is impossible at once to amalgamate mankind. It is our duty to adhere to our own establishment, but the law has in its wisdom exacted no professed mode of faith from its subjects. We have a variety of dissenting sectaries, differing as much from each other as the Church of England from them all. But the law protects them equally in their worship, though some incapacities are enacted; and so the Protestants thought when they told queen Elizabeth that no Roman Catholic of Ireland should be styled archbishop of Dublin, and an act of parliament then declared it to be criminal to usurp such an appellation; but there is no Irish statute which calls for the education or the profession of children in the tenets of the Established Church, and differences of religious faith are likely therefore long to continue under the mild sanctions of a free government; yet thank God we have, and ought to have but one object as to civil dominion. We are engaged in war with the most accomplished and powerful enemy we ever had to deal with, but we have nothing to fear if we are united. He knows and feels that discord alone can destroy us; and thinking that Ireland is the heel of the Achilles, the only vulnerable part of our widely extended empire, he exerts every influence to reach it, and it becomes therefore a corresponding duty in us to guard it against his attacks by healing animosities and cementing together all classes by every practicable indulgence, and by a faithful and equal administration of justice, of which you will to-day set a useful example. Many of you have, no doubt, opinions unfavourable to Catholics; but Protestants and Catholics are as one in a court of law, and in the person of the plaintiff you will see that honour, patriotism, and truth, are to be found in the one class as in the other.

Gentlemen, you must no doubt have observed, that many noble persons of Ireland have appeared upon the bench; but not wishing to detain them to their inconvenience they have been allowed to withdraw, lord Fingal being sufficient for my purpose as a witness. I have requested his lordship to remain, as this Anti-Jacobin Review, in most inflammatory terms, introduces its libellous attack on Dr. Troy, by adverting to a correspondence between that noble earl and another noble lord then at the head of the law in Ireland, a correspondence which is much misrepresented and distorted, and the reasoning on it highly injurious. Opinions are given in this publication, and illustrated by assumed examples to justify apprehensions of danger from the Roman Catholics, and as far as they are general and in the abstract, I have no privilege to condemn them, however false. Men have a right to argue as they feel upon the policy of yielding to papists more or less influence in the state; all this is undoubtedly the subject of free and fair discussion, and whatever inconvenience or injustice to individuals may sometimes attend it, yet freedom of discussion ought to be held sacred—to this the world owes its advancement. Perhaps a collision in discordant parts is necessary to bring about a state of rest and harmony in the end; for that cause we all have an unquestionable right to comment upon the various systems civil or religious, which distinguish and divide mankind, and to consider their bearings upon our happiness—we have a right to try them, and to publish our opinions on the probable effects of any particular mode of worship or of faith—nothing like this we question or complain of—our charge is, that instead of this general theory as it regards all men, the defendant applies the most dangerous principles and conduct to an individual as matter of fact; and this not only without evidence, but contrary to the most positive proof; and he then proceeds to arraign Dr. Troy even upon a subject of opinion which no longer exists—I mean on the danger of French principles. A change had taken place in the government of France, which had produced a great effect throughout Europe. There is now no false liberty held out to the thoughtless amongst the lower orders of the people, no false lights, no ignis-fatuus to mislead men to their ruin; we have seen in France all kinds of government leading to no improvement or stability, and ending at last in a despotism devouring all the rest. The fascination of French principles had necessarily therefore ceased before this libel was published, and can scarcely return in our times. I have only adverted to this to prove that any hopes of connection with France, by a public profession of her political principles, were at the time in question utterly extinguished, as you will now see from the short history of the case before you.

There was, you know, an extended insurrection, or more properly speaking, a rebellion in Ireland, not of Catholics only, but of Catholics and Protestants united, and which proceeded at last to a height which cannot be reflected upon, or stated without pain and horror. I am sorry to be obliged to recall the remembrance of it. It was a scene of indelible disgrace to its actors, in which the most hideous atrocities were committed, and in which that venerable and excellent person, lord Kilwarden, who filled the same station on the bench of justice in Ireland that the noble and learned judge does here, was murdered in the public streets of Dublin. It is a disgusting subject, and I trust the memory of it will pass away, leaving no other trace behind it but the penitence of its perpetrators. At that time, gentlemen, Dr. Troy had a great and just influence over the numerous members of the religion he professes—for how could so much piety and learning not possess it wherever it was known? he thought therefore that he might be useful in quelling a spirit which had recently appeared, and which had produced effects so dreadful, by an address to his Catholic followers, reminding them that they were then resisting a mild and beneficent government, to which they owed a temporal allegiance, but also against their own ancient and apostolic church, which condemned and must punish them. He addressed them, gentlemen, with more zeal and fervor than is, I am sorry to say, always to be found in the preachers of our Established Church, and with more probability of effect; as it is a well-established fact that the Catholics are more under the influence of their pastors than the Protestants, their flocks regarding them as the representatives of the primitive church. Surely therefore Dr. Troy was entitled to the greatest praise for his exertions; and even if his zeal was offensive, it might at least have escaped censure. It was on the very day following that horrid and disgraceful catastrophe in the streets of Dublin, that this pious exhortation was communicated to the numerous body of clergy, under his direction; having in their turns a most extensive influence, and who immediately published it amongst their numerous and widely-extended flocks, so that its influence may be said to have spread at one and the same moment over the whole Catholic communion in that distracted country. [Mr. Erskine here read part of the exhortation, dated Dublin, July 24th, 1803, signed by Dr. Troy himself.]

Gentlemen, this pious, benevolent, and patriotic exhortation was circulated, as will appear by the evidence, in the widest possible extent; breathing, as you must feel, the most exalted sentiments; inculcating the love of God and obedience to the laws, and reprobating violence as contrary to the divine precepts of the holy religion they professed; and so far was he from disconnecting this communication with the government of Ireland as administered at the very period in question, that he makes use of it to strengthen his advice, for such was the mildness of lord Hardwicke's administration, that Mr. Emmet declared on the scaffold, as Mr. Wickham, now sitting by the lord chief justice, can testify, that the reason for that insurrection being then excited was, that if not then commenced it would be too late, as the spirit of disaffection was from the lenity and justice of the government declining. Could any thing, gentlemen, more strikingly manifest the honest zeal of this reverend minister than availing himself of this crisis in his pious charge, which is without example throughout for its seasonable, eloquent, and fervid spirit. He lays the foundation of it in the religious duty of his followers, and warns them against the miseries of tumult and uproar by a true history of the French revolution, degenerating from specious but false doctrines, destroying all the energies of government, and under the banners of ignorant and unprincipled leaders subverting the freedom which so much blood had been shed to obtain, overthrowing and desolating other nations, whilst they were undermining the prosperity of their own. Here again, gentlemen, I must take the liberty to recite the language of this venerable person, to whose sentiments without referring to it, I am unable to do justice. [Here Mr. E. read from the exhortation, beginning with "the horrid scenes of last night," and ending with "such is the freedom of that once happy country."] ]

Gentlemen, if this had been written by any common man, having no influence over others from established pre-eminence or popularity, by a person who until then had been obscure, its truth and justice, the force of its reasoning and its eloquence, would have brought its author into immediate notice. If it had been read even by a beggar in the street, he would have been rewarded as a friend of his country at such a critical period, by a prudent government. Now, if this be so,—and it is impossible to deny it,—how atrocious is this attack upon him. If to have passed by such merit would have been invidious, how desperately wicked to make it the very foundation of abuse. I have several letters from persons high in office, particularly from lord Chichester (late Mr. Pelham), whose absence I lament, in which that distinguished person, then in Ireland, bestows on Dr. Troy's exhortation his valuable applause; for as every word which falls here from his lordship will come with much more force than from us who speak from the bar, so the influence of this reverend gentleman, then a titular archbishop, was sure to be more regarded than if it had proceeded from an inferior source; it came from an eminent man to an admiring multitude—not from an author to his equals, but from a pious pastor to an enthusiastic flock; and it is not surely for this libeller, after his charges against the Catholics, to deny that the higher priests of their communion have a most powerful influence over their inferior clergy as these have in their turns over the people. It follows therefore that he must be driven to admit that the influence of Dr. Troy's precept was in proportion to his eminence amongst those to whom it was addressed. Every thing that came from his pen, the defendant cannot but acknowledge had the sanction of high and regular authority, and was sure to be attended to with conviction and respect.

To judge of its merits, let us consider the probable results of an effort to a contrary effect. Suppose, instead of this pious exhortation, he had held out that there were many things in the new government of France well worthy of our imitation. That taxes in England were heavier and more numerous, and that we had deviated in many respects from those wise principles of our ancestors, by which our country had arisen to such an eminence amongst the nations of the earth. If he had written this, so obviously calculated to alienate affection from the state, would he not have been subject to an indictment? and shall he not then, when in the hour of danger he exerted all his faculties and influence to rouse the spirit of those under his direction to inculcate obedience to God and loyalty to the King, recalling the disaffected to the temper and disposition of faithful subjects,—shall he not be protected by the laws of this mighty and united empire? Shall he for acts the most meritorious be the victim of malicious and unpunished defamation? Shall this be the reward of a man who, for the purpose of quelling a rebellion, thus seasonably addressed his country?

[Here other parts of the exhortation were referred to by Mr. Erskine.]

Gentlemen, as soon as the exhortation was penned by Dr. Troy, it was printed, published, and extensively circulated, and great public benefit attended it. Lord Fingal, who now sits on the bench by lord Ellenborough, a person of great rank in Ireland, eminent from his talents and respected for his virtues, feeling the great advantages which had followed from it, and which it was likely further to produce, alluded to it in a correspondence between himself and the noble person, then at the head of the law in that country. Of the exhortation itself, you have now full knowledge, and have only to look at the return he received for it. The author of this libel begins thus:—"Nothing affords such strong evidences of popish dissimulation in Ireland as the exhortations of the Romish clergy and the loyal addresses of their flocks. They have been commonly found to be sure presages of a deep laid conspiracy against the Protestant state; and after it has exploded in rebellion, their clergy generally lament from the altar, the delusions of the people and their treasonable conduct towards the best of sovereigns, and the only constitution that affords any degree of rational liberty, though from the nature of their religion they must have known and might have prevented it."

Now if the libel had stopped here, though I should have considered the author as an enemy to the public peace and security by so gross an insult to the Catholics of Ireland; though at that alarming crisis it was wicked to agitate them by attacking their tenets and reviling their priests; yet Dr. Troy could not have appeared as a plaintiff before you: but he advances afterwards to Dr. Troy as an individual, and publishes that he must personally have known all the circumstances which preceded the insurrection in Dublin on the day before the date of the exhortation, yet that with treasonable misprision he did not put government on its guard, and that the administration was convinced of his treachery.

"The dreadful Rebellion of 1798, accompanied by such instances of popish perfidy, must convince the reader that no reliance is to be placed on the oaths or professions of Irish Papists to a Protestant state. Dr. Troy must have known all the circumstances which preceded the insurrection in Dublin on the 23rd of July, 1803, and yet he did not put government on their guard. The present administration are convinced of his treachery on that occasion, and yet for many years past he had been treated at the Castle with the utmost respect, and had even received favours for some persons of his own family. His exhortation then to which lord Fingal alludes, must be considered as a mockery of the state, an insult to the understandings of his Protestant fellow subjects, and an unquestionable testimony of his want of candour."

Now, gentlemen, I ask you, what compensation ought to be made to Dr. Troy (which you are upon your oaths to decide) for a calumny of this atrocious description which the malignity of a demon could only invent, and which, not having attempted to justify it as the truth, Mr. Symonds admits to be wilfully false? What indeed can be more atrocious than to impute to a minister of religion, in an hour of national peril, that he had secretly fomented rebellion with an exhortation cut and dry to deprecate and lament it afterwards? If I had to portray a fiend of the most horrible and disgusting description, I should describe him as this libel represents Dr. Troy; as aware of impending treason, but traitorously concealing it, and after its murderous perpetrations, employing the hallowed office of the priesthood to condemn it. This is the slander of which the plaintiff complains, and on the subject of damages you have only to ask yourselves this question; What would you yourselves expect from a jury, if you were thus traduced, and obliged to come from a remote part of the empire to vindicate your reputations? Whatever you feel in such a case were it your own, gives the rule for what your verdict ought to be; however he may be a sufferer from the trial being here and not in Ireland, where he is universally known and respected, yet he has the satisfaction of submitting his case to a tribunal aloof from all those animosities which have locally prevailed in Ireland, confident that in the center of this United Empire he will receive that justice of which the example is so essential to extend its influence. You will prove by your judgment that though other states and kingdoms may enjoy advantages in the natural world which we do not possess, yet that in the moral world we are superior to them all; and as this is the first case in which a Catholic clergyman appeals from one part of the empire to a Protestant tribunal in another, you will distinguish it also by the purity of the decision.

Gentlemen, I conclude with expressing my acknowledgment for the attention I have received from the Court. One thing, however, had nearly escaped me, which I wish not to pass over without further notice, as in the commencement of my address I only alluded to it. Though this is, as I have just said, the cause of a Catholic priest before a Protestant tribunal, yet remember that it has no manner of concern with the great question of state, so often and so lately agitated in the public councils. The Catholics are convinced of the justice of their claims, to fill all the offices of the government to which other subjects are eligible, but they claim them only as subjects from the state. They desire to be obedient to the laws and submit to their condition, until the laws shall in their favor be changed, which they confidently hope is an event close at hand, and I hope so also; it is not only a natural wish in a Catholic, but a duty to the faith he professes, to watch every occasion of renewing his claim to be placed upon the same footing with other subjects, whilst he subscribes to all the civil institutions of the realm.

EVIDENCE.

Charles William Auber sworn.—Examined by Mr. Wood.

Have you got the Anti-Jacobin Review for July, 1804?—I have.

Where did you purchase it?—At Mr. Symonds's shop in Paternoster-row.

Whom did you purchase it of?—Of a person serving in the shop.

Will you give it in, sir?

Lord Ellenborough.—You purchased it of a person who appeared there to sell books in the shop?—Yes, my lord.

[The book was then delivered in for the different passages stated as libels in the Declaration to be read by the officer.]

Mr. Erskine.—Will you read in page 325, beginning "Lord Fingal then said"?—

Mr. Garrow.—My lord, perhaps I may save some time by what I am about to submit to your lordship. In the view I take of this subject, it will be necessary that the whole of this book should be read to the jury; sooner or later that must be done. My learned friends, who are of counsel for the plaintiff, will do as they please; they have a right to make a selection only; but this I submit to their discretion, by way of saving time; I have no choice as to the mode; I will declare at once that my object is to show to your lordship and the jury, that this publication is nothing but a critique on the whole correspondence between the two noble lords whose names occur in it so frequently.

Mr. Erskine.—Let the whole be read; I have no objection.

Mr. Garrow.—That, I think, will be the more convenient course, for the publication itself will make a material part of my address to the jury.

[The officer of the court then read that part of the Anti-Jacobin Review for the month of July, 1804, which related to the observations on the correspondence between lords Redesdale and Fingal.]

Captain Cole sworn.—Examined by Mr. Talbot.

You are an officer in the army, I believe, sir?—I am, sir.

Were you in Dublin in the year 1803?—I was.

Was there an insurrection in Dublin in that year?—There was.

In what month of the year was it?—It was on the 23rd of July, 1803.

Patrick Wogan sworn.—Examined by Mr. Wood.

You are a printer, I believe, are you not?—I am.

You live in Dublin, I believe?—I do, sir.

Look at that manuscript [giving the witness a written paper].

Did you print that Exhortation, sir?—I did, sir.

Did you print many copies of it?—I believe about 80, or something that way; I printed as many as Dr. Troy thought he had parish priests in his diocese.

Lord Ellenborough.—Had he that number?—Yes, 80, and more, I believe, but I am not certain of the number.

Cross-examined by Mr. Park.

You are a bookseller as well as a printer?—I am a printer and bookseller also.

So I thought.—Yes, I am.

Dr. Troy was the author of that paper?—I am sure he was.

You sell books there, of course. Did you sell Reviews as they came from England?—No; I am rather a wholesale bookseller.

Do you know that that Review [giving him the Anti-Jacobin Review in question] came over from England to Ireland?—Indeed, I do not.

Is it circulated as it is with us—it is the Anti-Jacobin?—Indeed, I suppose it is, sir.

Have you seen it in Ireland?—No, indeed, sir, I have not; I never go into the other booksellers' shops; but when they come into mine, I sell to them.

You never amuse yourself with reading these pamphlets?—Indeed, I do not.

Patrick Wogan re-examined.

When did you receive that manuscript from Dr. Troy?—On the morning of the 24th of July he sent it to me, and on the Monday following I printed it.

Lord Ellenborough.—Which was on the 25th?—Yes, my lord.

[Here the Exhortation was read by the officer of the court, dated Dublin, Sunday, 24th July, 1803.]

The Earl of Fingal sworn.—Examined by Mr. Erskine.

Lord Fingal, you are of the Roman Catholic persuasion?—I am.

And dwell in Ireland?—I do.

Is that which has been just now read by the officer of this court, the Exhortation you alluded to in your lordship's correspondence, taken notice of in the publication which has been read? Is it the Exhortation your lordship alluded to?

Mr. Garrow.—The allusion of the noble earl is stated to have been in the course of a correspondence; that allusion is a particular allusion of the noble earl, and a specific one, in writing, and we cannot have that allusion proved in this way. There is an allegation that the noble earl made allusion in a letter written by him to another person of high rank and consideration; we can hear nothing of that letter unless it is produced.

Lord Ellenborough.—The allusion was in a letter, you say?

Mr. Erskine.—When the libel itself, which has been read to your lordship and the jury, is, as my learned friend, Mr. Garrow, himself states it, a commentary on that correspondence which took place between lord Fingal and lord Redesdale, I submit to your lordship, that the noble earl now under examination, may be permitted to give evidence of his allusion to that Exhortation on which so material a part of the correspondence was founded.

Mr. Garrow.—My lord, my objection is this: a certain printed paper, which is called a Libel, has been read in evidence; another certain written paper is also read in evidence; an allusion is said to have been made to that paper in writing; that allusion is stated to have been made by the noble earl now under examination; my objection is this—that such allusion, whatever it was, was contained in a letter written by the noble earl, and that, therefore, no proof can be given of it by parol.

Mr. Erskine.—Was it the Exhortation of Dr. Troy your lordship alluded to in your correspondence with lord Redesdale?

Mr. Garrow.—That is the very thing that I am objecting to.

Lord Ellenborough.—We must see the letters, certainly, or hear nothing about them. Has lord Fingal got the letters?

Mr. Erskine.—No, my lord; your lordship will deal with the observation I am about to make, as it is fit it should be dealt with, but it is my duty to make it, and it arises from the course taken in reading the whole of the libel. I apprehend, that as this libel is what my learned friend stated it to be, "a running commentary on the whole correspondence" which took place, by letter, between lord Fingal and lord Redesdale, and as the libel itself takes upon it, as I may say, to refer to all the letters written by lord Fingal to lord Redesdale, and which letters are stated in the libel itself to allude to the Exhortation of Dr. Troy, and to incorporate, as it were, the words of that Exhortation, I have a right to ask lord Fingal the question I proposed. In their libel they say this: "Before they advert to any of the particulars, they think it right to observe, that the letters addressed by lord Redesdale to lord Fingal"—that is in page 317.

Lord Ellenborough.—Correspondence between lord Redesdale and lord Fingal there cannot be, as here stated, except the species of correspondence which consists in their having written to one another.

[Here Mr. Erskine read the words in the Anti Jacobin Review, 317; and also words in page 319, on the subject of the obligation which the Catholics of England owed to lord Redesdale, and lamenting that his lordship should have the opinion he has of the Catholics, who said, that the Catholic opinion is the same every where; and then adverted to page 321, where lord Fingal observes, that the Catholics expected a full share in the constitution, &c.; and then alluded also to that part of lord Fingal's correspondence which referred to the Exhortation of Dr. Troy; and also to that part of lord Fingal's letter in which he said that lord Redesdale had pleaded the cause of the Catholics.]

Now, my lord, said Mr. Erskine, supposing it could not be necessary, or perhaps not fitting, that the whole of those letters should be read, as we cannot have the benefit of the testimony of lord Redesdale. (Indeed, without his majesty's permission, he could not come from Ireland, and therefore we are prevented from giving the whole of the oral testimony we might have had, as well as the documentary.) Have I, therefore, not a right, my lord, to ask the noble earl, whether the Exhortation of Dr. Troy, which has been read to your lordship and the jury, was or was not the Exhortation to which the noble earl alluded? Now, the very complaint we make is, that lord Fingal having made that allusion, they, by denying it, have taken an opportunity of reviling Dr. Troy, and they say, that lord Fingal was imposed upon by his good-nature, and by his trust and confidence in the Catholic clergy; they write answers and criticisms upon lord Fingal's good-nature, and on what he wrote to lord Redesdale; and they say too, that Dr. Troy must have known what he wrote, not to be true. I therefore submit, that under all these circumstances, I am entitled to ask the noble earl, whether he alluded to the Exhortation of Dr. Troy?

Lord Ellenborough.—Will you read the allegations on the record?

Mr. Garrow.—The allegation is this [reading the words of the declaration]: that, late before the printing and publishing of the malicious, scandalous, and defamatory libel, hereafter mentioned, the earl of Fingal had, in a certain letter, written, or caused to be written, by him, the said earl, to lord Redesdale, alluded and adverted to the above-mentioned Exhortation, so written, composed, and published, and caused, &c. to be written, composed, and published, by the said plaintiff, in Dublin, &c. as aforesaid.

Now, my lord, I have never heard an objection stated, in which I had more confidence, than that which I am now pressing before your lordship. The language of this declaration is, that the noble earl, now near your lordship, had written, and caused to be written, to lord Redesdale of which there is no evidence, and can be no evidence, but by the production of the original letters; an allusion is made to the absence of an eminent person, at the head of our profession in Ireland; my lord, if his attendance had been thought by him to be essential to the administration of justice, I am sure he would have attended; and I am sure also, that no obstacle would have been thrown in his way. As to the passages in any supposed letters of lord Fingal, they do not profess to have seen any manuscripts of lord Fingal; they advert to certain letters in print, from Dr. Coppinger. If they printed any thing of the correspondence we have seen, I am bound to believe they printed it entirely without the authority of the noble earl. I am bound to suppose, out of respect to the noble earl, that they have introduced into the world, under the title of the Correspondence of that noble earl, interpolations not at all justified by the signature or authority of the noble earl, now upon the bench. What is alluded to, by way of correspondence of the noble earl, is, what I am bound to consider as a mere printed paper of supposed letters of lord Fingal;—that somebody has printed something, purporting to be letters of lord Fingal, not delivered at all to lord Redesdale, but which, in point of fact, are falsely alleged to have been delivered to lord Redesdale; and this shows the great injustice, as well as inconvenience, to make any allusion to a thing, without having the whole of it before us, so that it might be read, as the publication proved has been read, by the officer of the court. So much for the inconvenience of talking of allusion to things, that are in themselves not genuine; but I am, at present, on a pure dry question of evidence, and my objection to asking the noble earl the question proposed by my learned friend is, against giving evidence by parol of a written document.

Lord Ellenborough.—The allegation in the declaration is, “that lord Fingal had, in certain letters, written, or caused to be written, certain matters therein specified.” Now, in order to verify that allegation, we ought to have before us these letters. I am going with Mr. Erskine as far as I can; but as soon as we hear any thing of that which is in writing, we cannot proceed without that writing. I cannot hear, therefore, of any thing in the shape of letters, between these two noble persons. If, indeed, we had evidence that these noble lords had, as some people, I understand, are in the habit of doing, destroyed their correspondence, then evidence by parol might be received concerning it. As to the allegation in the declaration, whenever it is specific, it must be established by specific proof.

Mr. Erskine here adverted to several counts in the declaration, with a view of showing, that this species of proof could be received, saying—As we do not take upon us to aver, what the allusion of lord Fingal to lord Redesdale was, only that he alluded to the exhortation of Dr. Troy, without saying it was in this manner, or in that manner, only stating that he did allude to it—

Lord Ellenborough.—Whatever allusion was made by lord Fingal, it was in writing, and it would be breaking in upon the clearest and best established principles of law, to give parol evidence of any thing that is in writing. When any thing is done in writing, that act so done, must be proved by the production of that writing.

Mr. Erskine.—I submit to your lordship, Whether it is not proof as against this defendant, who has recognized the fact, by his own act, for he states the fact, that the allusion was made.

Lord Ellenborough.—That is proof against him that some allusion was made, but what that allusion was, we cannot hear, when we find it is in writing, without the production of that writing. You may take the fact, that lord Fingal made some allusion, and that he made that allusion in writing; but before you can stir one step further, on that subject, you must produce that writing.

Mr. Erskine.—He may have alluded to it, by parol.

Lord Ellenborough.—That lord Fingal can tell us. If his lordship said he alluded to any, by parol, it either may, or may not be evidence; but, if he says it was by writing, we cannot hear any thing further of it, without the production of that writing. I cannot get over the rule of evidence; but you do not want that proof, Mr. Erskine?

Mr. Erskine.—Lord Fingal had several personal interviews with lord Redesdale, as well as correspondence by letter; I will, with your lordship's permission, ask that question.

Mr. Garrow.—And when that question is asked, I shall most assuredly object to it, and with the greatest confidence that I shall be sustained in my objection by the judgment of your lordship, and my confidence is the stronger, because I have your lordship's judgment already to the greater part of this subject. There is no pretence for saying, that when the writing now before us, which is called a libel, refers to an allusion in a correspondence, between two noble lords, it is not by letter.

Lord Ellenborough.—I do think that species of evidence is excluded, for the allegation in the pleadings, refers to a letter, whether written or printed no matter.

Mr. Erskine.—If my lord Redesdale were here, I should have no difficulty upon this subject, but I must struggle as well as I can without his testimony.

Lord Ellenborough.—You should ask whether the plaintiff in this action, is known by the appellation of Dr. Troy?

Mr. Erskine to lord Fingal.—Is he known by the appellation of Dr. Troy, my lord?—Yes.

Is he a minister exercising the functions of a Catholic priest, in Ireland?—Yes, he is.

Was your lordship from the reading of that Exhortation now in court, acquainted with its nature?

Mr. Garrow.—I object to this Exhortation being spoken of, unless lord Fingal will say that he knows this identical paper now produced, is the one to which he alluded.

Mr. Park.—There is no allusion to this identical exhortation at all, in the count of the declaration on which they rely.

Lord Ellenborough.—Then you will go on with the examination of lord Fingal.

Mr. Erskine.—Does Dr. Troy inculcate the doctrine of the gospel, according to the forms of the popish church?—No doubt, he does.

Mr. Erskine.—Then I am to understand, your lordship is of opinion, that I cannot ask lord Fingal the question I proposed, about the Exhortation?

Lord Ellenborough.—I think you cannot.

The Earl of Fingal cross-examined by Mr. Garrow.

When your lordship first saw the Anti-Jacobin Review, in which these passages are contained, I think it was here, my lord?—I think it was.

Did your lordship see it in Dublin?—No, I did not.

You did not see it in Dublin?—No, I think not.

Is your lordship sure of that?—I am sure I did not.

Mr. Erskine.—I cannot carry that part of the proof further, my lord.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Garrow.—May it please your lordship—Gentlemen of the Jury—My learned friend, who has been so long and so often distinguished for the conduct of causes in this and many other places, especially where reputation is concerned, has expressed, with considerable emphasis, that he felt great anxiety in this case.---Now, gentlemen, I can assure you, without the least affectation, I feel great anxiety too, that the defence of this client of mine has fallen into my hands, not that, even in my hands, am I alarmed for the result, but that I feel it would, in the hands of others of my friends, be better conducted, and, therefore, could I have wished that this task had fallen to the lot of another, not however that I mean it may not be performed here even by me.

Gentlemen, my learned friend has introduced the plaintiff to you, as a distinguished person in that part of the United Kingdom, which we once called the Sister Kingdom, which now, thank God, is closely united with us; and he said in the middle and the conclusion of his speech, with strong emphasis, that which conveyed to my mind, pretty plainly, an intimation of a fear that his client would not meet with, what he, however said, he was assured he would meet, a fair and impartial hearing, and equal justice, to which he is most indisputably entitled. My learned friend said, that in all other cases, he expected that my lord and you would do justice; I know that both he and you will do justice in this, as well as in all other cases, but I know of no distinction that entitles the present plaintiff to more attention than any other suitor of this court, and I know he will receive as much, both from you and the noble and learned lord, whose abilities we have now for a considerable time witnessed in the administration of justice, which I hope he will long continue to administer, as he has, I know, in all cases, administered according to the best lights of his lordship's understanding, on the size and character of which, I will, at present, say nothing, because I cannot advance, by my opinion, the esteem which all who know him, have for him. We may rest assured, we shall have every thing from that noble and learned judge, which the best lights operating upon the most perfect integrity can give; in this, as in all other cases, you, gentlemen, will have his lordship's faithful assistance.

My learned friend says, that you are, all of you, Protestants, and may therefore, entertain prejudice against this gentleman on account of his religion. If, by prejudice, my friend could mean that sort of feeling which may have an undue effect on the determination of this cause, I am sure you have none, nor do I desire you should have any such. I do not ask, I do not desire your verdict on any such ground; I do not ask it on any ground but that on which equal justice is dealt out to all his majesty's subjects; I ask a verdict upon no other ground than that my client is not that calumniator which, my learned friend, for the purposes of his cause, has thought fit to represent to you that he is, but that he is a person of a very different description, and entitled to a very different consideration.

Gentlemen, my learned friend tells you, that Dr. Troy is an unoffending and peaceable individual; nor was that all, for my learned friend said, he should himself be a libeller, if he stopped there. Dr. Troy, he told us, was not only an innocent, unoffending, but also a meritorious individual, entitled to great consideration, possessing the esteem of all who knew him, and highly respected by all who ever heard of him. Gentlemen, I do not stand here to declaim against Dr. Troy, nor to travel out of this cause to take any notice whatever of him, or to insinuate that he may be calumniated with impunity; it shall not be said, that for the purpose of obtaining a verdict for my client, I took an opportunity of attacking the character of Dr. Troy. He may be of perfectly fair character; I will go further, and admit that he is, without knowing any thing of the fact; I will gratuitously admit that he is a perfectly good member of society, and that, by his virtuous disposition, and the tenets of his faith, he has gained the confidence of the noble earl, now sitting on the bench by my lord chief justice. That he is an honourable man, of great consideration in Ireland, is a matter upon which I will have no dispute; further I will not go, until you deliver your verdict. That Dr. Troy, as a citizen, is a meritorious individual, I am not inclined to deny; it is only as a Roman Catholic clergyman, and in that view too, only on the tenets of his religion, and the effect that may have upon his flock, that he is taken notice of at all in the paper which has been brought before you, as matter of complaint on behalf of Dr. Troy. You would wonder, perhaps, that we should request the whole of that paper to be read; not only was it fit, however, we should make that request, but it was our duty to do so, and yours, in administration of justice, to hear the whole of that paper read, before I had an opportunity of addressing you; because, it is by hearing the whole of the paper, you can develope the intention of the writer.

Gentlemen, my learned friend, Mr. Erskine has, on this occasion, with that blaze of eloquence, which he has no difficulty in introducing, for the benefit of his client, at any time, brought before you, subjects, which, although, in the way in which he treated them, they were engaging, have no more relation to the subject, I should not say, no relation to the subject, because, I do believe, and I trust, I shall make you feel, that they had every thing to do with the subject which was meant to be brought before you, although in strictness, they had no more to do with the issue you are called upon to try, than with any foreign matter which has been mentioned in this court, this day; I say then, that these topics, so foreign to the issue you are sworn to try, have every thing to do with the real cause of bringing this matter forward; for, damages to Dr. Troy, for the injury he has sustained, by the publication of which this declaration complains, and which it denominates a libel, is the last thing the real parties in this case have in view, by bringing this action before you. My learned friend told you as a matter much to be desired, as "a consummation devoutly to be wished," that the day may arrive (and the disposition of those who have had the government of mankind, has always tended towards it) when we shall all be drawn into one mode of belief, that there is a tendency in the moral world, to that effect, when we shall, by degrees, being drawn closer and closer, at last become (he did not so express himself, but what he said was to that effect) as it were one flock under one shepherd, that we shall all be of one mode of faith, without pretending to say what mode of faith that may be, or what it is for the general interest of mankind it should be: I have no difficulty in saying, I know what mode of faith his client hopes it will be, and that, by the extirpation of all other modes, it is the Roman Catholic faith—that is the mode of faith which he hopes we shall all have the benefit of enjoying; this I am warranted in saying, because they have now, not only in Ireland, where they are so numerous, but in England, where they are comparatively so few, societies industriously employed in the propagation of their faith, and the making of proselytes, for which I find no fault with them, for, as they are persuaded of the purity of their faith, their zeal for its establishment is laudable. They stand much higher than we do, on the ground of industry, and, I believe, they have reason to congratulate themselves on the success of their endeavours, in making proselytes: as they are themselves convinced it is the only true mode of faith, that it is the true religion, and that it is matter of duty in them, to omit no means for its propagation, it is natural to expect, that they should improve every opportunity that offers to extend it, as widely as possible. I hope, however, that our reformed religion, as we take the liberty of calling it, by which we have renounced, what we heretically perhaps, call the "errors of the church of Rome"—I hope, that the mode of worship now followed by the established church of England, will continue long enough to out-live me, and that I shall not be one of the number who are to be brought under the superior lights of the Catholic religion. I am content with the mode of worship of the church of England, such as it is, and to it I am determined to adhere. Do not, however, let it be imagined, that I am so arrogant, so presumptuous, so vain, so silly, or so weak a creature, as to think myself qualified to condemn any person who professes the Roman Catholic religion; God forbid I should be so presumptuous: they have been brought up under the religion of their parents, they follow the same mode of faith, and I should respect a man more for professing, with sincerity, that which appeared to me to be erroneous, or superstitious, or idolatrous, than a person who professed, but did not feel, that which appeared to me to be a better mode of worship in itself, but who, in truth, had no religion whatever. As to myself, therefore, I desire to be understood to say, that I have, most unaffectedly I speak it, great respect for many of the members of the Catholic church, with whom I have the pleasure to be intimately acquainted, but I am by no means desirous of assuming to myself any superior powers of discernment, on account of my being a member of the church of England; it is a matter of accident, which I think matter of fortunate accident, that I am of that persuasion; it is the religion in which I was educated, and which was professed by my parents. I am far from saying that I have dived so deeply into those abstruse and profound subjects, as to be able to pronounce that all those from whose mode of faith I dissent, are in error; or to say, that supposing them to be so, I can point out all the matters wherein their errors consist, but I will meddle with the Roman Catholic religion only, as it respects the subject now under discussion before you, and as it is referred to in the Anti-Jacobin Review, of which the plaintiff, by this action, complains, and which, in the language of this record, is stated to be written in the malignant spirit and intention of destroying the fair fame and reputation of Dr. Troy, with a view of having it believed, that he was endeavouring to promote rebellion in Ireland, concealing the guilt of those who were concerned in it, and which he knew before it happened, which is a misprision of treason. Now the question is, Was that part of the pamphlet written with that, or with a very different view?

Gentlemen, let us see a little what the record states, and imputes to this defendant. It complains of a paper which has been just read to you, setting forth—That a noble lord, now at the head of the court of Chancery in Ireland, than whom a more eminent person never filled a seat of justice, by the favour of his majesty (a favour less conferred on that noble person, than on his majesty's subjects, who have benefited so much by the appointment) was placed in that elevated situation. That noble person, with that discernment, and that humanity, for which he has been long distinguished, viewing the deplorable state of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, and having seen the inactivity of those who could better conduct themselves towards their inferiors, if so minded, considered it a fortunate opportunity he had of bringing about that reformation in the manners of the lower classes of the Catholic community of Ireland, wrote to the noble earl, now on the bench by my Lord Chief Justice, stating his opinion on that which was not doubted to be a deplorable state of the lower orders of the people there, and also, with a precision which nothing could excel the causes which produced their unfortunate condition, and stating also, in the most perspicuous manner, the remedy for the evil, that nothing could so much conduce to the removing it, as the activity of those Catholics, who, from their rank, talents, and integrity, had an high fame among them, especially those who acted as magistrates; by whose influence, when well directed, so much might be done to the advantage of that community, and above all, that the noble earl, who was about to be invested with an office of most important trust, might be most instrumental in that great and good work. The noble and learned person to whom I am now alluding, considering these things, and being actuated by these motives, did write to the noble earl, his sentiments upon this most important subject, and he spoke with the sincerity and freedom of true friendship. This, gentlemen, was a private, confidential letter, written by one person of high rank, and most eminent station, to another of high rank also, and eminent condition in society, and a person of great influence with the Roman Catholics. This letter, thus written, with a motive the most pure and benevolent, and under the most inviolable secrecy, as it was intended not to be published, but to be acted upon—this letter, how, I will not venture to guess, but by some means or other, utterly unexplained, and as utterly inconsistent with common honour—aye, gentlemen, utterly inconsistent with the rules of good faith, without which, society cannot be held together, but without any blame, I am quite sure—I say not how it happened, but without any blame, most assuredly, of the noble earl, but, some how or other, without any reference or regard to the principles of common honour among gentlemen, these letters of my lord chancellor of Ireland, were all of a sudden published, together with the commentaries of Dr. Coppinger, of Cloyne, with various remarks. These letters became, afterwards, the subject of conversation in a great and illustrious assembly. To what passed in that assembly, I will not allude, because, it is not regular I should before you; but I feel there is reason to lament, that these letters were thus brought before the public, and, it is the opinion of the author of the article, on which you are this day to pass your judgment, that it is much to be regretted, that those who obtained them, if they fairly obtained them for a laudable purpose, should have made of them the use they did. They were sent to the chief person in the Catholic community of Ireland, in order that he might, from his high station, extend his influence among those, whose welfare was the object of the author; they were sent with that view to a magistrate, and a minister, entitled to great attention, for his character and qualities, in every respect, and they might have been communicated to another, without any breach of confidence, for they might have been given to another for the purpose of having their object accomplished; but when I recollect that the noble earl, to whom they were, in confidence, entrusted, is so illustrious a member of the communion, to which they relate, I am well assured it never could have been the intention of the noble earl, that the private confidential communication of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, should be made the vehicle of communication to the public, through the medium of the press; still less could it be the intention of that noble earl, to make such a communication to the public, with the commentaries of others; for that was a conduct I can never impute to the noble earl, for I cannot impute to him such a flagrant breach of confidence, of common honour, and of decorum—for these were sentiments and opinions not intended to have been published; and, I do not hesitate to state, that such a publication must have been done by stealth, and, in a manner to which the noble earl was not privy. It was a communication intended to have a favourable effect upon the objects of it—intended to make a favourable impression on the minds of the people of Ireland, but the use that was made of that communication was, to fill the heads of the people of Ireland with hatred, and their minds with animosity towards the noble lord who made it. The letters were written by a noble person, who was placed in a confidential situation by the authority of his majesty, to another noble person, who was in a situation to do a great deal of good, if the system was adopted; stating, confidentially, the opinion of that noble lord on the Catholics of Ireland, but which being published, together with comments of a certain nature, created great animosity against that noble lord, the lord chancellor of Ireland.

In this situation of things, this defendant set about to do, what we in England, have a habit of thinking every man has a right to do, namely, to comment on what had been published upon that occasion. Dr. Coppinger brought lord Redesdale and lord Fingal before the public, and the defendant commented upon the propriety of that proceeding; and, in so doing, he has conducted himself with as much moderation and propriety, in a manner as likely to contribute to the advancement of moral rectitude, of truth, and of religion, as any of our modern authors have done, as the defendant is in the habit of doing by this his publication—I speak of the Anti Jacobin Review, a publication, which, I will venture to affirm, has done as much good to the cause of virtue, especially on the great question of the claims of the Catholics of Ireland, as any periodical publication that issues from the press, either in this country or that. He has ventured to compare, with each other, the opinions of the two noble lords, whose letters were brought before the public, not by any officiousness of the defendant, for he found them published; a right which, nobody will dispute, he was entitled to exercise; and the only question will be, Whether he has, or has not exercised that right with decorum?

Gentlemen, it was for this purpose, that I desired the whole of the publication complained of to be read; and now, that you have heard the whole of it, I ask you, whether at the conclusion of the energetic and eloquent speech of my learned friend, Mr. Erskine, you did not believe the publication, which he so vehemently censured, was not a violent libel, penned for the express purpose of attacking the character of Dr. Troy? that the defendant had made that publication the vehicle for the most wicked and atrocious abuse of Dr. Troy? I ask you, did you not think so, when my friend had concluded his address to you? Now, gentlemen, you have heard the whole read, I would venture to appeal to your candour on this question; is it any such thing? Supposing the general tenor of the language of this publication to be libellous, there are other characters taken notice of in it, who have full as much as, if not more reason to complain, than Dr. Troy. I think, my lord Fingal, would have full as much right to an action for a libel upon this publication, as Dr. Troy; I think he is as severely traduced in it, supposing either of them to be traduced in it, as Dr. Troy. I think, a learned gentleman at the bar, whom we all know, Mr. Plowden, has more reason still, for complaint, than either of the former two; for his four volumes of the History of the Catholics, are much more roughly handled, than the characters of either the noble earl or the reverend gentleman; and, we know that authors generally tender the reputation of their books, as much as they do that of their character. I am of opinion, that Dr. Coppinger would have a great deal more reason to complain, than Dr. Troy; but, of fourteen pages closely printed, of this pamphlet, and of the whole of which we have heard loud complaints, from my learned friend, Mr. Erskine, the whole is at last reduced to four lines in one page, namely, 325, on which my learned friend laid great emphasis, as being an atrocious libel on Dr. Troy; but in which, his name only incidentally occurs, and in which it is, as it were, casually introduced; but, as to the rest, there is no evidence whatever, to support the plaintiff's case. In one part, the defendant is charged with having made use of some argument with respect to the loyalty and fidelity of Dr. Troy, his sincerity respecting the advice he gave to the Catholics of Ireland. In consequence of something that was done by Dr. Troy, and, on the nature of the address of Dr. Troy, the defendant proceeds to make observations upon that subject. But, it is most extraordinary, and cannot have failed to have struck your minds as such, that Dr. Troy's appeal to justice should be made here, for Dr. Troy is stated, and I dare say truly, to have been, great part of his life, a resident in Ireland. I think he might have stated if the special pleader would have done so, that he was all his life-time in Ireland, and that Dublin was the chief place of his residence; so that the trial, which we are now discussing in the county of Middlesex, might have been better had in Dublin, and we are here now before a jury of the county of Middlesex, inquiring how much shall be given, by way of compensation for a libel published here indeed, but published also in Ireland, for of that, gentlemen, there can be no doubt, how much, I say, should be given to the titular archbishop of Dublin, for an attack on his character. It is true, indeed, that if he wanted the splendid talents of my learned friend Mr. Erskine, to grace his case, he was under the necessity of laying the venue here, for my learned friend does not practise in Dublin; but if the object of Dr. Troy was to have a splendid speech pronounced in honour of his character there was no occasion to come to this side the water for that purpose, for there is, on that side of it, a gentleman equal to any on this, for that purpose, and this my learned friend Mr. Erskine, will not feel to be any disparagement to him; and indeed without disparagement to any man on either side the water, I may venture to say that if a brilliant oration, if powerful and affecting declamation, was the thing wanted, if to pronounce an elegant eulogium on the character of the plaintiff, or encomium on the leaders of the Catholics of Ireland, had been the object, in a word, if to have the aid of as eloquent a speech as can be delivered by man, had been the object of Dr. Troy, there was no occasion to come from Ireland to this country for that purpose, because I know of no man of the present day, who can justly claim pre-eminence in that respect over Mr. Curran, and that learned gentleman practises in Ireland. We have heard of speeches from that learned and most eloquent advocate, illustrative of what I am now speaking to: and here it occurs to me to ask the plaintiff, what reason there is for your coming here, for the purpose of trying this cause, before a Middlesex jury, where you can only be known distantly by reputation, instead of being tried by a jury of the city of Dublin, who are more intimately acquainted with your character, and who must, of course, have a more lively sense of your public and private virtues? Why do you take the trouble of travelling so far for the purpose of being tried by strangers?—This I am the more induced to observe, when I reflect, there is now on the records of this court, a plea* (that of Mr. Justice Johnson), on which the noble and learned chief justice, before whom I have now the honour of addressing you, delivered the judgment of this Court,—a plea to its jurisdiction. That plea was upon the same species of question as the present; it was a plea to a libel, stated to have been published in the county of Middlesex; and the defendant, being a resident, as the present plaintiff is, in Ireland, pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court; stating that before the Union of the two kingdoms, Ireland had courts of its own, sufficient for the due administration of its justice, and that such courts possessed the same power after the Union, as they did before it; for that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, still retained its laws, and had judges of its own, sitting as they were wont, in their own courts, and that, therefore, the libel being imputed as a publication by a native of Ireland, ought to have been tried there; and very strenuous arguments were urged in favour of that plea, by my learned friend Mr. Richardson, on the inconvenience to the defendant from having the cause tried at such a distance from his native land; upon the whole of that case the Court delivered its judgment, that the Court had jurisdiction over the case, because the publication of the writing charged to be a libel, was in the county of Middlesex, and was, therefore, not a subject of indictment in Ireland. But that is not the case of the publication complained of before you—because the Anti-jacobin Review was as much published in Ireland as in England, as much published in Dublin as in London; and because this is a civil action, and not local; and yet here we are in the county of Middlesex, trying an action for defamation,—a subject peculiarly proper to be judged of by those who know the character and circumstances of the accusing party,—brought by the titular archbishop of Dublin, an entire stranger to us all, as far as regards the evidence in this case, and we can proceed on nothing else. Under such circumstances, you would think it matter of astonishment that the reverend gentleman should prefer a trial in this place; and so it would be if damages were the true object of this action, but we shall by-and-by develope this seeming mystery and reveal it; for I do not suppose there is any desire in any party concerned in this action to punish Mr. Symonds, the bookseller, of Pater-noster-row, more than Mr. Wogan, the bookseller in Dublin; and it would, without looking further than this cause, be matter of surprise to any one, that the archbishop of Dublin should look out for a bookseller of Pater-noster-row, to be accountable for attacking his character, when so many of his own countrymen had published the book of which he complains. And the matter becomes still the more unaccountable when we observe how much embarrassed my learned friend Mr. Erskine has been, in his proof, because, as he told you himself, my lord Redesdale could not attend as a witness, which we all know he could not, without neglecting the important duties of his station, nor indeed, without his majesty's permission, first obtained for that purpose, can he leave Ireland, and on which account, the plaintiff withdrew his record on a former occasion. All these are reasons why this action should have been tried before the chief justice of the King's-bench in Ireland, rather than before the chief justice of the King's-bench in England, and as to the important evidence which has been given this day by the noble earl, he might have given it at his own home instead of coming here so great a distance; but indeed, to say the truth, it was hardly necessary to have examined the noble earl at all on this occasion, because all the proof he has given, I should readily have admitted if applied to for that purpose; for it consists in nothing more than that Dr. Troy the plaintiff in this cause professes the Roman Catholic religion, and exercises the functions of a priest in that mode of worship. That is the whole of the evidence of the noble earl.

We had indeed our attention greatly attracted in an early part of the day by the appearance upon the bench, by the side of my Lord Chief Justice, of a number of noblemen, my lord Castlereagh, my lord Westmoreland, my lord Sidmouth, my lord Camden. These illustrious characters were all introduced, and they had the pleasure of bowing respectfully to my Lord Chief Justice, and after sitting for a while, Mr. Erskine is asked, pray do you wish to examine my lord Camden, if not, his lordship would be glad to be released, his presence being essential elsewhere?—"Oh! no, I do not wish to detain my lord Camden," says my learned friend. Then in a few minutes the same request is made on the part of my lord Sidmouth—whose presence may be wanted at the council—to which my learned friend Mr. Erskine, after seeming to consider whether he can possibly consent to wave the examination of that noble lord as a witness or not, says, as it were on the sudden,—"Oh! no; I do not think I shall have any question to ask of my lord Sidmouth,"—my lord Castlereagh wishes, to know whether he may retire, having much public business of state to attend to?—"No, I shall have no question to ask my lord Castlereagh," says my learned friend;—the earl of Westmoreland requests to know, if it be necessary he should remain in court? "I will not detain my lord Westmoreland," says my learned friend again; in short, gentlemen, these noble lords bowed out of court, with the same elegance and grace as they bowed into it, being brought here for the mere purpose of bowing into, and out of court; they were brought here for the mere purpose of ornament, and not for use. There was, however, a design in all this, although it has turned out to be useless; the object was to make a show by the presence of these illustrious persons, and to make a seeming, that but for some unforeseen accident, they might have been examined, and that it was impossible that such characters could have any thing but important testimony to give; O dear! this is all art! for last night, you may depend upon it, all my learned friends held a consultation, and knew as much then as they do now, that the rules of law would not permit them to examine my lord Pingal, touching written correspondence; and my learned friends Mr. Talbot, Mr. Wood, and

Mr. Erskine, knew very well, that not a question was to be put to either of these noble lords; but messengers were nevertheless dispatched to each of their mansions, informing them of the exigency of their summons; "pray, my lord, remember that your lordship should be in the court of King's-bench tomorrow morning at nine o'clock, or you may be too late; my lord Ellenborough sits precisely at nine, I hope your lordship will not fail:" and so these noble persons are brought to make a bow each, at their ingress and egress; but this was not to fail making a figure in the speech of my learned friend, although it made none in the proof.

As to the examination of the noble earl to the written correspondence, my learned friends knew very well, that lord Ellenborough could never suffer them to put any questions upon that subject, without producing the writing; and now, having discussed all this, which is the mere phantasmagoria of the case, the mere shadow of the shade of the question—my learned friend, knowing he could make nothing of what he had, wished to make something of what he had not. He knew that lord Chichester would not be present, and then it became important to lament his absence. If lord Chichester were present, he would give the most important evidence of all in behalf of Dr. Troy, he could produce letters of the various ministers of state by which the merit of Dr. Troy would appear, and by which the malignity of the libel would appear also—Oh! that my lord Chichester did but attend! he knew, very well, the noble lord did not, nor do I believe he would have examined him if he were present; but my learned friend, seeing my most esteemed and right honourable friend Mr. Wickham upon the bench, made a seeming appeal to him on the subject of the rebellion in Ireland, and of what was uttered by one of the leaders of that desperate enterprise, and particularly Mr. Emmett, but he did not dare to ask Mr. Wickham a single question on the subject of the rebellion in Ireland, neither did he dare to ask any one of the noble lords who appeared upon the bench, a single question as to the effect of the declaration of Dr. Troy, which made so prominent a figure in the speech of my learned friend. He knew very well what he was about, he dared not open their mouths upon the subject of the rebellion, because the moment he did so, they would become subject to my cross-examination, not that I should have examined whether Dr. Troy was a traitor, not that I should have examined whether he, like some others of the Catholics had been found in arms against his majesty's government, after preaching in its favour, but I should have asked some of them, and particularly my right honourable friend Mr. Wickham, some questions which I know would have brought forth something extremely material, with reference to what Mr. Emmett stated; and I also know of many papers which Mr. Emmett wrote, and I should have taken the liberty of desiring my right honourable and excellent friend on the bench, to whom I have alluded (Mr. Wickham) to state much of what he knows of the late rebellion, during the period he had so considerable a share in the administration in Ireland, and to have asked him whether to his knowledge several things in this supposed libel were not well-founded as to the observations which the author makes, not on Dr. Troy personally—let that be understood—but on the Roman Catholics in Ireland, and the influence they were under. Do not let me be misunderstood; I do not say that at the moment when this exhortation was delivered, the preaching of the doctrine of the priests had the effect of producing the rebellion, or that the doctrine held forth by the noble earl had any such effect; the lord chancellor of Ireland did not think so; but when he was about to confer on that noble earl, the honour of a commission from the authority of his majesty as a magistrate, he took the opportunity of intimating his sentiments to the noble earl on the subject of the Catholics, knowing that he was corresponding with a nobleman of an exalted mind, virtuous life, and finished education, whose tenets of religion did not, nor could he consider as likely to have that woeful effect on society, which those of the lower classes had; and the object of that noble lord was to remove those prejudices, as far as they were, and which he knew them to be, baneful in their effect on society. And I do say that until the Catholic religion shall be entirely and radically altered with regard to some of its prejudices, and be no longer, in that respect, what it is, and until its oaths shall be no longer binding on the consciences of men for the overthrow of other systems, it is impossible to expect but that the effects will be what we too often see them. With this disposition in the majority of the Catholics, it is impossible to prevent, or to be secure from evil, except from the strong hand of power, and which power must always take care to preserve the public peace and to prevent those fatal scenes of blood, which we have beheld too often; and of which, I hope none of us will live to see the recurrence; it is not by the extension of these principles of the Catholic faith that Ireland can be saved.

Gentlemen, it is with a view to this argument that this author introduces his reasoning, and that he talks of Dr. Troy and Dr. Coppinger, and other eminent persons in that profession. Now, be pleased to observe what he says—that the Roman Catholic faith makes it a duty incumbent upon all its votaries to believe in infallibility of council, both in religion and morals; that they are infallible, for that they cannot err. Gentlemen, will you be pleased to attend to this—there is a considerable disadvantage in trying a cause of this kind before such a tribunal as this,—and I mention it without intending, as I am sure you will readily suppose, to offer the least disrespect to you,—because we are all of us educated under Protestant tuition, and are, therefore, ignorant of many of the points which the Catholic system of religion enjoins; I at least am ready to confess that I am not so deeply versed in all the doctrine of the Catholic faith, as many are who have had a better opportunity of studying them; not having had much time, if I had the inclination, to mix in polemical discussions on religious topics, my parents, and those who superintended my education, being Protestants, and satisfied with that which general education gives upon matters of this nature; and since I have had the means of judging for myself, my life has been rather in a busy scene in this place and others, where the duties of my profession led me. You also, gentlemen, are Protestants, and probably may not have devoted much of your study to the mysteries of the Romish church; there is, therefore, as I am sure it must be obvious to you, a considerable disadvantage in trying this cause before such a tribunal; because a Protestant jury who, however well informed, must have been educated from youth upwards, either under the rites of the church of England, or of the Protestant Dissenting Ministry, and, for that very reason, you cannot be expected to be aware of all the differences between your mode of faith, and that of the Roman Catholic.

Now, gentlemen, however ill I may execute the task, imperfectly I know I shall, yet it is my business to state to you, some of the differences between our mode of faith, and that of the Roman Catholic. This I hope I shall do with some effect, for the purposes of this cause, although, certainly, not for the purpose, nor, I hope, with the effect, of giving uneasiness to one virtuous or worthy Catholic; for I here most solemnly protest against any such intention, and declare, it is farthest from my purpose; but my duty to my client demands that I shall lay before you some of the points of the Catholic faith, without a knowledge of which, it is absolutely impossible to do justice to this cause, because impossible to judge of the reasoning in the publication now before you.

The first thing to be taken notice of in the Catholic faith is, Confession, which is a fundamental article in the Roman Catholic religion; so fundamental, that, to abstain from, or even to omit it, is a mortal sin, incurring deep damnation; and so rigid are they in this, that, according to one of their catechisms, published among themselves, we are made to begin confession before we have any thing to confess; for why should we begin to confess, before the mind is capable of abusing its volition? I was astonished when I heard it, and I am not ashamed to confess my ignorance, nor to admit, that if the indulgence of my lord had not been extended to the parties who were not prepared, when this cause stood formerly for trial, by allowing it to stand over, my client would have lost the benefit of what I am now about to state to you. The cause, however, stood over, at the request of the plaintiff, who was not ready, on account of the absence of lord Fingal; the plaintiff, therefore, was allowed to withdraw his record, which is an indulgence after the cause is called on. I am, however, by that event, better prepared for this defence than I was at that moment; for lately, at my residence by the sea-side, I read some books which I took with me, and of which, as a member of the Church of England, I own I was ignorant; they certainly were new to me—I am so far glad of the circumstance.

Gentlemen—When do you think Roman Catholics begin to confess? I mean, at what age does confession become a duty, and abstinence from it a deadly sin? Would you suppose that they began to confess earlier than they began to sin, that is, when we suffer our will to be abused by doing acts which the will condemns? Would you suppose, that at an age when the mind is hardly capable of forming an opinion, or being led to any thing like a distinction between good and evil, the season of confession by the Roman Catholic faith commences? and yet the fact is so; for confession is enjoined to commence at the age of SEVEN years! Nor is this all; it might be said to be a ceremony without a meaning, until the mind is capable of discerning its use; but the Catholic religion enjoins it as a duty to come to confession, and declares the omission of it to be a mortal sin; that is, the Catholic religion pronounces it to be a mortal sin not to confess sins, before we are capable of sinning. Do I say too much when I say this? What is the age at which confession begins? The age of seven years. An age at which that judgment which God gave us to guide and direct us, under the aid of revelation, through this transitory life, does not begin to operate, and yet this is the age at which one human creature is to begin to confess his sins to another, for the purposes of obtaining absolution. Such is the doctrine of which this defendant proposes to question the Divinity or wisdom. Now, that I may not be taken to be slandering the Catholic religion, or to misrepresent its tenets, the Catholic Catechism shall explain the case: “What sort of a confession is this to be? Why, it is to be a pure confession, an entire confession. You must humble yourself by a confession of all the sins you have committed since the last confession.” All this must be done at the age of seven years; for what purpose? In order that the priest may give you absolution! What is the consequence if you do not thus confess? That you will incur damnation! Why? Because you have endeavoured to deceive Omniscience, and for which you are told you shall be doomed to eternal damnation! And all this horror assails your mind—if it were possible that horror could assail the mind at the early age of seven years—for what offence? For not making confession of your sins to the holy priest, anointed by his holiness the pope, the vicerent of Christ upon earth, which is a mortal sin, and subject to eternal damnation! What are you to do besides? To amend your life by hearty sorrow for your sins; but you are not to imagine that when you have done this, your impurity is taken off; but if you do go to this confession, without the mind being pure, and you confess all your sins before God and your confessor, you had better stay away, for this impurity also is damnation! But are you to confess once only for your sins, and then to obtain your absolution? No! you must confess often, as man is frail and liable to sin often; and this you must do, because confession brings a man before God; leads him to a good train of thinking, and the mind brings itself back again to the sins of the world. And therefore nothing leads a man to the discharge of his duty better than frequent confession. Besides, after this you are to receive the holy Sacrament, a ceremony infinitely more august, if I may use such an expression, than confession can be; but this also in a manner very different from that which is observed by us under the reformed religion. All these ceremonies you are to observe, and to observe often, which you commence at this early age, nor are you allowed ever to discontinue them; and what is the penalty if you omit any of these duties, as they are here laid down and enjoined? Eternal damnation! You are, therefore, bound under this dreadful denunciation to begin confessing at the early age of seven years; you are to continue to confess, and you are to confess often. The priest hears the confession. What is the result of this early, this continual, and this repeated confession? Why, that the priest knows what sins you have ever committed, and what you intend to commit; for confession is not confined to acts which have been committed, but such as you intend to commit; for you are to confess all your sins, which consist as much in intention as in acts; and under this sanction, you are not only bound to make confession under the dreadful anathema of eternal perdition, but you are also invited to make it under the hope of absolution. Thus it is, that Roman Catholic priests become acquainted with all the deeds of those who believe in the purity of that faith, and of all their intentions, of every thing by which their minds are occupied. What then? Why then arises a dreadful rebellion in Ireland, on the sudden, as it appeared to us, but on the sudden it could not be, for it was the result of long preparation. I do not mean to say, that the late rebellion in Ireland was purely and solely the work of Roman Catholics, there were many among the rebels who were not Catholics; but no one will accuse me of harshness, or want of charity, when I say there certainly were a vast number of Catholics concerned in that rebellion; that is a proposition which the noble earl himself will admit; neither will it be said that no priest of the Roman Catholic church was found in arms in that rebellion, after having exhorted his flock, in public, to obedience to the law, saying that all power is of God; and that those who resist power, resist the will of God. Those who doubt this, if any such there be, may be converted, upon perusing some accounts of trials upon courts-martial.

Gentlemen, I was lately considering how I might the most readily find historical information respecting the conduct of the Roman Catholic clergy, as it referred to the affairs of this life; I contemplated this subject as I travelled in a carriage, when I happened to have by me, and at my hand, Mr. Plowden's book. I knew Mr. Plowden, as I dare say you do, to be a man of method; it occurred to me I was likely to find something useful to my purpose under the title "Priest." I looked at the index, turned to the page under the title of Priest, which is in page 716, I found at once a definition of that character as applicable to the Roman Catholic clergy, as easily to understand as any common-place topic in a book of practice in our profession; such as an action on the case for goods sold and delivered; plea non assumpsit. Thus:—"Priests. Some of the Roman Catholic priests always must be found in a rebellion." And if you want to know his argument for it, you have it thus:—"The almost total dependance of the Romish clergy of Ireland upon their people for the means of subsistence, is the cause, according to my best judgment, why, upon every popular commotion, many priests of that communion have been, and until measures of better policy are adopted, always will be found in the ranks of sedition, and opposition to the established government. The peasant will love a revolution, because he feels the weight of poverty, and has not often the sense to perceive that a change of masters may render it heavier; the priest must follow the impulse of the popular wave, or be left on the beach to perish."*—Therefore he makes out the place in which a Roman Catholic priest is to be found in time of rebellion. So in the late insurrection in Ireland, we found them there; we are then sure to find in a rebellion, among the Roman Catholics, a sprinkling of priests. I consulted another part of the same book, where I found—"There is no one man found out among the Catholics in arms, who was not a desperate reprobate all his life." Why then we have got the length of this—that there may be a rebellion in Ireland in which the Roman Catholics are a part, to which may be added, "aided and abetted by their priests;" that an insurrection may break out in Dublin, composed principally of persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion; that the most vigilant government is not always able to foresee, nor the most vigorous, on the instant, to repel, such insurrections or rebellions.

Now what are the arguments of the author of the pamphlet before you? He says, that lord Fingal uses the fact of the exhortation by Dr. Troy as a proof of the loyalty of the Catholics of Ireland. If lord Fingal had taken this course of argument, "That the exhortation, if it had been delivered before the insurrection, would have had the effect of preventing it, or had said, that the exhortation itself was a proof that Dr. Troy wished it to be prevented;" if his lordship had given instances in which the doctor had exhorted his flock to abstain from rebellion, to keep clear of those violences which produced it before it happened, the author of the article now before you, would have past over the passage in his lordship's correspondence, for then we should not have heard of the inhuman murder of the revered lord chief justice of Ireland. If the reverend Dr. Troy had endeavoured to reduce those turbulent and desperate insurgents to obedience to the laws, and subordination to the government of their country, this author would have been without excuse for what he said: but when my lord Fingal made use of this exhortation, after the fact, as a proof of the loyalty of the Roman Catholics; this defendant ventured to dispute the conclusiveness of that reasoning, and so, most humbly, without intention to offend the noble earl, do I.

On the 23rd of July, 1803, the insurrection broke out in Dublin, and that venerable magistrate, as he was returning from his country seat, was met by a gang of assassins, dragged out of his carriage with his daughter, or some near relation, and his nephew Mr. Wolfe, this venerable judge, I say, is thus inhumanly dragged away from his relations, and in cold blood he is piked in the open street in Dublin; and the archbishop of Dublin puts to the press an exhortation to the Catholics, and eighty copies are taken off and delivered to his inferior clergy, to be by them read to their flock, dissuading them from rebellion, from warfare and from bloodshed, as we have heard it read. If you tell me that Dr. Troy is a loyal and an eloquent man; that he speaks, and that he writes well; be it so—that he wrote well on the subject of insurrection; be it so—that his views and objects were to quell the rebellion, or the insurrection; be it so—but if you tell me that the whole body of the Catholics were virtuously inclined, and that none of them wished, at any time, any thing hostile to the interests of Great Britain, and never wished to bring in foreign aid to any scheme of rebellion, because Dr. Troy prepared this exhortation; that I deny, I say that such a conclusion does not follow from your premises. I say that the exhortation came too late for the best of purposes, and I cannot help lamenting it did not come sooner—I say that one gentle hint from Dr. Troy—a gentle hint to government before the fact, would have been better than all the exhortations that could issue after it. The evil was past and irreparable, before the exhortation came. No human power could then call that venerable man back from his grave, or do away the memory of those horrid scenes which stained with blood the streets of Dublin.

What is the argument of this defendant, upon this occasion? It may be illustrated by an example:—suppose my learned friend and myself, being on a footing of friendship and intimacy, and that others had frequently observed it, and had taken notice that no two brothers were ever more partial to the company of each other; that the friendship was such, as that neither prosperity nor misfortune could affect it: and let us suppose that my learned friend had been in the constant habit of imparting to me, and I to him, every thing that required the greatest confidence; and let us suppose that my learned friend had gone out one morning and was killed in a duel—Would not any body who knew us both, naturally say, on hearing of such an alarming event, “Mr. Garrow should have prevented this, he must have known of it—I knew that he and Mr. Erskine were, and had been for many years in habits of such intimacy and confidential intercourse, that I am convinced the thing could not have happened without a previous intimation given of it. Mr. Garrow, one of these two persons, could not possibly be engaged in any thing remarkable or extraordinary, without the previous knowledge of the other.”—Would you not add to your lamentation for the death of my learned friend, by saying, you “were surprised that such an accident had befallen him?” Would you not say, “I thought Mr. Erskine, although I knew he abounded in courage, had yet a mind too well regulated to fall a victim to a foolish rage; and that whatever silly notions, very silly persons might entertain upon that subject, he would rather have applied to my lord chief justice for his authority to preserve the peace, for there was no act, however terrible, in which one of them did not inform the other,” and would you not add, that “Mr. Garrow would have done every thing in his power to have prevented the mischief: that Mr. Garrow had so many years shared in the prosperity and happiness of his learned friend, and had made a bad use of his powers of persuasion, in not advising him to desist from that fatal duel.” Now what does the author of this pamphlet do on this occasion? Does he say that Dr. Troy knew there had been popish conspiracies in Dublin prior to the 23rd of July? He says no such thing. He says that Dr. Troy knew that which the members of the government knew; and however slender the force they had, they did take all the care and precaution, which as good subjects they ought to have done, although the insurrection did afterwards break out. Does the author of this article say that Dr. Troy knew that the rebels were coming from Wexford, and from Carlow to Dublin; and that the firing of a rocket was the signal agreed to be given before, or of the explosion of a field-piece for the commencement of this horrid scene? Does the author of this pamphlet say, that Dr. Troy knew that these leaders of the insurrections were acquainted with Emmet, and those to whom my learned friend alluded? No, he does not; but he says, that from the confessions which the Catholics make, he puts it argumentatively, that he must have known it, which is not alleging a fact, but deducing an inference from preceding facts. He argues from the obedience which the Catholics engage to pay most implicitly to the bishops acting under the authority of the see of Rome—and also from the manner in which the bishop himself takes an oath to be obedient to the see of Rome, and to punish heretics, and so on; and he argues, that this is the best system that ever was instituted since the world began, for the purpose of concealing all evil intentions towards a government that is not Catholic; that it is the most dangerous to any government, that is not itself Catholic, that the wit of man ever yet contrived; and most effective to defeat seditious practices or treasonable intentions where the government itself is Catholic. This religion enjoins confession at an early age—under it, confessions are made at an early age, and they are continued, and repeatedly made. Did the Catholics of Ireland make confession to their priests, as all other Catholics have been in the constant and uniform habit of making confession to their priests? Has this defendant done more than make deductions from the probability of such events? Does this religion enjoin confession?—Yes. Did the Roman Catholics of Ireland make such confessions?—It is not denied. What could they confess, but what they were guilty of? Did they confess, that for weeks and for months together, they were engaged in preparing arms for the express purpose of using them in rebellion against their sovereign, and the government under which they lived? Had they not a depot for such arms, contrived with a degree of secrecy, which compleatly eluded the search of all the officers of justice, employed for the purpose of endeavouring to discover them? Did they not frequently go through all the gravity of a funeral, and pretend to bury the dead, and read the funeral service, with all possible solemnity on the burial of the dead, while they deposited in the grave, coffins filled with pikes, ready to be taken up again as occasion should offer? Were there not generals appointed ready to take the field, on the landing of a foreign foe? Did government know any thing of these matters?—No, it did not. Who possessed this knowledge?—Those who were engaged in the plot. Who were they?—A great number of them, at least, were Roman Catholics. To whom did they confess?—To their priests. Did you, Dr. Troy, give to government, any thing like a hint of any part of these horrid preparations, and which broke out afterwards in corresponding acts?—No, you did not. What says the author of this pamphlet?—This—As the Roman Catholic religion enjoins confession of men, women, and children, from the age of seven years upwards; an insurrection threatens the city of Dublin, with immediate destruction, by seizing and destroying his majesty's government, root and branch; as this had been gathering for a considerable time before; as you Roman Catholics have been in the constant uniform practice of confessing all your sins—What then?—Why the author of this pamphlet does not say to the priests—You did know that all this was intended to have been done; for that would be taking upon him, to aver a fact, beyond his power to prove; but he states, that which appears to him to be a reasonable deduction; he says, you must have known it. He, therefore, does not say Dr. Troy had knowledge of all these matters before they happened, by knowing the intention of the parties engaged to commit them, and who afterwards did commit them; but he says, that from all these circumstances, Dr. Troy must have knowledge of these things.

I may perhaps, be told, that whatever Dr. Troy knew upon this subject, yet he could not communicate any part of that knowledge to government, for that the same doctrine, which enjoins the sinner to confess his sins, enjoins also, that the priest, to whom the confession is made, should keep the confession a profound secret, and that, therefore, the doctor did all he could do, when he poured forth among his flock, an exhortation to their repentance.

Gentlemen, I have heard this doctrine now and then stated; but if it be a principle of action with the Roman Catholic priests, it is most alarming, because it comes to this, that an immense number of his majesty's subjects, are put into a situation in which their intentions, however mischievous, however subversive of the state, can never be made known, until the mischief be completed. The Roman Catholics are told it is their duty to confess, and they do confess, not only that they have committed some atrocious acts, but that they are going to commit others still more atrocious; to commit murder; to massacre whole multitudes in cold blood; to lay waste their country by fire and sword; to invite a foreign foe into, and then surrender their country to a foreign yoke; and all this must remain an impenetrable secret to the government who may have power to prevent it, if a timely disclosure takes place, because the Catholic faith enjoins, that the priest, who has the means of disclosure, is bound to preserve the secret inviolate. Am I to be told, that insurrections and rebellions are to be submitted to, because the priests are bound by the rules of their faith, not to disclose what comes to their knowledge, by confession?—I hope not. I know this, that the Roman Catholics, in some of their doctrines, believe in the infallibility of council, in matters of faith, and in matters of morality; that to omit to confess, is a mortal sin, and punished by eternal damnation!—that to refuse or omit to make disclosure at confession, of any one thing, is subject to the like penalty; and, I understand, it is the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, that if any intention of rebellion be disclosed, to dethrone a Roman Catholic prince, the priests are at liberty, by the tenets of their religion, to disclose such intention; but, if intended to dethrone king George the third, it is not the understood duty of the Roman Catholic priest, to make any such disclosure, which appears by some of the writings of their priests, so late as the year 1802; they say they are not bound by their oaths in that respect, while he is, what thank God he is, a Protestant, and what they call an heretic. But I say, it is the duty of all persons, whether Catholics or Protestants, to disclose and make known every thing that has for its object, the overthrow of the government under which we live, otherwise any plan might be concerted, and carried into execution, for overturning the government of this country, and establishing instead of it, the empire of France: nothing is wanting, but that the plot should be confined to Roman Catholics, and they may, to any number, be engaged in it; so do we see that Catholics can always readily join in rebellion against a Protestant prince, or to overturn a Protestant government. There was a rebellion in Ireland in the year 1798, and the Catholics joined in it, and the priests defend themselves on all these occasions of misprision of treason by the doctrine of their faith, for that they are not bound to disclose any thing they know. What the condition of the Roman Catholic priests is, I take from an eloquent person who delivered his sentiments upon this subject, on the occasion of an important discussion in another place, whose speech I had the edification and the pleasure to hear, which speech has since been accurately given to the public, to whom it is a treasure, for no man is more able or learned than its author; I speak of Dr. Duigenan; a speech which was not contradicted by one of the greatest orators of the age (Mr. Grattan), who took his seat for the very purpose of opposing that honourable and learned member, upon that very subject. Dr. Duigenan then exhibited a faithful picture of the Roman Catholic religion, wherein he observed, among many other most interesting topics, that if a Roman Catholic is excommunicated by his priest, he cannot have so much as a drop of water, though he be famishing. Under that excommunication of his priest, if he be dying in a ditch, he can neither have a drop of water from the puddle, nor a crust of bread, nor a morsel of food, neither can he have any help whatever from any Roman Catholic; there he must perish, to the utter shock and horror of common humanity; so that a Roman Catholic excommunication is an utter deprivation of every thing on this side the grave; and not only an utter extinction of all hope beyond it, but a certainty of perdition hereafter, according to the true faith of a Roman Catholic; and the bare omission to confess to the priest, will draw down this anathema upon any Roman Catholic. Thus by working on the hopes of their flock, on the one hand, by absolution, and on their fears, by threats of eternal damnation on the other, do the priests become acquainted with all the Roman Catholics have done, are doing, and intend to do; so that they know when any rebellion is intended, or any design harboured, against the safety of the state, and this is what the author of this pamphlet has stated, and it is done in language so fitting to the subject, that I cannot do better than repeat it to you:—

“It is laid down as a fundamental principle of the Roman Catholic religion, by many general councils, particularly the fourth council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, and that of Constance, that an oath of allegiance cannot bind one of its sectaries to a Protestant state, and this principle has been frequently carried into practice during seven centuries. Dr. Troy, titular archbishop of Dublin, and Mr. Francis Plowden of the Temple, have declared, the former in his pastoral letter published in the year 1793, and the latter in a work entitled The Case Stated, ‘that the decrees of a general council in matters of faith and morality, when approved of by the pope, and received by the church, are absolutely infallible, and not liable to deceit or error.’ Under the sanction of these councils, the pope has frequently declared the subjects of an entire kingdom absolved from their oaths of allegiance; and many sovereign princes have lost their lives, or their thrones, or both, in consequence of such denunciations. Of the various bulls fulminated against English monarchs, for the above purpose, I shall mention only that of Pius V, in which he called upon them to rise in arms against queen Elizabeth, and to depose her, for that, being a heretic, their oaths of allegiance to her were null and void. In his epistle addressed to the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, after they had risen in arms against her, to which they were incited by that bull, this pontiff exhorts them, ‘in the Lord stoutly to persevere in the laudable work of rebellion, not doubting but God would grant them assistance; and that if they should chance to die, in asserting the Catholic faith, and the authority of the see of Rome, it were much better for them, with the advantage of a glorious death, to purchase eternal life, than by ignominiously living with the loss of their souls, shamefully to obey an ungovernable woman.’

“During the dreadful rebellion which broke out in Ireland, in 1641, the Irish papists were declared, by the bull of pope Urban 8th, to be absolved from their oath of allegiance, and were encouraged to persevere in the pious work of extirpating heretics; and Rinuncini, his nuncio in Ireland, denounced the terrors of excommunication against any persons who should adhere to their oaths. For some time previous to the dreadful rebellion of 1798, and until the eve of its explosion, the Irish priests and their flocks, solicited the magistrates to tender oaths of allegiance to them, and in many cases to increase its sanctity and solemnity at the foot of their respective altars; and yet those very priests, and their congregations, were furious and sanguinary, as soon as the rebellion broke out. Not only the vulgar herd of papists, but many gentlemen of education made no scruple of violating their oaths on that occasion. Dr. Burke, titular bishop of Ossory, in a work entitled Hibernia Dominicana, and published in the year 1772, in Ireland, declared in direct terms, that an oath of allegiance to George 3rd is null and void, ‘as long as he professes an heterodox religion, or has a wife of that religion;’ and to sanction his opinion, he tells us, in the same work, that the pope’s legate, Ghillini, pronounced such an oath to be null and void; and that the Irish could not renounce that tenet, ‘that they were bound to depose and murder heretical sovereigns.’

“He further tells us, that these doctrines were communicated by the legate to the four titular archbishops of Ireland, as a rule of faith, in four circular letters, which Dr. Burke in his Hibernia Dominicana, says are ‘literæ vere aureæ cedroque dignæ.’

“Though the secretaries of the Roman pontiff take, and violate with indifference an oath of allegiance, they will not venture to take the oath of supremacy, for reasons which I shall assign, and, therefore, they are excluded, and very properly, from enjoying the full benefit of our constitution.

“The papal supremacy is a fundamental article of the Romish church, and to renounce it, is regarded as a mortal sin, and an act of such gross impiety, that the person guilty of it, cannot get absolution but from the pope himself, and to him he must pay dearly for it.

“The case of the late lord Dunbayne affords a striking instance of this. He was titular bishop of Cloyne, and, unexpectedly, getting a title, and a fortune, by descent, he renounced the errors of popery, and was, for many years, apparently, a rigid Protestant.

“But it appeared afterwards, that his conversion was not sincere; for finding his dissolution approaching, he resolved to return to the Romish faith, without which he thought, that he could not obtain salvation. But Dr. Troy, titular archbishop of Dublin, informed him, that he could not receive him into the bosom of the church, without first applying to his holiness the pope; and this besotted bigot was so much alarmed at last, that in order to propitiate him, he left an estate of 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* a year to the college of Maynooth, though he had some near relations in a state of indigence. His lordship's heir at law instituted a suit for recovering this estate, and, having filed a bill in the court of Chancery, in the year 1800, to which he made father Gahan, the priest who administered the sacrament to him, a party, he refused to answer it; and again he refused to give evidence on the same point, on a trial by jury, in the year 1803.

"In the course of this suit, a popish barrister pleaded as an excuse for the priest's silence, that it was contrary to the rules of his church to answer; and he insisted on an exemption from the jurisdiction of our courts for its members; which should alarm the government, and convince them of the danger of allowing a popish hierarchy to be erected in the bosom of a Protestant state; and yet it is said this measure is at this time in the contemplation of the British cabinet. Can it be as a reward for their loyalty?"

Now, gentlemen, let us see how this matter stands. It is here stated, that Dr. Troy must have known all the circumstances that preceded the 23rd July, 1803. Why? Because his flock were true to the principles of their religion. What then? Because his flock confessed, and were bound to confess, does it follow that he is bound to disclose all he knew? They say he is not. What does this author say? Is not this the argument?—That Dr. Troy, the titular archbishop of Dublin, resident in Dublin, in which there is a conspiracy, by signal to rise into an insurrection, must have known this, that it must have been known to Dr. Troy, by the confessions of so many of the Catholics concerned in it? I really think this point so clearly made out, that if I were any where but in this place, I should not be justified in speaking two minutes upon it; but the manner in which this confession is introduced, is extremely interesting; for the Roman Catholic priest tells his follower in the faith—"There is nothing you deceive yourself so much in, if you suppose that the Averages had at Easter will do, it is proper you should come often, with an humble spirit and contrite heart, to ask forgiveness of your God; above all, you must not commit that mortal sin, never to be pardoned, of endeavouring to deceive God, which you do, when you endeavour to deceive his minister, to whom you are making confession." Now, gentlemen, consider the condition of the Irish rebels; it differs much from that of a man who has committed robbery or murder—the one is haunted by his own guilt, is afraid of his own shadow—the other is encouraged by numbers to proceed, and his confession gives him ease, and hopes of absolution; and the time most likely for the Roman Catholic priests to be well acquainted with the disposition of their flock is the season when conspiracies are carried on preparatory to rebellion, because it is a single act to be accomplished by many, and therefore the time when the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland are best informed of the views and objects of their flock is on the eve of an insurrection or rebellion, and that is the argument of the author of this letter. The author then proceeds to make some commentaries on the letters of my lord Fingal, and the exhortation of Dr. Troy. He admits, that the exhortation is good; but he observes, that it is a publication after the insurrection had taken place in Dublin, and he takes the liberty of asking the question Does this go to prove the loyalty of the great body of the Roman Catholics of Ireland? and he says, as I say, that it is quite the contrary. Now, what argument arises out of the exhortation?—The fact it is called to prove, arises out of the loyalty of the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Now, Dr. Troy himself shall be my witness. He sets about in his exhortation to deplore the proceedings of the preceding night. Now, all people, but "his dear Christians," as he calls them, admit the want of loyalty in a great body of the Catholics; he tells them the effect of sedition and insurrection; he exhorts them to return to peace and good order; he tells them that resistance to power is a vice, and he speaks with natural horror of the preceding day; and he advises them not to be deluded by the pretended benignity of France, who had more freedom when they boasted of it less. These are the arguments by which the loyalty of the Irish Catholics is supported. He sets about to correct them, by this exhortation of his on their want of loyalty; and yet, somebody, who did not deal fairly by my lord Fingal (for it cannot have been done by my lord Fingal himself), somebody who must have stolen those letters, published them, with interpretations of his own, by which this exhortation, accusing the Roman Catholics of Ireland with rebellion, is given as a proof of their loyalty. Thus their loyalty is attempted to be proved by a document which records their want of it.

But it may be urged that Dr. Troy, whatever knowledge he might have of the intention of the Roman Catholics, yet could not divulge it, consistently with his own oath as a priest, that the authority of the religion he professes would be done away if he disclosed it, and that there will be no more confession if that should be done. Now if A. B. confessed to me that he was going to commit murder on a particular individual, whom he should name, and that he were to come to me the following day, to tell he had committed it; am I to be told there will be an end of auricular confession, if I were to take weapons for preventing such a crime, and that I am bound, by my oath, to permit such an act to be committed although I have the means of preventing it? Let us understand the extent to which this principle goes, that we may know what it is we have to trust to, for although I should be extremely sorry to have any shade cast upon that toleration of religious opinions, persuasions, and professions, of whatever nature or denomination, which is so worthy our esteem, yet I do hold it to be essential to our existence, to take care that nothing be even tolerated that is absolutely inconsistent with the safety of the state; but that radically and fundamentally abhorred, diabolical, and damnable position that they are not to keep faith with his majesty, because they choose to denominate him a heretic, must be renounced for ever; for I say they like all other men, who are protected by the state, owe to the state allegiance, and that they whoever they are, must on all occasions abstain from acts that tend to the common ruin. If I am asked how this is to be done, I can only say that nothing should be done, or even tolerated, that is inconsistent with the safety of the state, and that we take care of the common security, for I am persuaded there is not one man within hearing of my voice, who will not allow that prejudices which endanger the state should not be allowed as motives to be acted upon. Nor can I conceive there would have been any impropriety in any Roman Catholic priest having given a hint to government before the 23rd of July, to have doubled the guard; the Castle would have received the hint with kindness, and the Castle is never difficult of access; I should think that a very useful communication upon such occasions might be made by Roman Catholic priests as well as by any other persons, without any infringement of any oath; and this I know too, that the oath against misprision of treason ought to be impressed on the mind of every man in his majesty's dominions, which is, "that I do solemnly swear that I will disclose and make known to his majesty and his successors, all treasons, and traitorous conspiracies which I shall know to be against him or any of them, so help me God." This oath every Roman Catholic ought to consider as binding upon him, as any oath he can take to be faithful to his holiness the pope.

The substance then of my client's defence is this, that in the publication of the correspondence between my lord Fingal and my lord Redesdale, it was alleged that the exhortation of Dr. Troy, the plaintiff in this cause, was a proof of the loyalty of the Roman Catholics in Ireland; this my client has ventured to deny, and although I am ready to acknowledge the great talents of the noble earl, in whose name that is alleged in the correspondence,—talents I admit to be greatly superior to mine,—but yet with all that inferiority of talent, I should not be afraid of meeting his lordship, and to contend that the exhortation by which the Roman Catholics are charged with rebellion, does not prove them to be loyal. The other point is, that the plaintiff must have known of the intention of a great number of the Roman Catholics to revolt, long before the thing happened, as is indeed manifest by what was said by Mr. Emmett, and that therefore the plaintiff ought to have communicated that, in some way or other, to government, by which the whole of that horrid scene might have been avoided perhaps altogether, at all events greatly mitigated. The object upon this occasion has been to defend my client against the charge of being a malignant libeller of Dr. Troy.—Did he ever see Dr. Troy since he was in Ireland?—No, he did not. Did he ever hear of Dr. Troy, except from my lord Fingal's letter? Did he ever write any thing about him, even in this pamphlet, charged to be such an atrocious libel upon Dr. Troy, except in these five lines: "Dr. Troy must have known all the circumstances which preceded the insurrection in Dublin, on the 23rd of July, 1803, and yet he did not put government on their guard. The present administration are convinced of his treachery on that occasion, and yet, for many years past he had been treated at the Castle with the utmost respect, and had even received favours for some persons of his own family"? But the truth is, as I took the liberty of stating in an early part of my address to you, this subject was not brought forward with the primary view of damages to Dr. Troy, but was brought forward in this shape, to prepare the way for a more public discussion of the question of the Catholic claims which has recently been discussed in parliament; and I agree with my learned friend Mr. Erskine, it was discussed with a moderation and temper which did the two branches of the legislature honour. I submit to you, therefore, gentlemen, on the whole of this case, that the defendant published this book in the true spirit of argument; and if so, he cannot be called a libeller, and you cannot find your verdict against him.

I have but one topic more to add: my learned friend, Mr. Erskine, considered this not only a libel on Dr. Troy, but also a libel on the whole body of the Catholics of Ireland; I am sure you recollect that expression of my learned friend's, and he alluded to Mr. Emmett's declaration. Gentlemen, you do not sit here to punish my client for a libel on the whole body of the Catholics of Ireland, although as I have said already, this case was not brought here to vindicate the character of Dr. Troy—here Dr. Troy need not be compensated, for, here he has not been traduced, but the cause was brought here in July last, and was intended to prepare the way for another discussion, and that in parliament.

Mr. Erskine.—Do you give any of the facts you have stated in evidence?

Mr. Garrow.—You know very well I shall not, I only alluded to them as matter of history.

SUMMING UP.

Lord Ellenborough.—Gentlemen of the Jury; This is an action by John Thomas Troy, titular archbishop of Dublin, which he brings for reparation to an injury which he states he has received by the publication of a book entitled the Anti-Jacobin Review, representing that he was acquainted with the circumstances which preceded that dreadful outrage in Ireland, which took place on the 23rd of July, 1803, when lord Kilwarden was destroyed, and that he did not put government on its guard by a timely disclosure of that fact, and that his concealment was of such a nature that government was convinced of his treachery on that occasion. The libel is stated to be published here, and he has brought this action for the purpose of deciding whether the libel has been so published, and what reparation he is entitled to.

Gentlemen, I cannot find fault with Dr. Troy for bringing his action here. The publication of which he complains took place here, and the propriety of his coming here cannot, I think, be doubted, because in a country recently agitated by dispute and even rebellion, where "wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep," where one party are of the Protestant, the other of the Roman Catholic persuasion, we could not expect so impartial a trial as here, where no recollection of lost friends, or other passions which agitate men's minds and affect their feelings as they do in Ireland, can have any influence. The plaintiff has, therefore, brought his action here, and I think he has done well; he has brought it for damages for a libel, not to subject the party to punishment by criminal proceeding, but to make reparation as for a civil injury, in which he has given the party an opportunity of justifying and making out the truth of the charge, if it be true; for in a civil action the truth of the charge is a defence, which is not the case in an indictment for a libel, therefore I do think that both with respect to the place where, and the mode whereby he submits his case for consideration, he has acted fairly. In the first place he is sure to have it tried with purity, by purity I mean exemption from prejudice, for no doubt there is purity in the administration of justice in Ireland as well as in this country; when I say purity, I speak with reference to the absence of local prejudice.

Having brought his action here, and the defendant not having justified the truth of the paper complained of by Dr. Troy, it is to be considered as a libel not to be justified; whether under all the circumstances it is to be considered as slanderous or not, is for your consideration.

Gentlemen, it is certainly very true, as was contended with great force and effect by the learned gentleman who is of counsel for the defendant, that the purpose for which it is published is extremely material—whether the purpose be to calumniate Dr. Troy, or only the discussion of the conduct of the Roman Catholics with reference to the Protestant government? the discussion, if carried on with moderation, on the subject of government, is very allowable, and the fair scope of that discussion is a sort of polemical controversy between two noblemen whose names are mentioned, the one a noble earl and the other a noble lord and chancellor of Ireland; but if in the course of what has been published the defendant has unfortunately tript, and stated that which is injurious to the plaintiff, he certainly is responsible to him in this action. If so, then, the question would be, considering all the circumstances of the case, what would be fair and temperate damages; I say fair and temperate, for one would wish to be temperate and moderate, if it appears that he has only tript upon an improper expression, and said of Dr. Troy that which he ought not to have said; still if in what he said there should appear to be no evil design, or perhaps it be meritorious, yet the person to whom the publication is injurious, has a right to ask for redress. The publication has been proved, and the whole of it has been read to you, in order that the whole of the context might be explained; I will state the material part to you, which from the nature of the evidence is necessarily reduced to a few lines. The defendant says, in this publication, that Dr. Troy must have known all the circumstances which preceded the insurrection which took place in Dublin on the 23rd of July, 1803, and that he did not inform government.

"Must have known," without imputing any criminal motive for his conduct, I should have thought the action not maintainable, because it appears to me only equivalent to "might have known," which is nothing criminal, because I might have known as well as he. Does he mean to impute to the plaintiff that he conducted himself like a good subject, or that he was guilty of criminal negligence towards his country? That he must have known all the circumstances previous to the insurrection might mean, "practically innocent;" if he meant that the plaintiff did not know the circumstances, he could not put government on its guard. The question here is, whether he did not take upon himself, in terms, to aver that he did know—then come the words, "For the present administration are convinced of his treachery"—On that occasion his conduct was such, that it worked on government a persuasion of his treachery—It is for you to say, whether you understand this as imputing to the plaintiff that he had foreseen this insurrection, namely, that he had an actual knowledge preceding the rebellion, of circumstances which indicated that a rebellion was to take place, and that he withheld from government, treacherously, the information.

I do not think it is to the purpose to ascertain whether there was blame or even merit in the general motive, if there was an object to impute treachery to the plaintiff; for I do not decide on the general motive. If you are of opinion that the defendant meant to impute to the plaintiff actual knowledge and actual concealment, and an actually treacherous purpose, the defendant will come within the scourge of the law, by doing that which he is unauthorized to do, with the character of Dr. Troy; and the only question will be, the quantum of damages which Dr. Troy has a right to receive at the hands of the defendant. I have no doubt that the object of Dr. Troy is the purgation of his character, and to do away the foul stigma of suspicion; and while he was obnoxious to that suspicion, I own, I think that Dr. Troy has done commendably in bringing this action. With a view of giving the defendant an opportunity to come forwards to verify the fact, he has brought this civil action. Nobody has come forward to verify the fact, he knew the danger certainly, and no event of this day has furnished any proof, before us, injurious to Dr. Troy; he stands completely exculpated; but it is for you to say what reparation should follow. It does not appear in evidence that this publication was in Ireland, but here. I can hardly give any line to guide you. If the proceeding were criminal, there are many points that would go to mitigate the sentence of the judges.

To the extent you think this gentleman has been injured, you will make a moderate compensation; you will give such an amount in damages as may be necessary to vindicate the honour of this gentleman, as any one of you would wish to go out of court with if attacked; farther than that which may be sufficient to prevent any farther imputation upon him, I think you ought not to go, considering the nature and state of this publication.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages FIFTY POUNDS.

In the cause of Troy v. Hales, for the same libel, Mr. Erskine signified that the plaintiff would be satisfied with nominal damages and his costs. A verdict of ONE SHILLING was given accordingly.

674. Trial of the Right Honourable HENRY Lord Viscount MELVILLE, before the Lords House of Parliament in Westminster Hall, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors whereof he was accused in certain Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the Names of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, April 29—June 12: 46 GEORGE III. A. D. 1806.*

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

In order fully to understand the merits of this case, it is necessary that the reader should peruse the tenth Report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, which was, on February 13, 1805, ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, and which gave rise to the impeachment of lord Melville. The report is therefore printed at the end of this trial by way of Appendix.

* "In pursuance of an order of the House of Peers of the 12th day of June, 1806, I do appoint Joseph Gurney and William Brodie Gurney to print and publish the whole proceedings in the House of Peers, upon the impeachment exhibited by the knights, citizens, and burgesses in parliament assembled, in the names of themselves, and of all the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, against Henry lord viscount Melville, for high crimes and misdemeanors, and do forbid any other person to print or publish the same.

"ERSKINE, C."

By the licence of Mr. Gurney I am permitted to avail myself of his report of this important trial.

The following is a brief sketch of the proceedings which took place in parliament between the presentation of the tenth Report and the trial of lord Melville.*

* N.B. Copies of the letter from lord Melville to the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, dated March 28, 1805, and of the letter from the Commissioners to his Lordship, dated April 2, 1805, were (on the motion of the chancellor of the Exchequer—vide 4 Hans. Parl. Deb. 165) presented to the House of Commons on April 3, and ordered to be printed. These letters will be found in the proceedings on the fourth day of the trial, infra when they were given in evidence.

On Monday, April 8th, 1805, Mr. Whitbread, in the House of Commons, after a speech of considerable length, arraigning the conduct of lord Melville [then first lord commissioner of the board of Admiralty] while treasurer of his majesty's navy, moved the following resolutions:—

- “ 1. That on the 18th of June, 1782, the House of Commons, in a committee of the whole House, came, amongst others, to the following resolutions:—‘ That it is the opinion of this committee, that some regulations ought to be adopted, for the purpose of lessening and keeping down the balances of public money which appear to have usually been in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, and it would be beneficial to the public if the first and other clerks in the different branches belonging to the said office were paid by fixed and permanent salaries, in lieu of all fees, gratuities, and other perquisites whatsoever. That it is the opinion of this committee, that from henceforward the paymaster general of his majesty's land forces, and the treasurer of the navy for the time being, shall not apply any sum or sums of money imprested to them, or either of them, to any purpose of advantage or interest to themselves, either directly or indirectly. That it appears to this committee, that the commissioners appointed to examine, take, and state the public accounts of the kingdom, have, so far as appears from the Reports which they have hitherto made, discharged the duty intrusted to them with great diligence, accuracy, and ability; and if parliament shall carry into execution those plans of reform and regulation which are suggested by the matter contained in the Reports of the said commissioners, it cannot but be attended with the most beneficial consequences to the future welfare and prosperity of this kingdom.’
- “ 2. That in furtherance of the intention of the House of Commons expressed in such Resolutions, his majesty, by his warrant dated June 26, 1782, directed that the salary of the treasurer of the navy should be increased to the sum of 4,000*l.* per annum, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments theretofore enjoyed by former treasurers.
- “ 3. That it appears to this committee, that during the treasurership of the right hon. Isaac Barré, the conditions of the aforesaid warrant were strictly complied with; that the whole of the money issued from the Exchequer to Mr. Barré for naval services was lodged in the Bank; that it was never drawn from thence previously to its being advanced to the sub-accounts to be applied to the public service; that during the time Mr. Barré acted as treasurer and ex-treasurer, he had not in his possession or custody any of the public money, and that neither he nor the paymaster of the navy did derive any profit or advantage from the use or employment thereof.

- “ 4. That the right hon. Henry Dundas, now lord viscount Melville, succeeded to the office of treasurer of the navy on the 19th of Aug. 1782, when a farther addition was made to the salary of the said office, in order to produce a nett annual income of 4,000*l.* after the payment of all taxes and charges on the same; and that this additional salary was considered by the said lord viscount Melville as granted to him in lieu of all wages, fees, profits, and other emoluments enjoyed by former treasurers.
- “ 5. That the said lord viscount Melville continued in the said office till the 10th of April, 1783; that being asked, whether he derived any advantage from the use of the public money during that period, he, in his examination before the commissioners of Naval Inquiry, declined answering any question on that head; but that he has, in a letter since written to the said commissioners, and dated the 28th of March last, declared, that, previous to 1786, ‘ he did not derive any advantage from the use or employment of any monies issued for carrying on the service of the navy.’ But Mr. Douglas, who was paymaster, being dead, and his lordship having refused to answer any question on this head as aforesaid, no evidence has been obtained as to the application of monies issued for the service of the navy, or the mode of drawing the same from the Bank during this period.
- “ 6. That the hon. C. Townshend, now lord Bayning, held the office of treasurer of the navy from the 11th April, 1783, to the 4th of Jan. 1784; and that from the examination of his lordship it appears, that during his treasurership, no part of the money issued for the service of the navy, was applied to his private use or advantage; and that he does not believe that Mr. Douglas, who acted under him as paymaster, derived any profit or advantage from the use or employment of the public money, except the money issued for the payment of Exchequer fees.
- “ 7. That the right hon. Henry Dundas was re-appointed treasurer of the navy on the 5th of Jan. 1784, and continued in the said office until the 1st of June, 1800.
- “ 8. That in the year 1785, an Act of parliament was passed (25 Geo. 3rd, cap. 31), intituled, ‘ An Act for better regulating the Office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy;’ whereby it is directed, that no money shall be issued from the treasury to the treasurers of the navy; but that all monies issued for naval services shall be paid to the Bank on account of naval services, and placed to the account of the treasurer of the navy, and shall not be paid out of the Bank unless for naval services, and in pursuance of drafts signed by the treasurer, or some person or persons authorized by him, which drafts shall specify the heads of service to which such sums are to be applied, and that the regulations under the said act shall take place from the 31st of July, 1785.

" 9. That the execution of the said act was postponed till the month of January, 1786, and from that time till the month of June, 1800, when lord Melville left the office of treasurer, contrary to the practice established in the treasurership of the right hon. Isaac Barré, contrary to the resolutions of the House of Commons of 18th of June, 1782, and in defiance of the provisions of the above-mentioned act of the 25th Geo. 3rd, c. 31, large sums of money were, under pretence of naval services, and by a scandalous evasion of the act, at various times, drawn from the Bank, and invested in exchequer and navy bills, lent upon the security of stock, employed in discounting private bills, in purchasing Bank and East India stock, and used in various ways for the purposes of private emolument.

" 10. That Alexander Trotter, esq. paymaster of the navy, was the person by whom, or in whose name, the public money was thus employed; and that in so doing, he acted with the knowledge and consent of lord viscount Melville, to whom he was at the same time private agent, and for whose use or benefit he occasionally laid out from 10 to 20,000*l.* without considering whether he was previously in advance to his lordship, and whether such advances were made from his public or private balances.

" 11. That the right hon. lord viscount Melville having been privy to and connived at the withdrawing from the Bank of England, for purposes of private interest or emolument, sums issued to him as treasurer of the navy, and placed to his account in the Bank, according to the provisions of the 25th Geo. 3rd, c. 31, has been guilty of a gross violation of the law, and a high breach of duty.

" 12. It farther appears, that subsequent to the appointment of lord Melville as treasurer of the navy, in 1784, and during the time he held that office, large sums of money, issued for the service of the navy, were applied to other services; and that the said lord Melville, in a letter written in answer to a precept issued by the commissioners of Naval Inquiry, requiring an account of money received by him, or any person on his account, or by his order, from the paymaster of the navy, and also of the time when, and the persons by whom, the same were returned to the Bank or paymaster, has declared, that he has no materials by which he could make up such an account, and that, if he had materials, he could not do it without disclosing delicate and confidential transactions of government, which his duty to the public must have restrained him from revealing.

" 13. That lord Melville, in applying monies issued for the service of the navy to other services, stated to have been of so delicate and confidential a nature, that, in his opinion, no account can or ought to be given of them, has acted in a manner inconsistent with his duty, and incompatible with those securities which the legislature has provided for the proper application of the public money."

On the question being put on the first resolution, Mr. Pitt, first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer, moved as an amendment, "That the tenth Report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry be referred to a Select Committee of this House, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same to the House:" He was however afterwards induced (in order that, whether they were carried or not, Mr. Whitbread's resolutions might be entered on the Journals) to withdraw this amendment, and in lieu thereof to move the previous question; stating it to be his intention, if he should succeed on the motion for the previous question, and thereby get rid of the original resolutions, to move for the appointment of the committee as in his first amendment. A very long and interesting debate ensued, the result of which was, that on a division the numbers were equal; that the question be now put, 216—Noes, 216.

The Speaker, Mr. Abbot, then gave his casting vote in favour of the question, and the first ten Resolutions were forthwith agreed to. Mr. Pitt then proposed to amend the eleventh Resolution by leaving out the concluding words, "been guilty of a gross violation of the law and a high breach of duty," and substituting the words "acted contrary to the intentions of the said act." This amendment however he withdrew, and proposed to insert after the words "private interest or emolument" the words "of Mr. Trotter," to which last-mentioned words, in the proposed amendment, were afterwards added the words "as acknowledged by lord Melville." The amended motion then stood thus: "That the right hon. lord viscount Melville having been privy to, and connived at, the withdrawing from the Bank of England, for the purpose, as stated by lord Melville, of private emolument to Mr. Trotter, sums issued to lord Melville as treasurer of the navy, and placed to his account in the Bank, according to the provisions of the 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31, has been guilty of a gross violation of the law, and a high breach of duty." The original motion of Mr. Whitbread however was ultimately carried, the amendments being rejected.

Mr. Whitbread then moved an address to his majesty, praying him to remove lord Melville from his councils; but the debate having lasted till five o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, April 9th, the consideration of this motion was postponed until the next day, Wednesday, and the House adjourned until that day.

On Wednesday April 10th, the Chancellor of the Exchequer communicated to the House that since they had last met, lord Melville had tendered to his majesty his resignation of the office of first lord of the admiralty, which resignation had been accepted.

Mr. Whitbread then moved, that the resolutions of Monday should be read. It was however ordered that the eleventh Resolution only should be read. That resolution having been read accordingly, Mr. Whitbread moved "that an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that his majesty will be graciously pleased to remove lord viscount Melville from all offices held under the Crown during pleasure, and from his councils and presence for ever." A very animated debate* ensued, which ended in Mr. Whitbread's moving that "his original motion be withdrawn;" which being agreed to, the hon. gent. proposed, "that the resolutions of Monday be entered as read;" which was also agreed to. His next motion was, "that these resolutions be laid before his majesty." This motion was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Whitbread again rose, and said, that he thought the most solemn mode of carrying such an important step into execution ought to be adopted on the present occasion; on that account he should propose, "that these resolutions be laid before his majesty by the whole House." The motion having been agreed to, it was ordered "that such of the members as were of his majesty's most honourable privy council should wait on his majesty, to know when he would be graciously pleased to receive the same."

On Thursday, April 11th, the House adjourned until Thursday the 25th; and immediately after, the right hon. the Speaker, followed by several members, went up to St. James's-palace with the Resolutions of Monday the 8th.

On Thursday, April 25, the Speaker reported to the House, that the House attended his majesty on the 11th instant, with the resolutions of the House of the 8th instant, relative to lord viscount Melville, whereupon his majesty was pleased to give the following most gracious answer: "Gentlemen; I shall on all occasions receive with the greatest attention any representation of my Commons; and I am fully sensible of the importance of the matter which is the subject of your resolutions."

After some other business had been gone through, his majesty's answer was, on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, again read. Some conversation then took place between Mr. Whitbread and the Chancellor of the Exchequer* as to the propriety of expunging the name of lord Melville from the list of the privy council: Mr. Whitbread, after having given notice of a motion for a future day on this subject, proceeded to move, "That a select committee be appointed to make further inquiry into the matters contained in the report of the commissioners, and to report the same, with their opinions and observations thereon, to the House." Upon which the chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the following amendment; "That a select committee be appointed, to consider further of the matter contained in the tenth report of the commissioners of Naval Inquiry, so far as the same relates to the application of sums granted for navy services to other branches of the public service, as also to the irregularities committed in the mode of drawing the money granted for the service of the navy from the Bank, and to any communications that might have been made to the chancellor of the Exchequer, or the lords of the Treasury, relative to such irregularities; and to the proceedings that might have been taken for recovery of the arrears due of the late Mr. Jellicoe."

After a debate of some length† a division took place; the numbers were for the amendment, 229; Against it, 151:—Majority, 78.

Mr. Whitbread then proposed the names of 21 members to form the committee; on which the chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the committee should be chosen by ballot; the House divided on this motion. For a ballot, 251; Contra, 120;—131.‡

On Monday, April 29, Mr. Spencer Stanhope moved, "that the attorney-general be directed to take such measures as may appear most effectual in ascertaining and securing, by a due course of law, such sums as may be due to the public by lord Melville and Mr.

Trotter, in respect to the profits arising from money applicable to the service of the navy, which came into their hands subsequent to the 1st of January, 1786." Whereupon Mr. Bankes proposed as an amendment, that all the words after "lord Melville and Mr. Trotter" be left out, and these words be inserted, "and that the attorney-general be directed to prosecute the said lord Melville and Mr. Trotter for the said offences." After debate* the House divided on the question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of this question. Ayes, 223; Noes, 128:—Majority, 95.

The amendment being thus rejected, the original motion was carried.

On Friday, May 3, Mr. Leycester, attended by several members, brought up to the Lords a message from the Commons, in substance, desiring their lordships permission to a member of that House, lord viscount Melville, to attend a committee of the House of Commons to whom was referred the consideration of so much of the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry as related to the application of monies imprested to the treasurer of the navy to purposes other than the service of his majesty's navy; and also what communications were made to the lords commissioners of the treasury, or chancellor of the Exchequer, respecting the same, &c.—The messengers having withdrawn,

Lord Hawkesbury moved, "that their lordships do send an answer to the message just delivered from the Commons by messengers of their own." Which being ordered accordingly, the messengers from the Commons were ordered to be called in, and the lord chancellor with the usual formalities, communicated to them the resolution of the House. The messengers having retired;

Lord Hawkesbury rose to call their lordships particular attention to the proceeding which had just taken place. He would first move, that the standing order be read by the clerk, which was accordingly done. This order imported that no peer of the realm, a member of that House, should attend the House of Commons, or any committee thereof, to answer matters of charge or accusation against themselves, either in person or by their counsel, &c. on pain of being committed to the custody of the black rod, or sent to the Tower during the pleasure of that House. The noble lord then, after a short speech, moved, that the matter be referred to the committee of privileges, and that the clerk be ordered to furnish them with such precedents of cases as may have occurred. This motion was after debate† agreed to, and the committee of privileges ordered to sit on the ensuing Monday for the purpose of taking the subject into consideration.

A similar message was afterwards sent up by the Commons, requesting the attendance of the earl of Harrowby, to which the Lords returned a similar answer.*

On Monday, May 13th, a message was delivered from the Lords stating, "that the Lords do give leave to the lord Harrowby to come to the select committee of the House of Commons, to whom the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry (respecting the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy) is referred, to inquire into the application of any monies issued to the treasurer of the navy for naval services to purposes not naval, and whether any, and what representations were made to the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, or the chancellor of the Exchequer, respecting the withdrawing from the Bank any sums of money so issued since the passing of the act of 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31; and also into the proceedings had for the recovery of the debt due to the Crown by the late Adam Jellicoe; in order to be examined at that committee, if his lordship thinks fit;" and also, "that the Lords do desire a present conference with this House, in the painted chamber, upon the subject matter of their message to the Lords, on Friday, the 3rd day of this instant May, desiring that their lordships will give leave to lord viscount Melville to come to the select committee of this House, to whom the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry (respecting the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy) stands referred, in order to be examined at that committee." And then the messengers withdrew.—Resolved, that this House doth agree to a conference with the Lords, as is desired by their lordships. And the messengers were again called in; and Mr. Speaker acquainted them therewith. And then they again withdrew.—Ordered, that a committee be appointed to manage the said conference. And a committee was appointed accordingly. Then the names of the managers were called over, and they went to the conference; and being returned; Mr. Leycester reported, "that the managers had met the Lords at the conference, which was managed on the part of the Lords by the duke of Norfolk; and that the conference was to acquaint this House, that the Lords, always desirous that a good intelligence and right understanding should be maintained betwixt the two Houses, and persuaded that

* On May 6th, Mr. Whitbread again introduced to the House the consideration of addressing his majesty to erase the name of lord Melville from the privy council book, and to banish him from his councils and presence for ever. In consequence, however, of the chancellor of the Exchequer stating, that the erasure would take place on the first day on which a council would be held, the matter was not further agitated. nothing can tend more effectually thereunto than a close adherence to the ancient and regular methods of proceeding between the two Houses, have desired this conference upon the subject matter of the message sent by the House of Commons for leave for the lord viscount Melville to attend the select committee of that House in order to be examined, to communicate to the House of Commons;—that it appears undeniably, by an uniform series of precedents down to the present time, that the course adopted by the Lords, respecting the giving leave to the members of their lordships House to go down to the House of Commons, has been, to permit the members of their lordships House, on their own request, to defend themselves in the House of Commons, if they think fit, on any points on which that House has not previously passed any accusatory or criminating resolutions against them; and also, to permit the members of their lordships House, on the request of the House of Commons, to give evidence, if they think fit, before that House, or any committee thereof, on those points only on which no matter of accusation or charge is at that time in any manner depending against them before that House, whether the same shall then have been resolved by the House of Commons or not.—That the Lords had also directed them to acquaint the House of Commons, that their lordships, relying with the most perfect confidence that the House of Commons are at all times as desirous to preserve the privileges of the Lords as to maintain their own, have given leave to lord viscount Melville (who had also previously made it his own unqualified request) to go down to the select committee of the House of Commons, to whom the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry (respecting the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy) is referred, to inquire into the application of any monies issued to the treasurer of the navy for naval services to purposes not naval, and whether any and what representations were made to the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury; or the chancellor of the Exchequer, respecting the withdrawing from the Bank any sums of money so issued since the passing of the act of 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31; and also, into the proceedings had for the recovery of the debt due to the crown by the late Adam Jellicoe; in order to be examined at that committee, if he shall so think fit; his lordship, nevertheless, conforming himself in all respects to the course directed to be communicated to the Commons as above.*

which certain parts of the matter contained in the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry had been referred. The report was ordered to lie on the table. The hon. and learned gent. then moved, that the report be printed for the use of the members. This was also agreed to.

On the same day Mr. Whitbread gave notice of a motion for the impeachment of lord Melville; and on Tuesday the 28th, Mr. Dundas (son of the noble viscount) gave notice that in the event of lord Melville's wishing to be heard in person before the House in justification of his conduct (which wish he had no doubt he would express) he should on the same day on which Mr. Whitbread's motion would come on, move that lord Melville be allowed to be heard.*

On Tuesday, June 11th, previously to the moving the order of the day on Mr. Whitbread's motion for the impeachment of the right honourable lord viscount Melville,

The Speaker rose and addressed the House in the following words: I hold in my hand a letter which I am desired to communicate to the House. It is signed "Melville," and dated "Wimbledon, June 11." The contents of this letter are these: "Sir; having observed, in the votes of the House of Commons, that a committee has been appointed to consider of the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry; and having obtained a copy of a report which that committee has submitted to the House of Commons, I take the liberty of requesting that the House will allow me to be admitted, and heard on the subject of those reports. I have the honour to be, sir, with great respect your most obedient and faithful servant, MELVILLE."

Mr. Robert Dundas (son of lord Melville) then observed, that in consequence of the notice which he had formerly given, he would move that lord viscount Melville be admitted into the House to be heard in his own defence according to his request.—The question was put and carried in the affirmative without a dissenting voice.

The Speaker ordered the serjeant at arms to attend with the mace at the door, and to inform lord Melville that he might come in. His lordship, who was in waiting, immediately entered, and advanced within the bar, where there was a chair placed for his reception. The Speaker said—"there is a chair for your lordship to repose on."—After sitting down for a few moments,

Lord Melville rose and spoke as follows:—Hitherto every attempt I have made to be heard in explanation or vindication of my own conduct and character, brought in question by the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry, has been in vain; and, therefore, it is my earliest duty to make my acknowledgments to this House, for that privilege having been at last conceded to me. Under these circumstances, it might be unbecoming in me, in this place, to call in question the justice of any of your proceedings which have already taken place. If, therefore, before making any observations on the report now produced by your own committee, I offer some preliminary considerations, it is only from an anxious hope of being able to satisfy you, that whatever considerations may have guided the wisdom of the House in their past proceedings, it is essential to the ends of justice, that before deciding on this report, now in my hands, you should give a patient and dispassionate hearing to the considerations I wish to offer. I shall, therefore, begin by shortly stating the different modes in which I have attempted to obtain this indulgence. I was examined by the commissioners of naval inquiry, without the knowledge of the objects of investigation, and while they were in possession of the whole of Mr. Trotter's accounts with Messrs. Coutts and Co. It is on the items scattered throughout the pages of those accounts, that their observations on my conduct are made, and from which their conclusions are chiefly drawn; but, when I was before them, not one item of those accounts was shown to me, or explanation asked concerning any one of them. In fact, the first time I ever saw them, or knew that such accounts existed, was when I read them in the tenth report. I am bound to suppose the commissioners conceived a reserve of this nature to be necessary to the objects they had prescribed to themselves in pursuing the inquiry entrusted to them. I shall not, at present, stop to examine into the justice of that mode of proceeding. I mean barely to notice the fact, in illustration of the assertion I have made; that this is the first moment I have been permitted, in any shape, to offer any explanation on the subject of those resolutions which have been enrolled on the Journals of this House, and from thence have found their way to the foot of the throne. With the same view, I allude to my letter, of the 28th of March last, to the commissioners, after the report made its appearance (see the note to p. 550) — As the fact appears on the proceedings of this House of the 8th of April, I need not remark, that another opportunity was denied to me by its decision on the question of instituting an inquiry before proceeding to decision. My letter to lord Hawkesbury is another proof of what I have asserted, and this House is acquainted with the result communicated in the conference between the two Houses of Parliament, by which the hopes I had entertained of some kind of explanation being opened to me, were precluded, and your committee reduced to the necessity of making their report, without receiving explanation from me in any one particular. This was a consequence resulting from the decision of this House on the 8th of April; for, if the criminating resolutions of that day had not been passed previously to inquiry, there would have been no bar, from the privileges of the House of Lords, to have induced them to restrain me from being examined before the committee. The terms in which I addressed the lords, in my letter to lord Hawkesbury, is a proof that no exertion was omitted by me that could tend to get over the difficulty. — “Wimbledon, 6th May, 1805. My lord, I observe that, on the message from the House of Commons, desiring my attendance to be examined by a committee of their number, your lordship has started a difficulty, founded on a standing order of the House of Lords. I certainly was not aware that such a standing order existed, and had taken for granted, that the licence of the House, to my attending the committee of the House of Commons, would have been given as a matter of course. On a question of privilege, originating in the manner this was done, your lordship will readily perceive the reasons which render it impossible for me to take any part; but, I trust, I am guilty of no improper intrusion, when I put your lordship in possession of my own anxious wishes, that, if possible, the difficulty may be got over, and that I may be at liberty to act upon my own feelings, which, notwithstanding the singular circumstances in which I am placed, urge me most earnestly to express my hopes, that I shall not be debarred from giving my attendance on the committee of the House of Commons, as requested in the message from that House. In stating these sentiments to your lordship, you will, of course, understand yourself at liberty to make any use of them you may think proper. I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) MELVILLE.” — I cannot conclude this subject, without adverting to another proceeding of this House which has likewise tended, in a very material degree, to limit the means of any explanations being given, which could remove any of the imputations which have been cast upon me. I allude to the resolution of the 29th of April, directing the attorney-general to institute a civil suit, for the recovery of any profits made by Mr. Trotter or myself from the monies issued for naval purposes. I can know nothing with accuracy that passed in this House when this resolution was adopted; but if I am to give credit to those channels of information which are connived at in the daily publications, which are more or less perused by all of us, I am to understand it to have been stated in argument, that if the measure suggested in that resolution was adopted, there could be no further proceeding against me in any other mode. Upon this ground it was opposed by those who are not supposed to have any particular partiality towards me. With the recollection of this in my mind, I may be perhaps forgiven, if I expressed some degree of surprise, when I heard of the intimation given of an intended motion of impeachment. It was not, however, to make this remark, that I have adverted to this resolution ; I allude to it for the purpose of observing, that the delicacy of your committee to Mr. Trotter, joined to their not having it in their power to examine myself, has certainly tended to deprive me of the benefit of any elucidation that might have arisen from a more minute examination of the subject. Mr. Trotter is not interrogated as to any of the supposed participation which has been stated to have taken place between him and me, neither is he asked, whether he was directed by me to lay out any public money for my benefit ; nor is he examined as to my privity, or knowledge of any of those various modes of using the public money, stated in the twelfth and thirteenth resolutions of the 8th of April. I have been the more pointed in bringing these particulars to the recollection of the House ; because, by some strange perversion of the truth, an insinuation has reached me, that I had omitted, till this last stage of your proceeding, to take any measures for my own vindication. The direct reverse is the fact. And even now I find myself placed in a very awkward situation. Understanding that, in consequence of the general intimation some time ago given in this House, of my desire to be heard in person, new difficulties had been started in another place, I again addressed myself to lord Hawkesbury, by a letter, in the following terms :—"Wimbledon, 7th June, 1805. My lord ; having reason to believe, that, in consequence of a report made to the House of Commons by a select committee, discussions are likely to take place in that House, on which I may be desirous of being heard in explanation and defence of parts of my conduct, I am anxious to obtain the permission of the House of Lords to attend the House of Commons for that purpose, if I should think fit. In my former letter to your lordship of the 6th instant, I expressed to you, as strongly as I could, my anxiety to be afforded some means of removing the imputations which had been laid to my charge, and since that time many circumstances have occurred to increase that anxiety, and I entreat your lordship to give your best assistance to forward the object of my present request. I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) MELVILLE. To the lord Hawkesbury."—And the resolution of the House of Lords is conceived in the following words: "Resolved, that the lord viscount Melville have leave to go down to the House of Commons, and to defend himself there, if he shall think fit, on all points on which the House of Commons have not previously passed any accusatory or criminatory resolutions against him."—Circumscribed as I am by this resolution, I know I am not at liberty, even with your indulgence, to defend myself against any of the resolutions of the 8th of April last ; and therefore, if inadvertently I should drop any thing that may be so construed, I hope it will be understood that it is not with an intention to arraign in this place the justice of those resolutions, but with the view of being certain that I understand, and do not misrepresent them. The resolutions of the 8th of April are fourteen in number (see p. 551), to which another was added on the 29th, viz. "that the attorney general be directed to take such measures as may appear to him to be most effectual in due course of law, for ascertaining and recovering any sums of money that may be due to the public from lord viscount Melville, or Alexander Trotter, esq. in respect of any profits derived by them from monies issued for naval purposes, and that may have come into their hands subsequent to the first day of January 1786." The twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth are chiefly deserving of attention, the previous ones being merely statements of facts, which of themselves could not have attracted any notice. The twelfth resolution contains a statement of a variety of positions, apparently meant to lay the basis for the conclusion drawn in the fourteenth resolution. From the terms of the twelfth, I am left somewhat doubtful, whether it was meant to apply to me personally. But as I cannot suppose it possible that the House of Commons could intend to leave it ambiguous, whom they meant to charge with criminality, I must take it for granted that I am implicated in it ; and I am the more confirmed in this supposition, from having observed the comments which, in other places, have been lavished, without any reserve, upon that resolution, and those comments often made by persons, who being members of parliament, were, I presume, of course, properly informed, and competent to judge of the object of the resolutions which the House of Commons had adopted. In order, therefore, to ascertain the full extent of the charges contained in the twelfth resolution, it must be coupled with, and taken in conjunction with the thirteenth ; and the joint import of the two resolutions is, that "Mr. Trotter did, at various times, under pretence of naval services, and by a manifest evasion of the act, draw from the Bank, and invest in exchequer and navy bills, and lend upon the security of stock, and employ in discounting private bills, and in the purchase of Bank and East India stock, large sums of public money for the purposes of private emolument, and in doing so, he acted with my knowledge and consent, being my private agent." And although the charge does not expressly say so, it certainly concludes in such a manner as must leave a full conviction on the mind of every reader, that "Mr. Trotter, so acting as my private agent, did occasionally lay out ten or twenty thousand pounds in those transactions, for my use and benefit." Upon this charge I must, in truth and justice to myself, solemnly assert, before this House, and in the face of my country, that it is erroneous in every particular. I never knew that Mr. Trotter had drawn any money, for the purposes of private emolument, in manifest evasion of the act. I never knew that he had invested any money in exchequer or navy bills. I never knew that he had lent upon the security of stock. I never knew that he had employed any money in the discount of private bills. I never knew that he employed any public money in the purchase of Bank or India stock. Having disclaimed all knowledge of these transactions, it is scarcely necessary to add, that if any such existed, they were not, as stated, with my privity and consent; neither have I the smallest knowledge or belief, that Mr. Trotter ever did lay out, for my use or benefit, in any such modes, any sum of public money whatever. Having, in so pointed a manner, disclaimed all knowledge of any of those transactions detailed in the twelfth resolution, I need not stop a moment to express the indignation I must have felt, when I found that not only that knowledge was imputed to me, but that, with a view to give the colour of probability to the insinuation of personal profit arising from such transactions (for no man ventured to advance it as a charge) it was even surmised, that Mr. Trotter had, in the execution of those transactions, enjoyed the benefit of my confidential knowledge of the secrets of government.—I am aware, that, notwithstanding all I have represented, my statement would still be deficient, if I were to pass over in silence a charge, which, if not credited or adopted in this House, has certainly, through the medium of your resolutions, made its way to almost every corner of the kingdom; and it must be within the knowledge or observation of every man, that no pains have been spared, no means neglected, to gain proselytes to the belief of this charge. You will anticipate me, when I mention that of my having been a participator in the profits, which Mr. Trotter is supposed to have made from the public money that has passed through his hands. This is a charge which I had positively denied, before you passed the resolutions of the 8th of April; and if a question to this effect had been put to Mr. Trotter, in any shape, since that insinuation was made, either in the 10th report, or any where else, I have reason to know, that he would have embraced the “opportunity of contradicting, in the most unequivocal and unqualified terms, the malignant invectives against my character, founded on the assertion, that I had, directly or indirectly, participated in any of the emoluments he may have derived from the use of the money imprested for naval services and entrusted to his charge, and that I never was, at any moment when he served under me, in the knowledge either of the nature, extent, or application of those emoluments.”—I am at a loss to conjecture, whether, notwithstanding such direct and solemn assertions made by those who alone can be informed of the truth, this calumny is still to be believed and circulated. But there is one fact in refutation of it, which cannot fail to carry full conviction to the mind of every man; if that upon which it rests is not disbelieved or disapproved. I allude to the circumstance of which (in the midst of the loudest clamours against me) a denial has never been attempted, that every sum advanced to me by Mr. Trotter, in any shape, or on any account, has been repaid to the uttermost farthing, and that I am not indebted upon the treasurership in question, in one single mite, either to him, or to the public. Is this reconcileable with the idea of participation? The term supposes receipts, arising out of a joint concern, upon which profits have arisen and are divided, and of course excludes the supposition of any restitution; and I should trust, that this observation must for ever silence those who have been the most active in the propagation of this aspersion.—Not only in the resolutions upon which I have been observing, but in other modes and in other places, my connexion with Mr. Trotter, as my private agent, has been so often alluded to, and its having been insinuated for the most malevolent purposes, that my connexion with him was so intimate, as to procure for him a communication of the confidential transactions of government, I trust it will not be deemed foreign to the purpose of my attendance in this House, if I detain gentlemen a few minutes on this subject.—When I came into the navy pay-office I found him there, having been introduced to it, as I understand, in consequence of his relationship to the late sir Gilbert Elliot and Mr. Coutts. He was, from these connexions, countenanced by Mr. Douglas, the paymaster, and occasionally with me in the course of official business. But he attracted my particular notice, by his zeal in pointing out to me the many means that were used to deprive the seamen and their families of the full amount of what they were justly entitled to. He was encouraged by me to prosecute those inquiries, and I was indebted to him for many of those suggestions, which enabled me, during the time I was treasurer of the navy, to propose to parliament, and place upon the statute book, that system of regulations and arrangement, which has since given complete security, comfort, and protection, to every person, of every rank in the military service of the navy, and after their deaths, has extended the same benefits to their widows and children. These circumstances naturally increased my favourable dispositions towards Mr. Trotter, and I selected him for the office of paymaster on the death of Mr. Douglas. In consequence of this, he was in the receipt of my salary, and being constantly, from his situation, near me, he became naturally the channel, through which I had it in my power to conduct many inferior transactions relating to my private affairs.—The following is a copy of the power of attorney, by which, as treasurer of the navy, I authorized Mr. Trotter to draw the money from the Bank of England: “Know all men by these presents, that I, the right hon. Henry Dundas, treasurer of his majesty's navy, as well within Great Britain as without, have nominated, constituted, and appointed Alexander Trotter, esq. my paymaster, hereby giving and granting to him full power and authority to draw on the governor and company of the Bank of England, for and upon my account, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, all and every sum and sums of money that now are, and shall hereafter be, wanted for the public services, under my care of payment, he being particularly careful to specify in each and every draft the service for which the money is drawn."—Such is the short history of the origin and progress of Mr. Trotter's connexion with me in business, either public or private; and whatever cloud may now hang over him, and however some parts of his conduct may have recently brought upon me much disquietude and anxiety, I shall never refuse to him the justice of acknowledging, that, under his management, the pay-office of the navy was conducted, for a period of fourteen years, without one payment being a moment delayed at the treasurer's office, and an account of not less than one hundred and thirty-four millions sterling has been closed, without the loss of one farthing having arisen to the public during the whole of that period.—I now proceed to the fourteenth resolution, which is in the following words:—"That the right hon. lord viscount Melville, having been privy to, and having connived at, the withdrawing from the Bank of England, for the purpose, as stated by lord Melville, of private emolument to Mr. Trotter, sums issued to lord Melville as treasurer of the navy, and placed to his account in the Bank, according to the provisions of the 25th Geo. 3rd, cap. 31, has been guilty of a gross violation of the law, and a high breach of duty."—Before examining the justice of the conclusion drawn in the end of this resolution, it is essential to understand the fact on which it is grounded, and which I am certain is altogether misunderstood. It is assumed, and my own authority quoted for it, that I was privy to the withdrawing from the Bank of England, for the purpose of private emolument to Mr. Trotter, sums issued to me as treasurer of the navy. If by these words it is meant to convey, that Mr. Trotter had any power or authority from me, to draw sums indiscriminately from the Bank for his own use or emolument, I deny that I was privy to any such transactions. I deny that I ever said so, and I affirm, there is no evidence to justify such an assertion. But if it is meant to state, that after the money was drawn by assignments, under the authority of the competent boards, it was illegal to put it into the custody of Mr. Coutts, instead of putting it in the iron chest, or in the hands of the respective sub-accountants, I am yet, after all I have heard, to learn, that in doing so, the act of parliament was violated.—That an indiscriminate power of drawing from the Bank was given by me to Mr. Trotter, I conceive, cannot be alleged by any person who attends to the real import of my evidence. The first question put to me on this subject, by the commissioners of Naval Inquiry, was in the following words:—"Did you authorize the paymaster, in or about the year 1786, to draw the money applicable to naval services from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker?" My answer was—"I cannot precisely fix the time; but I am certain, that I did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank, for public purposes, in his private banker's hands, during the period it was not demanded to the purposes for which it was drawn." The plain import of this answer is, that when the money was legally, and in terms of the act of parliament, drawn from the Bank, I permitted Mr. Trotter to lodge such balance of the money assigned, as was not called for by the person or persons entitled to receive it. But there is not a syllable in the answer to import, that I gave Mr. Trotter authority to draw from the Bank, for his own private emolument, any sum that had not been assigned or drawn in terms of the provisions of the act of parliament. This proposition, which I aver to be the meaning of my answer, is made still more clear in an after part of my evidence. The commissioners put a question to me in the following words:—"As the money applicable to naval services was directed to be lodged in the Bank, by the act of 25 Geo. 3rd, cap. 31, and not to be drawn from thence without specifying the services for which it is drawn, by what authority did you give permission to the paymaster of the navy to draw the money out of the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of private bankers?"—From the terms of this question it struck me, that the commissioners were proceeding on the same mistake as that which seems to be countenanced by the general words made use of in the fourteenth resolution; I therefore immediately rectified their error by my answer, which is in the following words:—"I take it for granted, it always was drawn under the heads of service, pointed out in the act of parliament; and when I talk of permission, I mean it under the explanation contained in the answer to a former question, in which I suppose the money drawn under competent authority." From this plain statement, I feel myself authorized to repeat the assertion I have already made, that this resolution, adopting the general terms it has done, assumes and proceeds on a fact not warranted, either by the truth of the case, or by the evidence contained in the tenth report of the commissioners of Naval Inquiry; and I must here be permitted to add, that the assumption in the fourteenth resolution, of the fact to which I have adverted, came upon me with the more surprise, as, in the report of the commissioners, they have distinctly stated the import of my evidence to be what I have now explained. The passage to which I allude is in the tenth report (see the Appendix infra), and in the following words:—"Lord Melville states, that he certainly did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank, for the public purposes, in his private banker's hands, during the period that it was not demanded for the purposes for which it was drawn; but it is to be inferred from his evidence, that he intended Mr. Trotter to draw upon the Bank for the amount only of the assignments made on him by the different boards (an account of which is furnished to him daily), and that the balance of such sum, till demanded, should alone be lodged by Mr. Trotter in the hands of his private bankers."

—Having thus ascertained the fact as it truly stands, the next consideration is, what is the act of parliament, which, according to this state of the fact, the resolution affirms to be violated? I contend, that there is not one clause of the act prohibitory of the permission to lodge assigned money in the hands of a private banker, till the money so assigned is applied for by the person entitled to it. I hope I state my proposition distinctly, and desire it to be adverted to, that the point I at present discuss is altogether unconnected with the question, what use was made of the money when so lodged? That is a separate question, and they ought not to be blended together. I am now, in this part of the discussion, examining the truth or falsehood of a proposition, whether there is any thing in the act of parliament to prohibit lodging the balance of assigned money, till called for, in a private banker's hand? Suppose the case, that instead of lodging the money, of the description I have stated, in a private banker's hands, the practice had been to open a separate account in the Bank of England, for the deposit of such assigned money, till called for; I would ask, whether this would be a violation of the act of parliament? Nobody would have contended, that in such an arrangement, the treasurer of the navy would have violated either the letter or spirit of the act in any one respect, or that he would have met with the smallest blame from any quarter in exercising that discretion, whereby he would be enabled to draw out the assigned money from the separate account, without having recourse to the general account raised in his name, in terms of the provisions of the act of parliament. And yet, if the proposition is true, that no draft could be made, except on the general account raised at the Bank in the name of the treasurer, the violation would equally exist in the supposed as in the real case.—The error of the opposite argument consists in supposing, that the object of the act of 1785 went to an extent in its provisions, beyond what was ever in the view of those who proposed it, or of the legislature which passed it. It was not a law intended to embrace all the regulations, which it might be expedient, either by legislative provisions, or by official arrangements, to establish, for the conduct of that great machine, which has now become necessary for the regular payment of the naval service. The single object which the act had in view was, to convert the treasurer's account from a personal to an official account, and thereby to obviate an abuse which had been so much complained of, whereby ex-treasurers of the navy had large balances in their hands, and remained great public accountants, many years after they were out of office. To this object its provisions are complete, and have been accurately complied with; but, if you expect to find in that act such a digest of regulations, as to exclude, in the management of the office, the discretion of the treasurer as to many parts of his duty, you will search in vain. Even that arrangement, which has of late been so much the subject of discussion, I mean the establishment of a fixed salary to the treasurer, in place of his former emoluments from the use of the balance in his hands, is not provided for or regulated by this act of parliament; that was done by the terms of his patent, several years before the act of parliament existed. The observation I have just made will appear the more forcible, if gentlemen will take the trouble of referring to the act which passed in 1783, for regulating the office of the paymaster-general of his majesty's land forces. It repeals an act which had been passed on that subject in the preceding session, and enacts a new code and system of regulations, amounting to no less than thirty-nine clauses, and embracing minutely every circumstance connected with the business of that office. Is there any such system of regulation contained in the act now under consideration? Certainly not. It is a short act, of twelve clauses, confined to the only immediate object at that time in view, viz. what I have already expressed, the converting the treasurer's account from a personal to an official one; but not regulating, or professing to regulate, the whole conduct of that department.—Not adverting to what I have just observed, I cannot help conceiving that gentlemen mislead themselves, by assimilating the navy pay-office, in a great degree, to the army pay-office, and supposing that, in all respects, the one has been regulated, or can be regulated, by the principles of the other. In this they are totally mistaken. The navy pay-office is to the navy, what not the army pay-office alone, but the army pay-office, with the addition of army agents, of colonels of regiments, of barrack-masters, and other subordinate accountants, is to the army. The army pay-office issues gross sums, to be subsequently distributed by persons holding no situation in the office. The navy pay-office makes the minutest individual payments; the fraction of a single seaman's yearly pay, or the quarterly allotment of a seaman's wife. It may be practicable to make all army payments by specific drafts to individuals; but it is impossible, with regard to the navy payments, many of which are for such small sums. I have been informed, that in twenty-six days of the month of January last, the payments amounted to six thousand four hundred and two in number; of which no less than three thousand two hundred and seventy-eight were of sums under twenty pounds; and one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, in sums from one pound eight shillings, to ten shillings and sixpence. Again, as to wages, there were recently, if I am accurately informed, not less than six thousand eight hundred ships books open in the pay-room of the office, upon any one of which, at any hour, a call might be made for the wages of any seaman who might happen not to have been present at the payment at the out-port, for the money due to him for four or five years, or as many months' service.—No person will contend, that in the cases referred to, it is possible to carry on the business of the department by specific drafts, in favour of the respective individuals, and I understand the impossibility has been distinctly admitted. But is it possible, consistently with this admission, not farther to admit, that it could not have been in the contemplation of the act of parliament, by minute provisions, to regulate the whole conduct of the office, or to alter the whole former practice, by a few provisions, directed to the single object of altering the nature of the treasurer's account? If such had been the view of those who proposed this act, is it possible that some clause or clauses would not have been introduced, to explain that the general expression of drafts did not mean to imply specific drafts, in payment of individuals, of such sums as those which I have just referred to? This subject was left, as it formerly had been, to the discretion and official arrangement of the treasurer, on such principles as might be most expedient and practicable for conducting the business of the office. It is sufficient, for the purpose of my present argument, to contend, that the expression of drafts, in the language of the act of parliament, neither did nor could mean, specific drafts, in the name of each individual entitled to receive the sum drawn for.—In like manner I contend, that an authority derived from any of the competent boards, in the shape of one or more assignments upon the treasurer, did not render it necessary in the payment of such assignments, that it should be done by specific drafts, in favour of the person entitled to receive it. In the sound construction of the act of parliament, the sums authorized by the assignments were fairly and legally drawn, from the moment the assignments were made, nor did it make any difference in the execution of the act, whether the sums assigned were drawn from the Bank in one draft or in ten drafts. Put the case, that ten, or any given number of the holders of assignments, had intimated a wish to receive their payment at the office, or at Messrs. Coutts's, on a particular day; it surely could not be maintained, that the paymaster of the navy was debarred from gratifying them in that wish, or that he was guilty of an illegality, if he made the payment agreeably to the mode suggested by themselves.—It becomes still more difficult to believe, that any such alteration was intended by the act, when it is recollected, that the subject was brought distinctly under the view of those who passed the act in question; and yet no such prohibition, as now supposed, was either directly or indirectly inserted in the act. It has been repeatedly stated and it is true, that the act of parliament originated in the report of the commissioners in 1782. These commissioners, speaking of the difference between the treasurer's statement of the balance in his hands on a given day, and that of the navy-board, say—"This difference lies in the cashier's and victualling branches, and arises from the following cause: When the boards assign bills upon the treasurer for payment, they immediately give him credit for those bills in his account kept at their offices; but the treasurer does not himself take credit for any bills in his own account till he actually pays them. The persons who receive these bills do not always immediately present them to the treasurer for payment, but frequently keep them in their possession for a considerable time. The treasurer's balance must therefore exceed the navy balance, as much as the sum of the bills assigned upon him for payment exceeds the sum of the bills actually paid by him. We conceive this excess is not money for which the treasurer is accountable to the public, but belongs to the proprietors of those bills, and remains in his hands, at their risk, until they apply to him for payment."—In these words, the existence, nature, and consequences of the assignments not called for, are distinctly and accurately pointed out; and is it possible to conceive, that if this act of parliament had meant to make any provision respecting these assignments, it would not have been done, in some such plain and precise manner, as to exclude all doubt upon the subject? It would not have been left to doubtful implication or construction of the act, which has already, in the case of small payments, been clearly proved not to mean generally specific drafts to individuals, as contended for in that construction of the act which I have endeavoured to refute. It will be clearly understood, that in the argument I have stated, I only contend that the act of parliament had not this point in contemplation, and therefore it is unwarrantable to argue, or to resolve, that it has been violated, by any practice which has taken place in the navy pay-office during my treasurer-ship. Before quitting this subject, I must not omit to observe, that the practice of lodging naval money in the hands of Messrs. Coutts continued for two years after I was out of office, and that it was altered ultimately by Mr. Bathurst, not on a clear decision formed by him of its illegality, but because he thought it expedient; and the doubts entertained by lord Harrowby, during his treasurer-ship, arose from conceiving, that the practice was inconsistent with the spirit, if not with the letter of the law. I do not mean to insinuate, that they were aware of the money being again withdrawn from Messrs. Coutts, for the purpose of private emolument to the paymaster. My observation only goes to the point of stating, that the abstract proposition of the illegality of the practice of lodging assigned money in the hands of a private banker had not occurred to those able men, in the strong light it has been resolved with regard to me; otherwise the continuance of it would not have been tolerated for two years after the treasurership of the navy had passed into their hands.—And this leads me to another topic, to which I feel myself warranted to summon the attention of the House, under the circumstances in which I am placed. I have given my reasons in detail, why I contend that the act of parliament has not been violated in any shape; but I submit it to your justice to consider, how far I am, for the object of my present attendance, under the necessity of arguing my proposition to the full extent I have stated. A law may be violated without being grossly violated, and a breach of duty may be committed without warranting the appellation of a high breach of duty. My arguments may have failed in convincing you, that my construction of the act is the true one, and you may remain of opinion, that its provisions extended to objects, which I contend were never within its contemplation. I can only say, that my judgment continues unaltered, and that I never had even conceived the doubt as to the meaning of the act, till the period of the late discussions, from which I am certainly bound to doubt my own opinion, when it differs from others whose talents I sincerely respect; but I cannot carry my acquiescence so far as to admit, that an error of judgment, resting upon the grounds I have stated, ought to have subjected me to such criminating resolutions, as those which this House recorded on the 8th of April last.—Having endeavoured, as clearly as I can, to explain to the House the grounds on which I contend that no illegality is imputable to me, on the subject of drawing from the Bank the sums assigned by the competent boards, you will immediately perceive the nature and extent of the benefit which I conceived the paymaster might derive, from lodging the money, thus drawn from the Bank, in the hands of Messrs. Coutts. I have already adverted to the transactions referred to in the twelfth resolution, and denied the imputation contained in that resolution, of my being privy to those transactions. My impression, with regard to any benefit the paymaster might derive from the money lodged in Messrs. Coutts's hands, was simply this. I conceived it to arise from an understanding between him and the partners of that house, as to the advantage they might respectively derive from the customary use of money while in their hands; and such an arrangement between them, I know, could not prevent the paymaster from drawing, at any moment, from Messrs. Coutts's house, any sum requisite for the discharge of any claim to which that deposite money was liable. I beg not to be understood as stating, that I entertained this idea from any actual information I had on the subject; but the impression naturally arose in my mind, from knowing such to be the practice universal in similar cases, not only with the public banks, but all banking houses in another part of the kingdom; and it is only within these three months, that I have been made aware of the mistake, by the perusal of a memorandum, written by Mr. Coutts, the principal partner of that house. This is a precise state of the case and of the impressions I had of it; and when I did not interpose, to prevent the paymaster's enjoying such emoluments, I did not conceive myself to be infringing any act of parliament, nor did I feel that I was incurring, either for the public or myself, the smallest degree of risk, or exposing the business of the office to any inconvenience whatever. I beg leave further to remark, that although I never held out this species of advantage as an established emolument of the office of paymaster, or one which I might not have put an end to at any moment I found it expedient to do so, I certainly never felt it to be a clandestine or mysterious arrangement. Of this I cannot give a stronger proof, than by referring to a fact mentioned in the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry. I mean the suggestion made by former commissioners, in the year 1786, in which they recommend an augmentation of the paymaster's salary from 500*l.* to 800*l.* per annum. But although, from the increase of business which the different acts of parliament had imposed upon the clerks and other officers of the navy pay office, I had been obliged to revise the establishments, and recommend to his majesty in council to make very considerable additions to their salaries, I did not recommend, that any such should be made to the paymaster, under the impression that, in the manner I have stated, he must derive advantages, which rendered it unnecessary to burthen the establishment with an additional salary to him. In fact, no such addition was made till the year 1800, a short time before my leaving the office, when a still further increase of business having been thrown upon the persons doing the duty of the navy pay-office, in consequence of the adoption of many new and beneficial regulations, which since the former period had been added, it became necessary again to revise the establishment, and attend to their earnest representation for an augmentation of their allowances. Then, for the first time, was the augmentation to the paymaster's salary adopted, which had been recommended by the commissioners; and it was done upon the ground of several others, in situations inferior to the paymaster, having been raised to about 600*l.* The augmentation then made was not felt to be adequate to the labour, importance, and responsibility of the office; but it was purposely kept down, on the understanding, undoubtedly entertained by others as well as by me, that the paymaster enjoyed those advantages to which I have alluded. I do not rest upon these circumstances, in the view of justifying the regularity of a practice which may, on other grounds, have been since found to be either improper or irregular; but, certainly, I am entitled to found upon them, as the strongest proof that I meant no concealment in the transaction, and that I felt no consciousness of wrong in what I had done. With the permission of the House, I must, for a few moments, recall their attention to a subject, to which I have hitherto only slightly alluded. I refer to the insinuations thrown out, that my authorizing or conniving at the lodging of the naval money in the house of Messrs. Coutts, could only proceed from an intention of its being appropriated to the purposes of private emolument. Previously to the year 1786, the navy pay office was situated in the city, in the neighbourhood of the Bank, and it was in consequence of its removal to Somerset-place, that the suggestion was made to me of the convenience of putting the money, when drawn from the Bank, in the hands of a respectable house in the neighbourhood of Somerset-place. The reasons given at the time certainly did satisfy me, and after the maturest consideration I can give to the subject, I am not yet convinced, that my opinion was erroneous. It would serve no good purpose, at present, to enter upon a discussion of that subject; but if ever there should be occasion to do so, I think, I can prove, that both the convenience and the security of the public would be better consulted, by the accounts of the sub-accountants being placed in a situation liable to the daily inspection and examination of the paymaster, than by having them raised in their separate names, at so great a distance from the means of such habitual examination. I know that, from the nature of the business, and the necessity of so much of it being done at the outports, it is impossible to procure perfect safety, either to the public or to the treasurer, by any constant and daily inspection of the paymaster; but that is no reason why recourse should not be had to that additional check wherever it can be exercised. The commissioners of naval inquiry are themselves aware of the risks that are run, and, therefore, they have made the following suggestion: "We were surprised to learn, that neither the officers nor clerks in the navy pay office, give any security for the faithful discharge of their duty, notwithstanding the great responsibility of their situations. We are of opinion, that the paymaster, and other officers and clerks entrusted with the public money, should be required to find security, in proportion to the amount of their salaries; for though such security may not be adequate to the trust reposed in them, we think it would operate strongly, in preventing the misapplication of the public money."—The measure here suggested would give a very small additional security to the public; but the suggestion proceeds on the apprehension that there is a risk, and that being the case, I contend that the risk is increased, by the naval money being intrusted to a variety of persons, whose accounts are remote from inspection and examination, more than it would be, if those accounts were subject to the daily examination and inspection of one individual, to whose accuracy and responsibility the treasurer must principally look for his own security and that of the public. Great pains appear to be taken by the commissioners of naval inquiry, to establish that no inconvenience has ensued from changing the former mode of conducting the business, and having recourse to that which is now practised. Upon all that species of evidence and observation, it is sufficient for me to remark, that the new practice has been, at least, of very short duration. I sincerely hope it will answer the expectations of those who, I make no doubt, have, from the best of motives, adopted it; but, in my own vindication, I cannot refrain from reminding the House, that during the period of sixteen years, when I had the conduct of the office, it was done without any inconvenience or complaint; and, let the new practice prove, on experience, to be as successful as its most sanguine panegyrist can desire, it never can succeed better, as to its effects, than that which has been laid aside to make room for it. Having, in the course of my statement, given to this House a fair and unqualified explanation of every circumstance connected with the purport of the resolutions adopted on the 8th of April last, I am perfectly aware it may naturally suggest itself to many who now hear me, to ask, why I thought it necessary to make any reserve in the answers I gave, when examined by the commissioners of naval inquiry? This question having been put to me by many of my private friends, I can the more readily suppose it to arise in the minds of others. From what I have already stated, it must appear, that it has not been owing to any thing like reluctance on my part, that this doubt has not been long ago removed; and I willingly seize the first opportunity afforded me of explanation, to premise, that the real import of my examination before the commissioners has been either much misunderstood or grossly misrepresented. It has been affirmed, in broad and general terms, that I refused to answer the commissioners, whether I had derived profit from the public money in the hands of the treasurer. I have done no such thing. The commissioners, in their letter to me of the 26th June, called upon me to give them an account of certain particulars in detail, which, for the reasons I assigned in answer, it was literally impossible for me to do; and I added, that even if I had the means of doing so, I should think it my duty to withhold the information required, on the grounds I stated, alluding to sums which had been occasionally withdrawn for other public purposes, not naval. Perhaps I need not have added this; but let it be observed, that at that time nothing had occurred to create in my mind a suspicion, that any communications made by me to the commissioners were likely to be interpreted to my disadvantage. From that time I heard no more from the commissioners for the space of four months, during which period, it now appears, they had become possessed of all Mr. Trotter's private accounts with the house of Messrs. Coutts. Upon the 2nd of November I received the following summons from the commissioners: "Office of Naval Inquiry, Great George-street, 2nd Nov. 1804. My lord; being desirous of receiving some information from your lordship, relative to the management of the business of the pay-office of the navy during your treasurership, we request you will let us know, what day in the next week, and at what hour it will be most convenient for your lordship to attend us for that purpose."—In consequence of this summons, I immediately attended them, and underwent an examination by questions, obviously prepared with much previous consideration; but as I have already observed, without a communication of one item of these accounts before them, and without an explanation as to any one entry contained in them, and without a conception, on my part, that in that examination I was on my trial, or liable, in consequence of it, to be subjected to severe criminalizing resolutions.—Having given this preliminary explanation, I proceed to state, that upon an accurate examination of the terms of my evidence, you will perceive how much it has been misunderstood, if it is supposed that I had refused in general to answer, whether I had derived benefit from the public money.—At the time of that question being put to me, I had received the unexpected information, that in the advances Mr. Trotter had made to me, on the account current of my affairs, he (Mr. Trotter) had made those advances, without discriminating whether they were made from private funds, or from the public balances in his hands. With the knowledge I possessed, from the information thus given me, of the manner in which he had blended his account, I was induced to adopt a degree of reserve, beyond what perhaps the occasion called for; and upon a review of all circumstances now before me, I am satisfied, that I might then have as directly and as confidently answered the question in the negative, as I can now; conscious as I then was, and as I now am, that at no time did I act, or authorize any other person to act, in contravention of the patent under which I held the office of treasurer of the navy.—The details I have this day given to you must satisfy every man, that I could have no motive, and that it was even contrary to my interest, to exercise any reserve on this subject. I have understood, that a great deal of acrimony and ingenuity have been resorted to, in the interpretation of another answer I have given. I mean when the question is put to me, "whether I did direct, or authorize Mr. Trotter, while paymaster of the navy, to lay out or apply, or cause to be laid out and applied, any of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, since the first of January 1786, for my benefit or advantage?" I answered by saying, "To the best of my recollection I never did." I have less reason to complain of the animadversions which have been made upon this answer; for I certainly might, and ought to have answered, simply, that "I never did;" and my having prefixed the other useless words, arose (as is well known to those who are in the habits of living and conversing with me) out of a mode of expression customary with me in speaking of past transactions. I have also observed, that on another topic much asperity has been resorted to, founded on the allegation of my having refused to answer questions, on the ground of not being obliged to criminate myself. Of all the imputations I have heard of, I confess this is the one I least expected. If I had been of that disposition, I should not have been exposed to any one of the charges that have been brought against me; and it is the more extraordinary such a one should have arisen, when my accusers have rested the whole of their charges on what they are pleased to call my own confession. The observation is wholly founded on a misrepresentation of my evidence. I never made use of the clause in the act of parliament for any personal reason, but solely to protect me from disclosing any of those irregularities I may be supposed to have committed, in appropriating, for a time, any of the naval money to other public services. So far from feeling that to be any imputation upon my honour, I should have felt myself guilty, not only of a breach of public duty, but a most unwarrantable violation of private honour, if I had disclosed any of those transactions. The information I had received from Mr. Trotter, of his manner of blending his public and private accounts, was the single reason I assigned for not answering any question put to me, respecting my having reaped any benefit or advantage from the money in the hands of the treasurer of the navy. Upon that subject I never had recourse to the defence of not criminating myself. Whatever, therefore, has any where been said upon that topic, may be a proof of dexterity in misrepresentation; but in point of candour or fair statement, it is certainly entitled to no merit. I am informed that another charge still has been alleged against me in different quarters, on which I wish to say a few words, not so much from the importance of the charge itself, as from its being a striking proof of the extent to which a spirit of rancorous hostility, once yielded to, will be induced to go, in its exertions to inflame itself and the minds of others. The topic to which I allude is that, whereby I have been charged with having no other motive for remaining treasurer of the navy, after I became secretary of state, except the unlawful gains I am supposed to have derived from that situation. What I am now to state does not rest upon my assertion. There is one who now hears me, and others with whom I have at present no connection in politics, who can bear testimony to the fact, that I never was one hour secretary of state with my own inclination. Under the original institution of the board of India commissioners, the treasurership of the navy was understood to be the appropriate situation of the person who was to take the leading part in the management and control of the affairs of India. In that character I had acted many years with great labour; and, perhaps, I may, have had the vanity to suppose, that by a successful administration of that great concern, I had done essential service to my country, and at the same time gratified an ambition, of which no honourable mind has reason to be ashamed; I have no difficulty in acknowledging, that I had a predilection for the India department, and it was the only one in which I ever wished to have been employed. On this ground I declined accepting the seals of the home department at the time lord Grenville was appointed; and when, at a later period, I was induced to accept them, it was under an assurance, that I should only be required to hold them for the short period of probably a few months, till the return from abroad of a noble lord for whom they were destined. He did not return at the time expected, and the very critical and dangerous state of the country which immediately ensued, rendered it impossible for me to decline obeying the commands of my sovereign, at a moment when he was advised, that any exertions of mine might be of use in repelling the dangers with which the constitution of the country was so peculiarly menaced, during the period I was in the home department. When the duke of Portland was appointed to that situation, I again made it my earnest request to his majesty, that I might be permitted to confine my labours to the administration of the affairs of India, and I only desisted from making that request, when specially commanded by his majesty to do so.—I am extremely concerned to trouble the House with such personal details; but I am compelled to do so, by the industry with which my enemies think themselves at liberty to lay hold of every circumstance which they suppose can create prejudice against me. The result of what I have stated on this topic is, that I never had the smallest predilection for the office of treasurer of the navy, except in so far as it was the situation at that time supposed to be appropriated to the person at the head of the administration of India.—I shall now proceed to observe upon the report of the committee of the House of Commons, and in doing so, I shall follow the order of the report itself. In the outset, I cannot help expressing my regret for the circumstance stated in the first page of it, and wishing it had occurred to the committee, rather to expunge those questions and answers which appeared to them to exceed the limits of their inquiry, than to leave them in the body of their evidence. The consequence of their not doing so is, that several things are left in the report, calculated to create an impression which would not have existed if the question had been pursued by more minute inquiry; and this inconvenience becomes the more striking, when it is recollected, that I was, from the circumstances well known to the committee, deprived of the opportunity of giving them personally any explanation. The report begins by stating the substance of Mr. Trotter's evidence respecting his advances to me: upon which it is necessary immediately to observe, that it is quite impossible to attempt, with precision, to analyse any of the statements given by Mr. Trotter.—None of the public accounts of the office ever were in my custody or possession, and from the day I transferred my balance to my successor, I considered my connexion with the navy pay office to have ceased, as much as if it never had existed; except in so far as respected a small balance to which I might finally be liable, on the settlement of my account as treasurer, previous to January 1786, as to which my account must be made up and cleared as an ex-treasurer, agreeably to the old practice of the office. I likewise took occasion to explain to the commissioners of naval inquiry, that for many years past I never had considered the vouchers of my settled accounts with Mr. Trotter, in the management of my private affairs, as being of the smallest use, and never thought of preserving them, more than I should have done the vouchers of any other settled account in which I was ever concerned. At the same time, I mentioned to them the information I had received from Mr. Trotter, as to the manner in which these accounts were blended, and which deprived me of the means of giving any detailed or satisfactory information on the subject.—I have shortly recapitulated these circumstances, in order that the House may feel the impossibility of my either confirming or correcting any of the details which Mr. Trotter has given to the committee. It is true, I have now had the opportunity of looking into Mr. Trotter's accounts with Messrs. Coutts, contained in the Appendix to the tenth report; but the bare inspection of them is sufficient to convince every person of the impossibility of deriving any information from them; and every endeavour to unravel them has more and more proved the impracticability of doing so.—In short, in the whole minute details connected with this investigation, I have been at the mercy of Mr. Trotter's memory and recollection, without the means or power of either aiding or correcting his recollection in any one item; but this I can affirm, that I am not indebted in one shilling either to Mr. Trotter or to the public. But upon any anterior details upon which Mr. Trotter may have entered, or may hereafter enter, for the reasons already assigned any distinct explanation from me must be obviously impossible.—Nothing can be further from my thoughts, than to insinuate any intention, on the part of Mr. Trotter, to state any thing differently from what his recollection may have suggested at the moment. At the same time, from the information he has given respecting his books, he has little else to resort to than his memory; and both himself and his friends know that neither he nor they have felt they could depend upon it for a very considerable time past, in the manner they might have done some years ago.—Under these circumstances, and speaking from recollection of transactions many years ago, it is not impossible or improbable, that in some of his details, Mr. Trotter may have intermixed the transactions of one person with those of another. I think I can perceive vestiges of the truth of this observation in his evidence, where he mentions the name of Mr. Tweedie. It is true, that in the close of his evidence he explains himself to mean no more than that he employed Mr. Tweedie as a messenger to me; but from the former part of his evidence any person would be led, and the committee seems in fact to have been led into a belief, that, in some shape or other, Mr. Tweedie was entrusted or employed by me in some way more confidential than as a mere messenger; whereas I have not the least recollection of any circumstance that could create such an impression in Mr. Trotter's mind, and am perfectly certain, that no confidential intercourse of any description, ever passed between Mr. Tweedie and myself. From what Mr. Trotter had said in his evidence, I observe that the committee have been induced to examine the son of Mr. Tweedie on the subject, and the import of his evidence is to confirm the statement I have now given.—Having observed thus much in general, I shall proceed to offer every satisfaction the nature of the case admits of, consistently with the reserve that naturally belongs to transactions connected with the government of the country. But I must, in the first place, remark, that during the whole period in which I was treasurer of the navy, I was, at the same time, the confidential adviser of government in every thing relating to the administration of the affairs of Scotland, or supposed to be connected with the general interests of government in that part of the kingdom. In that capacity, every person must readily perceive the impossibility of being so, without having recourse to the expenditure of occasional sums for the purposes of government; and, however satisfied my own conviction may have been, and however clear the necessity and propriety of the expenditure, in the instances in which it occurred, might in fact have been, every one must be aware, that it is impossible that those purposes should be detailed, without both great public and personal inconvenience: and I do affirm in the most direct terms, that the 10,000*l.* which came into my hands during the paymastership of Mr. Douglas, was neither used, nor meant to be used, for any object of personal profit or emolument to me. But I think it is impossible for any one to expect, that I should enter into a more minute explanation, either with regard to that sum, or another, of, I believe, about a similar amount, at a later period, without incurring the charge of a great breach, as well of public duty as of private honour. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the uneasiness I have felt from the necessity of withholding explanation on any part of this subject, aware as I am of the many insidious and malignant observations, to which any person must be exposed, who feels such a reserve to be his only honourable line of conduct. There is, however, one striking circumstance in this business, on which I may fairly rest in appealing to the candour of the House. In my letter to the commissioners of naval inquiry, on the 30th of June last, though I referred to the whole, I certainly had particularly in contemplation the sum of 40,000*l.* advanced by me to Mr. Pitt, for the purposes explained in the report of the committee of the House of Commons. This sum formed two-thirds of the whole; and if Mr. Pitt had not thought it expedient, as appears at one time to have been his feeling, to divulge the transaction in the manner he has done, I should have thought it my duty never to make such a discovery, from any personal consideration either of fame or safety: and if this investigation had taken place within that period, it is obvious to what an extent of additional suspicion and obloquy I must have been exposed; and yet from the disclosure which has been made, it is now evident that such suspicions would have been groundless, and such obloquy unjust.—It will also be recollected, that with regard to the sum of 10,000*l.* put into my hands by Mr. Douglas, there is no room for charging me in that transaction with any violation of the act of parliament; for it took place before the act passed: and whatever restraint I might have been under from the terms of my patent, the regulations either as to placing money in the Bank, or drawing it from thence, as enacted by the act in 1785, in no respect applied to that ten thousand pounds.—The explanation I have now given, applies to twenty thousand pounds of the sum mentioned in the report, and with the addition of whatever sum Mr. Trotter was at any time in advance for me, in his account current, forms the aggregate of any advance he may have made to me, in so far as I can speak from the conviction of my own mind. It is my belief, that there is some confusion in Mr. Trotter's recollection, when he talks of twenty-two thousand pounds, or twenty-three thousand pounds, as distinct from the advances of "from ten thousand pounds to twenty thousand pounds on his account current." Either the one or the other of these sums, I conceive, must be overstated. I am not aware from what materials Mr. Trotter can make several of the distinctions he has done in his evidence, respecting the different funds from which such advances were made. It is obvious, on the face of his evidence, that much of what he stated bears the character of after-recollection. A striking example of this appears on his second day's examination, when he desires to make an addition of two thousand pounds or three thousand pounds, to the sum of twenty thousand pounds, which he had stated in his examination on the preceding day. It is true, I have no materials or documents by which I can either assist or correct his recollection. I was perfectly aware, in my own mind, that I was accountable to the public for the re-payment of a sum to the amount of about twenty thousand pounds, drawn for confidential purposes, exclusive of the forty thousand pounds to be immediately mentioned: but Mr. Trotter was totally ignorant of those appropriations; and if he endeavours, from any thing recently avowed, to form a conjecture concerning them, I am sure it will only serve to mislead and confuse him.—It is now necessary to advert to a sum mentioned by Mr. Trotter as having been borrowed by my direction, and on my account. He states the sum to be twenty-two or twenty-three thousand pounds. This certainly differs from my recollection, which is clear as to the sum being twenty thousand pounds, and the annual interest paid on it one thousand pounds. If, therefore, the three thousand pounds in addition was any advance on my account, it must have been on his account current, or in some other mode, which it is impossible for me to trace. The loan took place a few years after I had unadvisedly left my profession, and was connected with some private family concerns, with which it is unnecessary to trouble the House. I observe from the report of the committee, that Mr. Trotter, whom I employed to borrow the money, says he was himself the lender; and, upon his authority, I presume he was so. I certainly had no knowledge of it at the time, having only directed him to procure the loan; and probably, from the question not being put to him, he has omitted to inform the committee, that the circumstance of his having been so was only communicated to me within these few weeks.—The next particular in the report to be observed upon, is the sum of 40,000*l.* advanced for the relief of Messrs. Boyd and Co.; and it seems to be taken for granted, that this transaction had been suggested by me. If I had been examined, I think there would have been found some shades of difference in my recollection of the origin of the transaction, from what appears upon the evidence reported. But feeling then, as I do now, the urgent necessity of it, it is immaterial to examine whence the suggestion arose. There seems no difference of recollection, however, as to the substance of the transaction, which is fully before you; and I have no disposition to exculpate myself from any part of the blame which can be supposed imputable to it.—Upon this part of the report it will be expected that I should advert to what is stated as to my not paying interest, when I repaid to Mr. Trotter the sums detailed in the report of the committee. I do not imagine it will be expected by the House, that I should give any reason why I did not either pay or demand interest on any part of the sums of forty and twenty thousand pounds withdrawn for other than naval purposes. Those sums would have yielded no interest if they had remained in the Bank; and it certainly never entered into my mind to conceive, that under the circumstances of the case, the public could look for interest upon money so applied. It has been already mentioned, that for the sum borrowed under my own authority, interest was regularly paid; and if I was, for years, in the practice of paying so large a sum annually as interest, it seems to afford a pretty strong presumption, that I was not in the habit of applying the public money imprested into my hands for the purpose of private emolument. In truth, if I were to enter into any detailed explanations of my own private concerns, I am afraid it would be found, that I had, at all times, too many proofs of that nature to which I could have recourse.—Any consideration of interest, therefore, can alone apply to the sums which Mr. Trotter was at any time in advance for me on my private account current with him. From the latitude of expression made use of by Mr. Trotter, in his original evidence, I find it has been inferred, that he was in the practice occasionally of making advances to me, to the extent of ten or twenty thousand pounds. Mr. Trotter could never mean to state, that at any time he had advanced to me a sum to that amount. He clearly could only mean to speak of the aggregate sum advanced on his account current with me, adding all the items together during the whole progress of the account, on which he plainly states that there was, at different times, a considerable balance in my favour, on which he did not pay any interest.—I have no materials, nor has Mr. Trotter confessedly any, by which he could make a statement on this subject, more accurately than he has hitherto done. But he has very recently communicated to me his belief, that the advance for me of one or two instalments on what is called the loyalty loan, was the only material advance to which he meant to allude: and, so far as I can form any judgment on the subject, I am inclined to think, that his recollection does not much mislead him in this respect. When I subscribed ten thousand pounds to that loan, I certainly had not at my command the money wherewith to purchase the stock; but many who hear me will recollect, that it was expected of men in public situations that they should give countenance to it, and I accordingly did (as I believe many others did) give directions for subscribing to it, meaning to dispose of it as soon as I could. The late Mr. Henry Drummond arranged this for me; but I inadvertently omitting to make the transfer at the proper time, and the value of the stock having fallen, it remained upon my hands. To the best of my recollection I remitted the first instalment from money borrowed in Scotland. Mr. Trotter made provision for the remainder, whether by advance on his private account with me, or through the house of Messrs. Coutts, I do not precisely know: but this I certainly do know and affirm, that in this transaction I never had in contemplation the prospect of pecuniary emolument or advantage, nor indeed did I consider it as any part of my private property; but as soon as the last instalment was paid, I executed a power of attorney in favour of Messrs. Coutts, not only to receive the dividend upon it, but to dispose of the stock itself for the repayment of the purchase money, whenever it suited their convenience to do so.—The result of what I have stated is this, that if Mr. Trotter did advance any of the instalments upon the loyalty loan, beyond what he was enabled to do by my private funds passing through his hands, and at the same time carried the dividends to my credit in his account, I may have been a gainer, to the amount of the dividend which arose from what he advanced, above what he might have in his hands of my private funds. This would be the state of the case in the most exaggerated view that could be taken of it, even by the most hostile imagination. The whole dividends upon the stock, during the time it was held, did not, in all, amount to two thousand pounds; and I think I need not add more on this point, to prove how unwarranted all the exaggerations have been, which have been propagated on the subject of interest.—I must also further state, that to the best of my belief there passed through Mr. Trotter's hands, arising from my salary and other private funds, not less, and probably more than seventy thousand pounds during the fourteen years he served under me in the navy pay office. Nor can it be reasonably contended, that on an account of the fluctuating nature I have described, a minute calculation of interest on every sum paid on either side would have naturally occurred to the mind of any man. No circumstance ever arose between Mr. Trotter and myself to call my attention to the subject, and indeed, from the general impression I had of the amount of the sums paid or received on my account, the balance was too inconsiderable to make the interest an object of importance.—The next point to be observed upon in the report of the committee is, what they state as their second head of inquiry, viz. the communication said to have been made to Mr. Pitt by Mr. Raikes. This is a conversation which is said to have taken place as far back as 1797; and certainly any recollection I have been able to revive on the subject, is rather derived from what Mr. Pitt has recently stated to me, than from any feeble traces of it which remained in my own mind. I can, therefore, in observing upon this subject, only state, that supposing Mr. Pitt to have represented to me the communication in the precise terms he received it (as to which I certainly cannot speak from any recollection of my own), I make no doubt I should have treated it as an idle rumour, conceiving that it originated in the permission I was aware I had given to Mr. Trotter to withdraw from the Bank, and place in the hands of Messrs. Coutts, the sums necessary in the regular course of the office, for payment of the small sums which are hourly called for, as well as to answer the claims of those who were possessed of assignments from the competent boards, consistent with my idea of the meaning of the act of parliament which I have already detailed at length. It was under this impression I should naturally have so answered Mr. Pitt's communication, and this would so satisfactorily have accounted to me for the report, that I should not have thought of making any farther inquiries on the subject.—The third head of inquiry referred to the committee, respects the loss sustained through Mr. Jellicoe. Being obliged to trouble the House so long on other points, it is certainly not my intention to detain you on this: and however ruinous to me it would have been if the loss had fallen upon me, I own it is the point of all others, on which my mind has been least anxious in the course of all these investigations. My fame, not my fortune, is the object of consideration with me. I have appeared before this House to vindicate the former; and as to the latter, the evidence is in your hands, and upon that you will form your opinion. When it is so clearly established, that the loss had occurred previous to my having any connexion with the treasurership of the navy, and that by no means in my power the loss could have been prevented or diminished, I should feel myself most grievously injured, if his majesty had not been advised to give me the relief I received. I am strongly impressed with a conviction, that if Mr. Jellicoe had lived, and had been in a situation to establish his beneficial interest in the invention for which the patent was granted, the public would, from its value, have been glad to have purchased the patent, at a higher price than the loss which has been sustained by his failure: and if I am right in that impression, it is a consolation at least to feel, that the public enjoys the benefit of the invention, as I understand it is in general use, without any compensation, except in so far as the loss in question can be considered as such.—Before concluding my observations on the report of your committee, it is necessary to advert to a circumstance not particularly dwelt upon by the committee, but which, from the tendency of some libellous publications that have been shown to me, seems to be enlarged upon with great assiduity, as affording grounds of dark and mysterious suspicion. I allude to the clause in the release produced by Mr. Trotter, relative to the destroying the vouchers of all pecuniary transactions between him and me. I have likewise heard, that the terms of this clause have even operated on the minds of candid and honourable men; and therefore I should be wanting in justice to myself and respect to them, if I were to pass it over without particular observation: and I am confident, whether you examine this charge upon the only evidence before you, or upon the glaring absurdity of the imputation itself, you will be convinced how perfectly groundless and injurious it is.—Let us first examine the evidence upon the subject, and it must immediately occur to your observation, that I was at the distance of four hundred miles when this release was prepared and transmitted to me for signature. I have no recollection whether it was brought to me by any man of business, or was transmitted in a blank cover to me from London. I think this last most probable, as it appears that I received it at my son's house in the country, and the witnesses who attest my signature are two of my servants. I am confident there was nothing to call my particular attention to this clause; and if there had, it does not occur to me now, that it would have struck me as any thing unusual, or meaning more than a clause of common form, expressive of an obligation on the parties not to keep in their possession any receipts, or other vouchers, which could be made the ground of a claim by the heirs of either party against the other. I do not, however, enlarge upon this observation; the fact certainly being, that the clause made no impression upon me of any kind, nor had I a recollection of its existence, till it was mentioned to me by a near relation of my own, who now hears me, and this after Mr. Trotter had been called before your committee.—The next remark on the evidence is, the almost certainty it affords, that I was never consulted on the insertion of such a clause, nor in a situation to be so. I have already informed you, that I was at the distance of four hundred miles from London, where the deed was prepared; and in addition to this circumstance, you have the most positive testimony from Mr. Trotter, that I was neither consulted, nor did I give any instructions upon it. He is asked expressly, “Did lord Melville give you any instructions for inserting the clause to destroy vouchers in the release before it was drawn up?”—He answers, “He did not.”—“Did you know of his having given such instructions to any other person?” “I do not.”—So stands Mr. Trotter's evidence, every word of which you must believe to be a falsehood, before you can give the smallest credit to the imputation of any such concert or conspiracy as has been surmised. The evidence does not rest here; for, in so far as negative evidence can go upon such a point, it is as strong as it can be in any case. Mr. Spottiswoode having unfortunately died within these few months, we are deprived of the benefit of his evidence; but you have that of his partner and of his son: and if I had given any special directions to Mr. Spottiswoode respecting this clause, it is most probable that those gentlemen would have known it from my correspondence, or learnt it from their conversations with Mr. Spottiswoode at the time. If, therefore, you are to proceed on the only evidence before you on this subject, it is impossible for you to believe the foul suspicions which are endeavoured to be reared upon this circumstance. But I maintain, farther, the whole charge is not more defective in point of evidence, than it is palpably absurd on the face of it. If it means any thing, it must mean that Mr. Trotter and I, being conscious of some foul transactions, had resolved to destroy the evidence of them. Allowing the premises, the conclusion is a fair one; but the mode of executing that intention would have been the most extraordinary that ever was imagined. If Mr. Trotter and myself had formed the plan of destroying such evidence, what prevented our meeting together any day we pleased, and actually carrying our purpose into execution? But it would have been a most extraordinary proceeding, not only to have informed Mr. Spottiswoode and his partners and clerks of our intention, but to have recorded that intention in a formal deed, unnecessarily and wantonly confessing our own guilt, and publishing to every person who saw the deed, the means we had taken to cover it. This observation acquires much additional force, when it is remarked, that the deed contains a clause of registration; and if either of the parties should ever have occasion to have recourse to it as an obligation against the other, it was necessary it should be recorded in the supreme court of the kingdom, and an extract of the deed, containing the clause itself, produced in the court, before which any suit might be brought, for enforcing the obligation it is supposed to contain. If, after combining all these particulars, whether arising out of the positive and negative evidence which is before you, or from a contemplation of the manifest absurdities in which the charge is involved, any person can still allow himself, for one moment, to harbour such a suspicion in his mind, I must confess myself totally unable to combat the malignity and prejudices of a mind so deeply tainted. But in order that no circumstance may be omitted which can give a shadow of truth to this supposed conspiracy, we are desired to attend to the circumstance of its bearing date soon after the commissioners of naval inquiry were appointed. But those who attend to this remark will immediately perceive, that it is liable to every observation on the absurdity of it which has been already adverted to. If the parties concerned were panic-struck by a dread of the commissioners of naval inquiry, was it not more natural for them to have had immediate recourse to the destruction of these dangerous documents of guilt, instead of entering into an obligation on the subject, liable to all objections and difficulties which have been pointed out? They surely had no ground to imagine, that this release would not be produced, as well as the documents meant to be destroyed; and I certainly, without any breach of charity, may be permitted to suppose, that not one of the vouchers meant to be destroyed could have been dwelt upon with more ingenuity and asperity than this release, which the parties are said to have framed, for the purpose of covering all the guilt which it is supposed those vouchers would have proved.—I shall only further observe, that if this deed was meant to impose any active obligation upon me, I have certainly been very remiss in the performance of it. On my leaving Somerset Place I destroyed many useless papers. I did the same when I left Wimbledon three years ago. I likewise did so when I left London two years after, and I have occasionally done the same during my subsequent residence in Scotland; but I cannot charge my memory with having ever destroyed any voucher, from a sense of the obligation contained in this release. As to the act of parliament appointing the commissioners of naval inquiry, I believe nobody imagined that any thing but the abuses in the dockyards were the real object of their appointment. The abuse now complained of in the practice of the navy pay-office had been rectified before the bill passed; and I could not suppose it was intended to remedy abuses which had been already corrected. At the time I was applied to for the release I was living comfortably and happily with my family and amongst my friends in Scotland, not conceiving that I ever should be the object of attack as treasurer of the navy; and perhaps I am not very far mistaken in thinking, that if I had continued in that secession from public situation, the attack would never have been directed against me. I am ashamed to have troubled the House at so great a length on this part of the evidence subjoined to the report, but for the reasons I began by stating, I thought it impossible for me to avoid it; and I have only further to observe, that there is not one word in the release of any intention or obligation to destroy existing books or accounts. I am led to make this remark, from observing in some of the proceedings before the committee, an inclination to connect with the release the non-existence of some of Mr.

Trotter's books and accounts. I have now finished the observations which I have been desirous of laying before the House; and in the course of them, I trust I have been successful in my resolution of refraining from any asperity of language, expressive of the feelings I may be supposed to possess on the subject of the proceedings which have been directed against me for these many months past. If I ever give vent to any such feelings, it will not be in this place. This is not such a conclusion as I had hoped for, and as I think I had a right to expect to a long and laborious life, devoted to the service of my country; but I feel within myself a strength and fortitude of mind adequate to every suffering I have undergone, or by which I may still be harassed. My enemies are mistaken, if they suppose that my spirits are easily to be broken down by any exertions in their power; but I wish I could, with equal truth, assure them, that I was as unassailable in other quarters; the lashes intended for me have indeed cruelly lacerated the feelings of many valuable friends, and of others more nearly and dearly connected with me, and perhaps these strokes are the harder, as some of them have come from hands whence they were least expected. I shall, however, avoid dwelling on such topics, and thank the House for the indulgence they have at present shewn to me. Neither shall I trouble you much on the motion I have heard to be intended after I retire. As no such motion has yet been made, I am at liberty to speak freely of it, and I think my understanding is not so blinded on the subject, as to mislead my judgment with regard to the very extraordinary circumstances under which such a motion would now be brought forward. If an impeachment had been proposed on the 8th of April last, it would, at least, have come as an entire question, when no part of the punishment would have preceded the trial. I know I may be told, that being removed from a high and important trust, and separated by the interposition of parliament from the councils of my sovereign, is no punishment. I will not stop to discuss such puerilities; but I shall beg only to ask, whether what has already taken place does not probably amount to as much, as even in the case of a conviction upon an impeachment would have taken place? A declaration of incapacity to serve his majesty in any place of confidence or trust, would, even under such circumstances, have been considered as a punishment not wanting in due severity. The House of Commons have not done this in terms, but they have done it in substance from what passed on the 8th of April and subsequent occasions.—You have gone further. To punishment you have added an attack upon the remains of my private fortune, by your direction to the attorney-general. It may be said, this is only reclaiming unlawful gains. Is that so clear a case? and does it not admit of some doubt, whether claims upon me would be confined solely to what I have received? But in any view, is it no additional punishment to be harassed, God knows how long, in a court of law, by an investigation of my whole private concerns for a great part of my life, without any documents or vouchers of any kind to aid my recollection in any one particular?—Indeed, when I take a review of these past proceedings, I can scarcely bring myself to believe that a motion of impeachment can be seriously intended. If any such intention has been entertained, it must have been conceived in a moment of sudden violence, forgetting all that has been already said or done upon this subject. Is it meant that a civil prosecution, under the direction of the attorney-general, is to be going on in one place, where I am to be examined upon oath, and the result of that examination communicated to the managers of the impeachment, to aid them, in their conduct of their criminal accusation in another place?—I am confirmed in my conviction, that an impeachment can never be seriously intended or persevered in, from attending to other circumstances, and in particular to that of the many illustrious names, members of another House of Parliament, which have been prefixed to requisitions for calling meetings, or have actually attended them in various parts of the country, expressing very violent and inflammatory opinions, founded on what they supposed to be the import of the resolutions passed by the House of Commons. In the case of an impeachment, these peers would be the judges of the person chiefly aimed at in those extrajudicial proceedings. It will scarcely be supposed, that no communications on this subject have passed between the great authorities in this House, who have taken a lead in its proceedings, and many of those noble lords to whom I have referred, and it is altogether inconsistent with a belief of such communications, to suppose that a motion of impeachment could be intended; for it appears incredible, that under such circumstances, those high and honourable characters could have been induced to take a part so totally irreconcilable with the judicial functions they might be called upon to perform. I believe I am accurate in the recollection of a circumstance which just occurs to me. It was on the occasion of the trials a few years ago at Maidstone, the circumstances of which will be easily recollected. A gentleman of the name of Raikes was challenged as a jurymen, and the challenge sustained, on account of his having been heard to utter intemperate language with regard to the objects of the trials; and this was considered as sufficient to disqualify him from sitting as a jurymen upon their trial. It has been rumoured, that other modes of trial have been thought of, in the shape of indictment. But on that subject, likewise, I am disposed to be incredulous: for I am sure, if any such measure had been in contemplation, no member of parliament would have been induced to take part in the harangues and resolutions of meetings of every description, and even in this metropolis, calculated to poison the public feelings, and prejudice the minds of those from whom the jurymen must be selected, if such criminal prosecution were to take place.—Upon this subject of prosecution by indictment, I must repeat the same observation I have already made on that of impeachment. It would be an attempt at double punishment. Fine or imprisonment are the usual modes of punishment in the case of a conviction on an indictment in a court of law; but is there any man, circumstanced as I have been in life, who would ever consider what has happened in consequence of the interposition of parliament, as a lesser punishment than that which I have stated as the usual result of a criminal conviction? This proposition may be distorted by any subterfuge which ingenuity may devise; but it is impossible seriously to maintain, that an attack upon me, in the form of a criminal prosecution, would not be an attempt to load me with reiterated punishment, and that, too, aggravated by the methods which have been already resorted to, for the purpose of poisoning and prejudicing the public mind.—These impressions are so strong and so convincing to my mind, that I feel secure no further proceedings will be taken against me, and therefore I should think myself guilty of an unnecessary waste of your time, if I were to insist upon them more at large. Perhaps I ought to be aware, that in cases of persons of rank, and who have filled high situations in government, their accusers may think themselves at liberty to pursue lines of conduct, which would be reckoned reprehensible and oppressive, if adopted in the case of a cottager or a peasant: but even that has its bounds, and there are certain fixed and unalterable principles, which cannot be departed from, in any case, without weakening in the minds of all ranks, that confidence in the pure administration of justice, which is essential to the happiness and safety of every inhabitant of a free country. I have already expressed my hopes, that nothing in the course of this day has fallen from me, in any degree disrespectful to the assembly which, with their indulgence, I have been permitted to address. But I equally trust, I cannot be liable to censure, if I have not, in any part of what I have said, shown a disposition to deprecate, by humiliating submission, any of the future evils which may be in contemplation against me. I have lived too long not to know, that popular clamour often dies away as rapidly as it is excited. A time may come, and I hope it is not far distant, when those who now pursue my conduct with such unexampled rigour, will perceive their error, and become conscious of the injustice I have suffered through misconception and misrepresentation. Circumstances not in my power with honour to control, debar me from the possibility of uttering what it would be undoubtedly my personal interest to disclose. I despair not even in my own time, to receive ample justice from my deluded country. This is, however, not the period to enter upon that theme. But I feel the consciousness of my own rectitude deeply implanted in my breast, and I shall descend to my grave with the heartfelt satisfaction, that however the shafts of severity and cruelty may be levelled against me at the present moment, the future impartial historian will be able to hand down my name, in the list of those who have strenuously, and I hope not ineffectually, exerted, during a long life of public service, their unremitting endeavours to promote the welfare and the dearest and most essential interests of their country.—His lordship then withdrew.

Mr. Whitbread then moved,* “That Henry lord viscount Melville be impeached of high Crimes and Misdemeanors.”

Mr. Nat. Bond moved as an amendment, “That his majesty’s attorney-general be directed to prosecute Henry lord viscount Melville for the several offences which appear, from the report of the commissioners of naval inquiry and that of the select committee of the House of Commons, to have been committed by the said Henry lord viscount Melville; and that the attorney-general be directed to stay proceedings in the civil suit, instituted by order of the House, against the said Henry lord viscount Melville.”

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the debate was, at three o’clock in the morning of Wednesday the 12th, adjourned.

The debate was resumed on Wednesday, and lasted until six o’clock the following morning (the 13th). The House then divided on the original motion:

This motion being therefore lost, the House again divided on Mr. Bond’s amendment for a criminal prosecution by the attorney-general. The numbers on this division were:

On Tuesday, June 25, Mr. Leycester moved, “That the House proceed by impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville for the several offences which appear, from the said reports, to have been committed by the said Henry lord viscount Melville; and that the attorney-general be directed to stay proceedings in the prosecution which he was directed by an order of this House, 13th June, to institute against him.”†

Mr. C. W. Wynn moved, that this debate be adjourned until Monday next; which motion was not seconded. After some debate,

Mr. Fox moved, “That the other orders of the day be now read;” on which motion the House divided:

The question for the impeachment was then carried without a division. After which it was ordered, “That Mr. Whitbread do go to the Lords; and at their bar, in the name of the House of Commons, and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, impeach Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint them, that this House will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same.”‡

* See in 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. 484, a short but animated discussion as to the mode of proceeding on Mr. Bond’s resolution.

† The debate on this motion is reported at large in 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. 568.

‡ In this introductory note, I have confined myself to a narrative of the proceedings in parliament which terminated in the impeachment of lord Melville. To have given even a mere abstract of the many important debates which took place in the House of Commons on these proceedings would have extended this trial to a most inconvenient length. I have therefore referred the reader to the very accurate reports contained in the fourth and fifth Volumes of Hansard’s Parliamentary Debates, instead of printing an imperfect abridgment of them in the text.

Proceedings on the Impeachment of Lord Viscount Melville preliminary to the Trial.

House of Lords, Wednesday, June 26, 1805.

A message being announced from the House of Commons, Mr. Whitbread introduced by Buxton, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Creevey, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. R. Thornton, Mr. Pelham, lord A. Hamilton, Mr. Curwen, Mr. Wm. Elliot, Mr. Bankes, sir W. W. Wynn, Mr. C. W. Wynn, Mr. Plumer, Mr. St. John, Mr. James Martin, Mr. Tierney, Mr. G. Johnstone, Mr. P. Moore, sir W. Elford, sir W. Burroughs, lord Marsham, and others. As soon as Mr. Whitbread reached the bar, he read the following message from the Commons, and delivered it into the hands of the lord chancellor: "My lords, in the name of the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in parliament assembled, I am commanded to impeach Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors. And I do hereby, in their name, and in the name and behalf of all the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, impeach the said Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors. And, I am further commanded to acquaint your lordships, that the House of Commons will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and make good the same."—The members of the House of Commons then withdrew. The message was read by the lord chancellor, and deposited on the table.

House of Commons, Wednesday, June 26, 1805.

On his return from the House of Lords, Mr. Whitbread acquainted this House, from the bar, that pursuant to the order of the House, he had gone to the bar of the House of Lords, and impeached Henry lord viscount Melville, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had also acquainted their lordships, that this House would, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against his lordship, and make good the same. Mr. Whitbread then moved, that a committee be appointed to prepare articles of impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville, which was ordered—On the motion of lord Temple, Mr. Whitbread was appointed one of the members of the committee; and on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, the following members were also appointed to the committee: viz. Mr. Fox, Mr. Grey, Mr. Sheridan, lord Henry Petty, lord Marsham, Mr. Giles, lord Folkstone, Mr. Raine, Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Creevey, Mr. Holland, Mr. Calcraft, Mr. Kinnaird, lord Porchester, lord Archibald Hamilton, Mr. C. Wynn, Mr. Jekyll, Mr. Morris, and lord Temple.—Mr. Whitbread then moved, that the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry, and the report of the select committee on said report, be referred to said committee, which was ordered. It was also ordered on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, that five of the committee be a quorum; that the committee do meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow in the Speaker's chamber; that they have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that they have power to adjourn from time to time and from place to place, and report from time to time, as it shall appear to them, to the House; and that they shall have power to sit during the sitting of parliament, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House.

House of Commons, Thursday, June 27.

On the motion of Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Sergeant Best was ordered to be added to the committee, to whom was entrusted the drawing up of the articles of impeachment against lord Melville.

House of Commons, Monday, July 1.

Mr. Whitbread moved, "That a committee be appointed to examine the Lords' Journals respecting the reports of the commissioners of public accounts and their proceedings thereon, and that the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville be the said committee."—Ordered.

House of Commons, Thursday, July 4.

Mr. Whitbread* brought up the report of the committee appointed to inspect the Lords' Journals in respect to their proceedings on the charges adduced against lord viscount Melville; which was ordered to lie on the table.—The hon. gentleman next brought up the report of the committee appointed to draw up the articles of impeachment voted by the House against lord viscount Melville; which being shortly read, pro forma, he then moved, in the first place, "that the report do lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the House;" which being agreed to, he moved, in order to give gentlemen time to examine the articles of charge after their being printed, "that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next."—Ordered.†

House of Commons, Monday, July 8.

Mr. Whitbread presented an additional article of impeachment, which article was read and agreed to: "That, after the said 10th day of September, 1796, when lord Melville was treasurer of the navy, the said Mr. Trotter did, with his lordship's connivance or authority, place large sums of money in the hands of Mr. Mark Sprot, after taking such sums out of the Bank of England for the purpose of private emolument and interest, or for purposes other than naval purposes." The above article was read, agreed to, and added to the others, and the whole ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Whitbread then moved, that a clause be ordered to be prepared for the purpose of reserving to the House of Commons the liberty of exhibiting any other articles against lord Melville that may afterwards occur to them to be necessary, and that the committee already appointed to prepare the impeachment be allowed to prepare the said clause; which was agreed to.—The hon. gentleman then brought up the report of the said committee, relative to said saving clause.—Their resolution was read, and agreed to, and the clause ordered to be added to the other articles.

House of Commons, Tuesday, July 9.

Mr. Whitbread moved, that the engrossed articles of impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville, be read; which were read accordingly; on which the hon. member moved that they be carried to the Lords.—Ordered.

It was then ordered, on the motion of earl Temple, that Mr. Whitbread do carry the articles to the Lords, which he instantly did, accompanied by many members; and on his return acquainted the House from the bar, that he had delivered the articles of impeachment, pursuant to the order of the House, at the bar of the House of Lords.

On the same day a motion was made “for leave to bring in a bill to provide, that the proceedings now pending before parliament for the impeachment of Henry lord viscount Melville shall not be discontinued notwithstanding any prorogation or dissolution of parliament.”—The motion was agreed to, and the committee of impeachment ordered to prepare and bring in the bill.

The bill (having undergone some modifications) passed the Commons on the 10th and the Lords on the 11th of July: it received the royal assent on the 12th, on which day the parliament was prorogued.

House of Lords, Tuesday, July 9.

Mr. Whitbread, accompanied by a great number of the members of the House of Commons, exhibited at the bar articles of impeachment in the name of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against Henry lord viscount Melville, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. The members of the House of Commons having withdrawn, the articles were read at the table by the clerk.

Lord Hawkesbury then moved, that a committee should be appointed to search the Journals for precedents of their lordships proceedings in cases of impeachment.—Ordered; and that all the Lords present be of the same committee. His lordship next moved, that a copy of the said articles be granted to Henry lord viscount Melville within one month; and that the said Henry lord viscount Melville should put in his answer on the second day of the next session of parliament.—Ordered.

House of Lords, Wednesday, January 22, 1806.

Lord Melville, (in pursuance of the order of last session, respecting the delivery of his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the Commons, on the second day of this session), entered the House, and presented his answer at the table, which was forthwith read by the clerk.*

A copy of the said answer was, on the motion of lord Walsingham, ordered to be communicated by message to the Commons; and also that a sufficient number of copies be printed for the use of their lordships. It was also ordered, that Messrs. Plumer, Adam, and Hobhouse, be assigned as counsel to lord Melville, for conducting his defence. A committee was likewise, on the motion of lord Walsingham, appointed to inquire into and report precedents of cases of impeachments for crimes and misdemeanors.

House of Commons, Wednesday, January 22.

Mr. Whitbread moved, that the resolution of the House, respecting the appointment of a committee of impeachment against lord Melville, of the 26th of June, 1805, and also the act of last session, for continuing the proceedings respecting that impeachment, notwithstanding any prorogation or dissolution of parliament, be read. The resolution and the act having been accordingly read, the hon. gentleman then moved, that the said committee do sit and proceed with the matters referred to them to-morrow morning, and that lord Robert Spencer be added to the said committee.—Ordered.

House of Commons, Friday, January 24.

A message from the Lords presented a copy of the answer delivered in by lord Melville to certain articles of impeachment preferred against him by the House of Commons. The answer was read from the chair, and on the motion of Mr. Whitbread it was ordered that it be referred to the committee for drawing up the impeachment; and that they do report their opinion on the same towards the further proceedings to be had in the impeachment.

House of Commons, Thursday, February 13.

On the motion of Mr. Creevey, the name of lord Henry Petty was added to the committee for managing the impeachment against lord viscount Melville.

House of Commons, Monday, February 24.

On the motion of Mr. Whitbread, earl Temple, lord R. Spencer, and Mr. Calcraft were added to the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment against lord viscount Melville.

House of Commons, Monday, March 3.

Mr. Whitbread, by desire of the committee of which he had been appointed chairman, gave notice that he should to-morrow make a special communication to the House on the subject of the impeachment of lord Melville.

* The answer is printed, together with the articles of impeachment, at the beginning of the trial, infra.

House of Commons, Tuesday, March 4.

Mr. Whitbread, from the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville, informed the House, that further matters had come to the knowledge of the said committee, in the course of the examinations taken before them, with respect to the conduct of the said lord viscount Melville, during the time that he held the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy; which information the committee think it of importance to communicate to the House, if the House should please to receive the same. It was thereupon ordered, "That the said committee have leave to report such further matters as shall have come to their knowledge in the course of the examinations taken before them with respect to the conduct of the said lord viscount Melville, during the time that he held the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy." Mr. Whitbread accordingly reported from the said committee such further matters as they appeared to them; and he read the report in his place, and afterwards delivered the same, together with an Appendix thereunto, in at the table, where the report was read. It was also ordered, that the said report be taken into further consideration upon Friday next, and be printed for the members of the House.*

House of Commons, Friday, March 7.†

Mr. Whitbread moved the order of the day for the House taking into consideration the report from the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment against lord Melville. He then moved, "that the committee which was appointed to draw up articles of impeachment against Henry lord viscount Melville do prepare a new article of impeachment on the matter contained in their last report, and report the same to the House."—Ordered.—After the lapse of a few minutes, Mr. Whitbread brought up a report from the committee containing an additional article‡ (the tenth). It was then, on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, ordered that the article be taken into consideration on Monday next.

House of Commons, Monday, March 10.

On the motion of Mr. Whitbread, the order of the day for taking into further consideration the report of the committee appointed to prepare another article of impeachment against lord Melville was read. He then moved, that the said article be one other of the articles of impeachment against lord viscount Melville. Ordered.—On the motion of Mr. Whitbread,

* A copy of the Report will be found in the Appendix to the trial, infra.

† Vide 6 Hans. Parl. Deb. 364.

‡ See it, with the others, at the beginning of the trial, infra.

it was also ordered, that a clause be prepared, saving liberty to the Commons to prefer any other articles of impeachment against lord viscount Melville, and that he be put to answer the same; and that the committee appointed to draw up the articles of impeachment, be appointed to draw up the said clause. The hon. gentleman immediately brought up a report from the committee, containing the above clause, which was read, agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, with the article of impeachment.

House of Lords, Monday, March 10.

Mr. Whitbread, accompanied by several members of the Commons, presented at the bar, in the name of the Commons of the United Kingdom, the farther article of impeachment against lord Melville. The article was read at the table; after which lord Auckland moved that it be referred to the committee appointed to search for precedents of the proceedings of that House on cases of impeachment. Ordered.

House of Lords, Wednesday, March 12.

Lord Walsingham presented the report of the committee appointed to search for precedents of the proceedings of the House in cases of impeachment; which was ordered to be printed. A short conversation ensued between lords Auckland and Eldon, respecting the additional article of impeachment against lord Melville, as to the manner in which that noble lord should be called upon to answer; which ended in an order to summon their lordships for to-morrow, in order to take the same into consideration.

House of Lords, Thursday, March 13.

On the motion of lord Auckland,* it was ordered, that a copy of the farther article of impeachment be communicated to lord Melville, and that he do put in his answer to the same on to-morrow fortnight. The farther article was also ordered to be printed.

House of Lords, Monday, March 24.

Lord Melville attended in his place, and delivered in his answer to the 10th article of impeachment. His lordship entered his protest against the unprecedented circumstances under which that additional article had been preferred; and declared that he did not think himself bound, either by the law or usage of parliament, to answer it. He should, however, plead Not Guilty to the charge generally.—The answer was then ordered to be sent to the Commons.

House of Commons, Monday, March 24.

A message from the Lords communicated to the House the answer of lord Melville to * See the short speech with which he introduced this motion in 6 Hans. Parl. Deb. 426.

a farther article of impeachment, being the 10th, exhibited against him by the Commons of the United Kingdom. On the motion of Mr. Whitbread the answer was read. The answer was then, on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, referred to the committee of impeachment, to consider thereof, and to report their opinion thereon to the House what was most proper to be done in order to further proceedings.

Mr. Whitbread then withdrew to the bar, and brought up the report of the committee on the answer of lord Melville in the form of a replication, averring that lord Melville was guilty of the crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him by that House, on behalf of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom, which they were ready to prove. The replication was agreed to, ordered to be engrossed, and then to be carried by Mr. Whitbread to the Lords, as the replication of the Commons. Mr. Whitbread then gave notice, that at a proper time he should move, that the House do attend the trial as a committee of the whole House.*

House of Lords, Tuesday, March 25.

Mr. Whitbread, and several other members of the Commons, presented at the bar, in the name of the Commons of the United Kingdom, a replication to the answer of Henry lord Melville, declaring that the said lord Melville is guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged against him in the articles of impeachment, and that the Commons are ready to prove the same. The replication having been read at the table, earl Fitzwilliam moved, that a day be appointed for the trial of Henry lord Melville; that the trial of the said lord Melville take place at the bar of the House on the 29th of April next, at eleven in the forenoon; and that a message be sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith, and require them to appoint a committee to manage the impeachment; all which motions were agreed to, after a few words from the earl of Radnor respecting a point of form.

House of Commons, Tuesday, March 25.

Mr. Whitbread reported that he had presented, in the House of Lords, the replication of the Commons to the answer delivered in by lord Melville to the last article of impeachment.

A message from the Lords stated, that their lordships had appointed Tuesday, the 29th of April, for the trial of lord viscount Melville, at the bar of their own House, and that arrangements would be made at the said bar for the convenience of the managers of the impeachment, &c. On the motion of Mr. Whitbread it was ordered, that managers should be appointed; and that those managers should consist of the committee appointed to prepare the articles of impeachment. Also that Joseph Kaye and John Winter, esqrs. should be appointed solicitors for the conduct of the said impeachment. Mr. Whitbread postponed till to-morrow his notice of a motion for the attendance of a committee of the whole House, upon the trial of lord Melville, in order to convenience an hon. gentleman (Mr. Saunders Dundas) who was particularly interested in this question, and who could not attend on this day.

House of Commons, Wednesday, March 26.

Mr. Whitbread moved, that the House be present at the trial of lord viscount Melville, as a committee of the whole House; which, after debate,* was agreed to, and a message ordered to communicate the same to the lords.

House of Lords, Thursday, March 27.

Mr. Whitbread, and several other members of the House of Commons, brought up a message, purporting that the House would attend the trial of lord viscount Melville, in a committee of the whole House, and requiring accommodation to be provided for them.

On the motion of lord Grenville,† an address was ordered to be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to give directions to prepare a place in Westminster-hall for the trial of lord viscount Melville.

On the same day Mr. Whitbread reported to the Commons, his having presented their message to the Lords.

House of Lords, Monday, April 14.

Lord Grenville moved, that the committee appointed to search the Journals for precedents of proceedings in cases of impeachment, be instructed to consider of the best mode of proceeding on the trial of lord viscount Melville, and do report thereon. Ordered.

House of Lords, Wednesday, April 16.

Lord Grenville moved, that a message be sent to the Commons, informing them that his majesty had been graciously pleased, in pursuance of an address of that House, to give directions for fitting up a place in Westminster-hall proper for the trial of lord viscount Melville. Ordered.

House of Lords, Friday, April 18.

Mr. Giles, and several other members of the Commons, brought up a message, containing a list of witnesses to be produced in the trial of lord Melville, and requesting that their lordships would take measures to summon such witnesses to attend on the 29th inst. and to bring with them such books, papers, and documents, as were marked against their respective names.—On the motion of lord Walsingham, a message was ordered to be sent to the Commons, containing a compliance with the above request. Lord Walsingham also moved, that Mr. Wyatt should attend the House on Monday, to state what progress had been made in the preparations for the trial of lord Melville, and when the fitting up of the court was likely to be finished. Ordered.—It was likewise ordered, that the lord chancellor should send letters to the peers of the blood royal, informing them of the day fixed for the trial of lord Melville, and requesting their attendance.

* The answer and replication will be found, with the other articles in the first day's proceedings, in the trial infra.

House of Lords, Monday, April 21.

Mr. Wyatt, surveyor-general of his majesty's works, appeared at the bar, and, in answer to the questions put to him by the lord chancellor, respecting the time when the preparations in Westminster-hall, for the court of parliament, sitting on the trial of lord Melville, would be completed; informed their lordships, that the same would be completely finished on Saturday next.—Mr. Whitbread presented a list of the names of certain additional witnesses, who were deemed necessary by the Commons to be examined on the trial of lord Melville, and requested their lordships would issue summonses for their attendance on Tuesday the 29th inst. After the messengers had withdrawn, their lordships ordered that a message be sent to the Commons, acquainting them, that their lordships would take the necessary steps to provide for the attendance of the witnesses mentioned.

Lord Walsingham read the report of the committee, to whom it was referred to search for precedents respecting their lordships' modes of proceeding on former cases of impeachment; which report was ordered to be taken into consideration on Wednesday.

Lord Auckland moved, that the House should proceed on the trial of lord Melville de die in diem, except from any special considerations they should deem it expedient to adjourn to the day after the morrow of the day on which the motion should be made.

The earl of Radnor moved, that the further consideration of this motion should also be postponed till Wednesday. The earl of Rosslyn and the lord chancellor opposed this motion, on the ground of its being unnecessary, it being already the general and decided opinion of the House, that they ought to proceed on the trial de die in diem. The motion was then put and negatived. On putting the original motion,

The earl of Radnor opposed it, conceiving that four days in the week were as many as the House could devote to the trial, consistently with that attention which they must necessarily pay to other business. He declined, however, proposing any alteration in the motion. The motion was then put and carried.

House of Lords, Tuesday, April 22.

On the motion of lord Auckland, the order for taking the report of the impeachment proceedings committee into consideration tomorrow, was discharged, and the report was ordered to be referred to the said committee for revision, &c.

House of Commons, Tuesday, April 22.

Mr. Whitbread moved, that a committee be appointed to view the court erected in Westminster-hall for the trial of lord viscount Melville, and to report what accommodation and convenience had been made for the members of the House when present at the said trial, and that the managers for conducting the impeachment should be the said committee; which motions were agreed to.—He moved also, that the order be read from the Journals, made on the 13th July, 1805, for the attorney-general to institute a prosecution against lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, and which was since suspended, should be read by the clerk, which was agreed to; and the order being then read, he moved that the said original order be discharged, which was agreed to accordingly.

House of Commons, Wednesday, April 23.

Mr. Giles reported, from the committee of impeachment, that they had inspected the place in the court prepared for the accommodation of the House, and found that there would be sufficient space for the accommodation of 500 members, besides the managers of the impeachment. He then moved a string of resolutions, being those usual in such cases: That the managers do first go out of the House before the other members: that after the Speaker has left the House, the members be called by the clerk, according to their counties: That no member do go out till his county be called: That no person but members do presume to sit in the places appointed for members in Westminster-hall: That the serjeant do take all such into custody: for the more convenient passage to the hall, that the constables do attend and keep the same clear. Ordered.—The form of procedure in the cases of Dr. Sacheverell and Mr. Hastings, being entered as read, Mr. Giles moved, that the same precedents be observed on the trial of lord Melville. Ordered.—It was also ordered, that no member do cross, pass through, or remain in the passage to the hall, during the procession to and from the trial: also, that a note, with the name of the right hon. C. Bathurst, be given to the serjeant at arms, and that he do order him to attend at said trial.

House of Lords, Thursday, April 24.

Lord Walsingham reported from the committee appointed to search for precedents of proceedings on impeachments, the ceremonial proposed to be observed on the trial of lord Melville, which had been recommended to them for alteration. His lordship having read the report,

The earl of Radnor moved to add to it, in conformity with three precedents of impeachments previous to that of Mr. Hastings, that the peers should remain in their places, and not depart from them during the trial on each day.—A long conversation ensued between lord Auckland, the earl of Radnor, lord Holland, lord Eldon, earl Stanhope, the earl of Westmeath, earl Spencer, the duke of Cumberland, the earl of Darnley, bishop of St. Asaph, and lord Ellenborough. Most of the above peers objected to the proposition, as tending by its strictness, to cause great inconvenience to the peers attending on the trial, whilst, at the same time, there was no doubt at all that that order would be preserved which the solemnity of such an occasion required.

The earl of Radnor conceived that the motion ought to be agreed to, in order to insure that strictness of order which was requisite on a solemn trial by impeachment, but in order to have a public attendance at its discussion, his lordship moved to adjourn the debate till the next day, and that the Lords be summoned. On this motion the House divided; Contents, 9; Not Contents, 15: Majority, 6. The report of the committee was then agreed to.

House of Commons, Thursday, April 24.

Ordered, on the motion of Mr. Whitbread, that a message be sent to the Lords, with a list of witnesses to be summoned to attend the trial of lord Melville; and Mr. Whitbread was ordered to bear the message to the Lords. It was afterwards ordered, that a note be given to the serjeant at arms, with the name of the right hon. George Tierney, and orders to serve him with notice to attend at all times the trial of lord Melville.

Some discussion as to various regulations to be adopted during the trial of lord Melville took place in the House of Lords, on Friday the 25th, and Monday the 28th of April. [Vide 6 Hans. Parl. Deb. 904, 927]. On the last-mentioned day the following order was made on the motion of William Lord Auckland; "that this House does strictly prohibit and forbid any publication whatever of the trial of lord Melville, during the continuance of the same; and that notices of such order be posted up on the doors of this House, and on the doors of Westminster-hall." *

The Lords having taken their places in the court, according to their degrees, the Lord Chancellor being upon the uppermost wool-pack, the Commons and their managers being also in the seats respectively prepared for them, Henry Lord Viscount Melville, having a stool placed for him within the bar, and his counsel, viz. Mr. Plumer, Mr. Adam, and

Mr. Hobhouse, standing near him at the bar, the serjeant at arms made proclamation as follows:—

Serjeant at Arms.—O, yes; O, yes; O, yes; Our Sovereign Lord the King doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the House is resumed.—Is it your lordships' pleasure that the Judges have leave to be covered?

Lords.—Ay, ay.

Then the Serjeant at Arms made proclamation as follows:—

Serjeant at Arms.—O, yes; O, yes; O, yes; whereas charges of high crimes and misdemeanors have been exhibited by the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the names of themselves, and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against Henry lord viscount Melville, all persons concerned are to take notice, that he now stands upon his trial, and they may come forth in order to make good the said charges.

Then the clerk, by direction of the Lord Chancellor, read the articles of impeachment—Lord Viscount Melville's answer—and the Replication of the House of Commons as follows:—

ARTICLES

Exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against Henry Lord Viscount Melville, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

WHEREAS the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy is an office of high trust and confidence; in the faithful and uncorrupt execution whereof, the subjects of this kingdom are most deeply interested: and whereas the ancient constitution of the said office of treasurer of the navy, and of other offices concerned in the receipt, disbursement, and control of the public money, having been found to be in some respects highly inexpedient in consequence of the increased expenditure of the country, did become the subject of serious deliberation in parliament: and whereas by an act of parliament made and passed in the twentieth year of the reign of his present majesty, and by several subsequent acts of parliament, for appointing and enabling commissioners to examine, take, and state the public accounts of this kingdom, and for other purposes therein mentioned, certain commissioners were constituted and appointed for examining, taking, and stating the accounts therein particularly mentioned; and also for examining and stating in what manner and at what times, the receipts, issues, and expenditures of the public monies were accounted for; and for considering of, and reporting by what means and methods the public accounts might in future be passed, and the accomptants compelled to pay the balances or monies due from them in a more expeditious, more effectual, and less expensive manner: and whereas the said commissioners did inquire into and report upon the matters by the said acts referred to their examination, and did discover and point out various abuses in many of the public offices entrusted with the receipt and expenditure of public money, and in particular in the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy; and did propose and recommend sundry good and wholesome provisions and regulations for the reformation of the same, and particularly for preventing the public money issued for navy services from coming into the possession and custody of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, or the officers or persons employed under him; for depriving him and them of all opportunity of using and misapplying the public money to private purposes, and thereby exposing the same to the risk of loss; for making the Bank of England the sole place of deposit for the same; for removing from thenceforward, all temptations and inducements to applications for more public money than was necessary for the public service; for preventing all unnecessary delay in passing the public accounts of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and in restoring to the public the balances remaining in his hands: and whereas the House of Commons having taken the reports of the said commissioners into consideration upon the nineteenth day of June one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, did (among other things) resolve, that some regulations ought to be adopted for the purpose of lessening and keeping down the balances which appeared to have usually been in the hands of the treasurer of the navy; and did further declare their opinion, that from thenceforward, the paymaster-general of his majesty's land forces, and the treasurer of the navy for the time being, should not apply any sum or sums of money imprested to them or either of them, to any purpose of advantage or interest to themselves, either directly or indirectly:

And whereas for the more effectually carrying into execution the said resolutions of the House of Commons, and for preventing all future abuse and misapplication of the public money issued for navy services, his majesty, by warrant under his royal sign manual, bearing date the twenty-second day of June one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, was most graciously pleased to augment the income of the right honourable Isaac Barré, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, and to add thereto the sum of two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds, that the said income might in future amount to four thousand pounds, which his majesty was then graciously pleased to grant to the said Isaac Barré, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments theretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of his majesty's navy; and whereas by letters patent, bearing date the nineteenth day of August one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, his majesty was graciously pleased to give and grant unto the right honourable Henry Dundas now lord viscount Melville, the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy royal and ships, and receiver-general of all sums of money appointed, or from time to time to be appointed and payable for the support, maintenance, and reparation of his majesty's navy royal and ships, for emptions and provisions appertaining to and necessary for the said navy and ships, and for wages, salaries of officers, servants, and other persons whatever, belonging to the said navy or ships, or any other matter or thing whatsoever, in any manner touching or concerning the navy royal or ships; and for the exercise and occupation of the said office, and for and in satisfaction of all wages and fees of three-pence of lawful money for every pound to be received and paid by the said Henry Dundas, by virtue of his said office, his majesty was further graciously pleased to give and grant unto him by the said letters patent, an annuity or yearly payment of two thousand pounds:

And whereas the said Henry lord viscount Melville represented, or caused to be represented, or it was represented to his majesty, that the said annuity or yearly payment of two thousand pounds, after deducting all charges, taxes, and expences thereon, would not produce to him the said Henry lord viscount Melville more than the sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds in each year, or thereabouts; whereupon his majesty, by warrant under his royal sign manual, bearing date the twenty-third day of October one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, was graciously pleased to declare that the income of the treasurer of the navy should be augmented with an additional allowance of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings and sixpence, in order to make, together with the said sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds, the said income to amount in future to the sum of four thousand pounds: and his majesty did thereby direct, authorize, and empower the said Henry lord viscount Melville to take and apply out of such monies as were in, or should come to his hands, or to the hands of his cashier, arisen or to arise by the sale of old naval stores, the said sum of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings and sixpence, which, together with the before-mentioned sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds would make the said sum of four thousand pounds, which his majesty was graciously pleased to grant him, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments theretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of the navy; the same to commence and be computed from the day of the date of the said letters patent, and to continue during his continuance in the said office: and his majesty did further direct, authorize, and empower the said Henry lord viscount Melville, in case the said additional allowance of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings and sixpence, together with the said several allowances before stated, should not produce in each year the nett sum of four thousand pounds, to charge the deficiency in the annual amount of monies disbursed by him for fees of divers natures; and whereas the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, under the said letters patent, from the said nineteenth day of August one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, until the tenth day of April one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three:

And whereas by letters patent, bearing date the fifth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, his majesty was graciously pleased again to give and grant unto the said Henry lord viscount Melville the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, in the same terms as in the said former letters patent of the nineteenth day of August one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two; and upon a similar representation made or caused to be made by the said Henry lord viscount Melville, or otherwise made to his majesty as that herein-before stated, his majesty was graciously pleased by warrant under his royal sign manual, bearing date the sixteenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, to augment the income of the said office of treasurer of the navy with an additional allowance of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings and sixpence, in order to make the annual income of the said office amount to the said sum of four thousand pounds; and which said income his majesty was thereby graciously pleased to grant to the said Henry lord viscount Melville, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments theretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of the navy, and to secure and provide for the due payment thereof in like manner as in the said former warrant of the twenty-third day of October one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two is provided:

And whereas the said Henry lord viscount Melville, under and by virtue of the said last-mentioned letters patent, held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, from the said fifth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, until the thirty-first day of May one thousand eight hundred:

And whereas on the seventeenth day of February one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, the House of Commons ordered that leave should be given to bring in a bill for better regulating the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and that (together with other members of the said House of Commons) Mr. Henry Dundas, now lord viscount Melville, should prepare and bring in the same; and in pursuance of the said order, the said Henry lord viscount Melville, on the twenty-ninth day of April one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, did present to the House of Commons a bill for better regulating the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy; and the said bill having passed the House of Commons, was, in pursuance of an order of that House, carried by the said Henry lord viscount Melville to the House of Lords; to which bill he (in the name of the House of Commons) desired the concurrence of their lordships.

And whereas the said bill, in the twenty-fifth year of his majesty's reign, passed into a law, intituled, "An Act for better regulating the office of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy;"—The first, third, fourth, and fifth sections whereof are as follows:

First section.—"Whereas it appears by the reports made by the commissioners appointed to examine, take, and state the public accounts of the kingdom, that regulations are necessary for better conducting the business in the department of the treasurer of his majesty's navy; be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the first day of July one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, in all memorials to be by him presented to the treasury for money for navy services, shall pray that such sum as he requires may be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England on his account, and shall transmit with each memorial a copy of the letter or letters from the commissioners of the navy, victualling, and sick and hurt boards, directing him to apply for such sum or sums; in which letter or letters the said commissioners shall, and they are hereby required and directed to specify for what particular service or services the said money is wanted, and shall also state the balances then in the hands of the treasurer of the navy under each head of service respectively; and the commissioners of his majesty's treasury for the time being, by their letter from time to time, shall direct the auditor of the exchequer to issue to the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, naming such treasurer for the time being, the sum for which such letter shall be drawn upon the unsatisfied order at the Exchequer, in favour of the said treasurer, for which the receipt of the cashier or cashiers of the said governor and company shall be a sufficient discharge; and all sums for which letters of the commissioners of his majesty's treasury shall be drawn, shall be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England in like manner as they have been heretofore issued to the treasurer of his majesty's navy; and all such monies to be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England shall be placed on an account or accounts to be raised in the books of the governor and company of the said Bank of England, and to be intituled, 'the account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy,' inserting the name of such treasurer for the time being, for the pay branch, cashiers' branch, and the victualling branch; and on receipt of all such monies at the Exchequer, the treasurer of the navy shall immediately certify to the commissioners of the navy, an account of the whole receipt under the respective heads of service, and shall also certify to the commissioners of the victualling and sick and hurt boards, the particular sums received and applicable to those services respectively."

Third section.—"And be it further enacted, that, from and after the first day of July one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, no money for the service of the navy shall be issued from his majesty's Exchequer to the treasurer of the navy, or shall be placed or directed to be placed in his hands or possession; but the same shall be issued and directed to be paid to the governor and company of the Bank of England, and to be placed to the accounts above-mentioned, according to the services for which it is craved and issued."

Fourth section.—"And be it enacted, that the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, by himself, or the person or persons in his office duly authorized by the said treasurer, from and after the first day of July one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, shall draw upon the governor and company of the Bank of England for all navy services whatever, and shall specify in each and every draft the head of service for which the same is drawn; and no draft of the said treasurer, or the person or persons authorized as aforesaid, shall be deemed a sufficient voucher to the said governor and company to the Bank of England, unless the same specifies the head of service for which it is drawn, and has been actually paid by the said governor and company of the Bank of England."

Fifth section.—"Provided always, that the monies to be issued unto the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, shall not be paid out of the Bank unless for navy services, and in pursuance of drafts to be drawn on the governor and company of the Bank of England, and signed by the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, or the person or persons authorized as aforesaid; in which drafts shall be specified the heads of service to which the sums therein mentioned are to be applied; and which drafts so drawn shall be sufficient authority to the Bank to pay such money to the persons mentioned in such drafts, or to the bearer of them."

And whereas the provisions contained in the said last-mentioned act of parliament were thereby directed to take place on the first day of July one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five: but the execution of the said act, with respect to the said Henry lord viscount Melville opening an account or accounts with the governor and company of the bank of England, as thereby directed, was postponed by him until the thirteenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, when the said Henry lord viscount Melville opened an account with the governor and Company of the Bank of England, intituled, "Right Honourable Henry Dundas, Act of Parliament New Account;" and which said account was continued by him until he quitted the said office on the thirty-first of May one thousand eight hundred, and was the only account kept by the said Henry lord viscount Melville as treasurer of his majesty's navy, with the governor and company of the Bank of England, under and in pursuance of the said act of parliament for regulating his said office:

And whereas on the tenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, he did constitute and appoint Alexander Trotter his paymaster; and the said Henry lord viscount Melville did, on the said tenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, duly authorize and empower the said Alexander Trotter to draw on the governor and company of the Bank of England, for and upon the account of him the said Henry lord viscount Melville as treasurer of his majesty's navy, all and every sum and sums of money that then were or should thereafter be wanted for the public services, under the care of payment of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, the said Alexander Trotter being particularly careful to specify on each and every draft the service for which the money shall be drawn:

And whereas it was the duty of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, during all the time he held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, to abstain from applying himself, and to prevent all persons acting under him from applying any part of the money issued from his majesty's Exchequer for navy services, to any purpose of advantage or interest to himself or themselves, either directly or indirectly, or to any other purposes than for navy services, and from deriving any profit or emolument therefrom: and from and after the passing of the said act of parliament of the twenty-fifth year of his majesty's reign, for better regulating the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, it was the duty of the said Henry lord viscount Melville to observe and pursue the provisions and directions of the said act of parliament; yet the said Henry lord viscount Melville, not satisfied with the ample revenue so provided for him as aforesaid, nor regarding the duty of his high and important office, or the express provisions of the said act of parliament, did, whilst he so held and enjoyed the said office, act and conduct himself fraudulently, corruptly, and illegally in the several instances herein set forth:

Article First.

That the said Henry lord viscount Melville whilst he held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, and previous to the said tenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, did take and receive from and out of the money imprested to him as treasurer of his majesty's navy, from his majesty's Exchequer, the sum of ten thousand pounds, or some other large sum or sums of money, and did fraudulently and illegally convert and apply the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes, and to other purposes than those of the public navy services of the kingdom, to which alone the same was lawfully applicable; and did continue such fraudulent and illegal conversion and application of the said sum or sums of money after the passing of the said act of parliament for the better regulating the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy: and the said Henry lord viscount Melville has declared, that he never would reveal the application of the said sum of ten thousand pounds, and in particular he did make such declaration in the House of Commons on the eleventh day of June one thousand eight hundred and five; and then and there added, that he felt himself bound by motives of public duty, as well as private honour and personal convenience, to conceal the same. All which conduct of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, was contrary to the duty of his said office, a breach of the high trust reposed in him, and a violation of the laws and statutes of this realm.

Article Second.

That the said Henry lord viscount Melville, disregarding the duties of his said office, and in breach and violation of the said act of parliament for better regulating the same, did, after the passing of the same act, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville continued to hold and enjoy the said office, connive at and permit and suffer the said Alexander Trotter, under and by virtue of the said authority so given to him by the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, illegally to draw, receive, and take, from the governor and company of the Bank of England, for other purposes than for immediate application to navy services, large sums of money from and out of the monies before then issued unto the said governor and company of the Bank of England on account of the said Henry lord viscount Melville as treasurer of his majesty's navy: and the said Henry lord viscount Melville did connive at and permit and suffer the said Alexander Trotter to place the last-mentioned sums of money, or a great part thereof, so illegally drawn, received, and taken by him from the governor and company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, in the hands of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and company, the private bankers of the said Alexander

Trotter, in his own name, and subject to his sole control and disposition: all which conduct of the said Henry lord viscount Melville was contrary to the duty of his said office, a breach of the high trust reposed in him, and a violation of the laws and statutes of the realm.

Article Third.

That after the passing of the said act of parliament for better regulating the office of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and after the said tenth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office, large sums of money were from time to time issued and paid to the governor and company of the Bank of England, and placed on an account raised in the books of the said governor and company with the said Henry lord viscount Melville, intituled, "Right Honorable Henry Dundas, Act of Parliament New Account:" and the said Alexander Trotter, under and by virtue of the said authority from the said Henry lord viscount Melville, did, from the said tenth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, during all the time the said Henry lord viscount Melville afterwards continued to hold and enjoy the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, draw upon the said governor and company of the Bank of England for and on account of the monies so issued and paid to them, and placed to the said account so raised in their books, with the said Henry lord viscount Melville, as such treasurer as aforesaid: and the said Alexander Trotter did receive and take large sums of money so drawn by him from the said governor and company of the Bank of England as aforesaid.

That the said Henry lord viscount Melville did, after the said tenth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, fraudulently and illegally permit and suffer the said Alexander Trotter to place many of the said sums of money so drawn, received and taken by him from the governor and company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, in the hands of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and company, the private bankers of the said Alexander Trotter, in his own name and at his own disposal: and the said Alexander Trotter did thereupon, with the privity, by the connivance, and with the permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, apply and use the said last-mentioned sums of money, or great part thereof, for purposes of private advantage or interest, profit, and emolument; and did place the said sums of money, or a great part thereof, in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and company, mixed with and undistinguished from the proper monies of the said Alexander Trotter, whereby the said last-mentioned sums of money were not only applied to and used for purposes of private advantage or interest, profit, and emolument, and for purposes other than navy services; but were also exposed to great risk of loss, and were withdrawn from the control and disposition of the treasurer of his majesty's navy: and the said Henry lord viscount Melville, by so conniving at and permitting and suffering the public money to be withdrawn from the Bank of England, and used and applied in manner aforesaid, acted in breach of the great trust and confidence reposed in him, in violation of the said act of parliament made for regulating his said office, contrary to his duty and against the laws of this realm, and to the evil example of all persons entrusted in the great departments of the public service, with any control over the application and expenditure of the public money.

Article Fourth.

That after the said tenth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, the said Alexander Trotter did, with the privity, or by the connivance and permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, place sums of money, issued from his majesty's Exchequer unto the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and drawn, received, and taken, by him the said Alexander Trotter, from the governor and company of the Bank of England, in the hands of Mark Sprott and other persons, and did apply and use the same for purposes of private advantage or interest, profit and emolument, or for purposes other than navy services.

Article Fifth.

That after the said tenth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, he the said Henry lord viscount Melville did fraudulently and illegally, for the purpose of advantage or interest to himself, or for acquiring or obtaining profit or emolument therefrom, or for some other corrupt and illegal purposes, and for purposes other than navy services, take and receive from the public money placed in his name at the Bank of England, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, the sum of ten thousand pounds, or some other large sum or sums of money, and did fraudulently and illegally convert and apply the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes: all which conduct of the said Henry lord viscount Melville was contrary to the duty of his said office, a breach of the high trust reposed in him, and a violation of the laws and statutes of this realm, and to the like evil example as aforesaid.

Article Sixth.

That after the said tenth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and whilst the said Alexander Trotter so continued the paymaster of the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and with such privity, connivance, and permission as aforesaid, so applied and used the said sums of money, or great part thereof, for purposes of private advantage, profit, and emolument as aforesaid, the said Henry lord viscount Melville fraudulently concealing the illegal use and application of the same, did procure, obtain, and receive from the said Alexander Trotter, advances of several large sums of money, which were made to him the said Henry lord viscount Melville, by the said Alexander Trotter, in part from money so as aforesaid illegally drawn by him the said Alexander Trotter, from the governor and company of the Bank of England, and in part from sums of money so placed by the said Alexander Trotter in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and company as aforesaid, when mixed with and undistinguished from the proper monies of the said Alexander Trotter:

That during the time the said Alexander Trotter held and enjoyed the said office of paymaster to the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy as aforesaid, he the said Alexander Trotter kept with the said Henry lord viscount Melville an account current, entered in certain books of account, containing entries of all the sums paid and received by the said Alexander Trotter on the account of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and by agreement between the said Henry lord viscount Melville and the said Alexander Trotter, bearing date the eighteenth and twenty-third days of February, one thousand eight hundred and three, it is stated that they had either mutually delivered up to each other, or resolved and agreed mutually to cancel or destroy, all the vouchers or other memorandums and writings that at any time heretofore might have existed, passed, or been interchanged between them relative to the said accounts, and the different items and articles of which the said accounts were composed or consisted: and the said books of account, containing the said account current, together with all vouchers, or other memorandums and writings, in the possession of the said Alexander Trotter, and also of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, relative thereto, were burnt and destroyed by the said Henry lord viscount Melville and Alexander Trotter: and the said stipulation contained in the said agreement for the said Henry lord viscount Melville and Alexander Trotter mutually delivering up to each other, or for mutually cancelling and destroying all the said vouchers, or other memorandums or writings relative to the said account, was so entered into; and the said books of account, vouchers, memorandums, and writings, were so burnt and destroyed, with a view to conceal and prevent the discovery of the several advances of money made by the said Alexander Trotter to the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and of the several accounts or considerations for or upon which the same were so advanced.

Article Seventh.

That amongst other advances of money so as aforesaid obtained and received by the said Henry lord viscount Melville, from the said Alexander Trotter, the said Henry lord viscount Melville did procure, obtain, and receive from the said Alexander Trotter, a sum of twenty-two thousand pounds, or some other large sum or sums of money, advanced by the said Alexander Trotter to the said Henry lord viscount Melville, without interest; part whereof was so advanced exclusively from public money so as aforesaid illegally drawn from the governor and company of the Bank of England by the said Alexander Trotter: and other part whereof was advanced from the said mixed fund, composed as well of public money so as aforesaid illegally drawn by the said Alexander Trotter from the governor and company of the Bank of England, and placed by him in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and company as aforesaid, as of the proper monies of the said Alexander Trotter, in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and company, which had been mixed therewith, and remained undistinguished therefrom; and for the purpose of more effectually concealing the said advances of money, the said books of account, vouchers, memorandums, and writings, were so as aforesaid burnt and destroyed.

Article Eighth.

That amongst other advances of money so as aforesaid obtained and received by the said Henry lord viscount Melville from the said Alexander Trotter, the said Henry lord viscount Melville did obtain and receive a sum of twenty-two thousand pounds, or some other large sum or sums of money advanced to him by the said Alexander Trotter: and for which it has been alleged by the said Henry lord viscount Melville, that he was to pay interest; and for the purpose of more effectually concealing the said last-mentioned advances of money, the said books of account, vouchers, memorandums, and writings, were so as aforesaid burnt and destroyed.

Article Ninth.

That during all or great part of the time the said Alexander Trotter held and enjoyed the said office of paymaster to the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy as aforesaid, he the said Alexander Trotter did gratuitously, and without salary or other pecuniary compensation, act in and transact the private business of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, as his agent, and was from time to time in advance for the said Henry lord viscount Melville in that respect to the amount of from ten thousand to twenty thousand pounds, or to some other great amount, and which advances were taken from the said sums of money so placed by the said Alexander Trotter in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and company, consisting in part of public money, drawn by him from the governor and company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, and in part of his own private monies mixed therewith, and undistinguished therefrom as aforesaid; by means whereof the said Henry lord viscount Melville did derive benefit and advantage from the aforesaid illegal acts of the said Alexander Trotter:

And the said Alexander Trotter did so gratuitously, and without salary, act in and transact the private business of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and make him such advances of money as aforesaid, in consideration of the said Henry lord viscount Melville conniving at and permitting and suffering the said Alexander Trotter so as aforesaid to apply and make use of the said sums of public money so drawn by him from the Bank of England, and applied and appropriated for purposes of private advantage, or interest, profit, and emolument as aforesaid: and the said Alexander Trotter would not have been, and was well known to the said Henry lord viscount Melville not to have been able to make such advances of money to the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, otherwise than from and by means of the said sums of public money so drawn by the said Alexander Trotter from the Bank of England, with the privity, connivance, and permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and applied by the said Alexander Trotter for purposes of private advantage, interest, profit, and emolument: all which proceedings and conduct of the said Henry lord viscount Melville were contrary to the duty of his said office, in breach of the great trust reposed in him, and in gross violation of the laws and statutes of this realm: and by all and every one of the aforesaid acts done and committed by him the said Henry lord viscount Melville, he was and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said knights, citizens, and burgesses, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any times hereafter any further articles, or further accusations or impeachment against the said Henry lord viscount Melville: and also of replying to the answers which he shall make unto the said articles or any of them, and of offering proof of all and every of the aforesaid articles, and of all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said Henry lord viscount Melville may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as are agreeable to law and justice.

The ANSWER of Henry Lord Viscount Melville to the Articles exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the Name of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in maintenance of their Impeachment against him for high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The said viscount, saving to himself all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of the said articles in point of law; and of not being prejudiced by any want of form in this his answer; and also all rights and privileges belonging to him as one of the peers of this realm; for answer to the said articles, saith, that he is in nowise guilty of all or any of the supposed crimes or misdemeanors, of what nature, kind or quality soever, by the said articles charged upon him, in manner and form as in and by the said articles is supposed; and this he is ready to prove as this right honourable House shall award; and he humbly submitteth himself, and the justice of his cause, to this right honourable House; and prayeth that he may be discharged of the premises, and be hence dismissed and acquitted of all the matters untruly alleged against him.

MELVILLE.

A further ARTICLE (being the Tenth) exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against Henry Lord Viscount Melville, in maintenance of their Impeachment against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Article Tenth.

That Henry lord viscount Melville, after his majesty had by letters patent, bearing date the nineteenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, given and granted unto him the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, did on divers days and times between that day and the fifth day of January one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, and also on divers days and times between the said fifth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, and the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, take and receive from and out of the monies from time to time issued or paid to him as treasurer, or as ex-treasurer of his majesty's navy, from his majesty's Exchequer or some other sources, for naval services, divers large sums of money, amounting together to a large sum, to wit, twenty-seven thousand pounds, or thereabouts, and did fraudulently and illegally convert and apply the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes, and to other purposes than those of the public naval services of this kingdom, to which alone the same was lawfully applicable; and did continue the said fraudulent and illegal conversion and application of divers of the said sums of money, after the passing of the act of parliament, for the better regulating the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy.

And the said knights, citizens, and burgesses, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any times hereafter any further articles or further accusations of impeachment against the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and also of replying to the answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof of the aforesaid article, and of all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said Henry lord viscount Melville may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as are agreeable to law and justice.

The ANSWER of Henry Lord Viscount Melville to the further Article (being the Tenth), exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in maintenance of their Impeachment against him for High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The said viscount, being called upon to answer the said further article, under circumstances of which no precedent is to be found in the Journals of parliament, feels it incumbent upon him to enter his humble protest against being bound by the law and custom of parliament, or the laws of the realm, to answer such further article; nevertheless the said viscount, confiding in the goodness of his cause, and the justice of this right honourable House, and saving to himself all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of the said further article in point of law, and of not being prejudiced by any want of form in this his answer; and also all rights and privileges belonging to him as one of the peers of this realm; for answer to the said further article saith, that he is in nowise guilty of the supposed crimes or misdemeanors by the said article charged upon him, in manner and form as by the same is supposed; and this he is ready to prove as this right honourable House shall award: and he humbly submitteth himself, and the justice of his cause, to this right honourable House, and prayeth that he may be discharged of the premises, and be hence dismissed and acquitted of all the matters by the said further article untruly alleged against him.

MELVILLE.

THE REPLICATION.

The Commons having considered the answers of Henry lord viscount Melville to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the knights, citizens, and burgesses in parliament assembled, in the names of themselves and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for replication to the said answers, do say,

That the said Henry lord viscount Melville is guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors mentioned in the said articles, and that the said Commons are ready to prove the same.

Lord Chancellor.—My lords, the distance of this place from the bar is so great, that I must desire your lordships' leave to go down to the table for the convenience of hearing.

Lords.—Ay, ay.

Then his lordship removed to the table.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I am commanded to open to your lordships at once, all the articles of impeachment exhibited by the Commons of the United Kingdom against Henry lord viscount Melville, the defendant within your bar. And, my lords, this course is adopted as much, because (as your lordships will have perceived), the matters of charge are in themselves difficult of separation; as because those to whom the management of this cause has been entrusted, have determined that upon them shall rest no imputation whatever of delay.

My lords, I fear it will be necessary for me to enter into a long and fatiguing detail of perplexed accounts; to give a narrative of dry facts, which from their very notoriety are become uninteresting; and which are susceptible of no embellishment, even if he who addresses you, were ambitious of bestowing it upon them. But, my lords, I will neither delay nor offend your lordships by asking for your patient attention to the hearing of this case; because patience is indispensably necessary to the due administration of justice, and I know that I am now pleading before one of the most august tribunals in which justice has ever presided upon earth.—Neither will I waste much of your time in entreating your indulgence for the manifest deficiencies of him who addresses you. It shall be my endeavour to be perspicuous, and as concise as can be consistently with that perspicuity. My lords I have undertaken the task; and it shall be executed to the best of my ability. Not that I am insensible either to the situation in which I stand, or to the circumstances which surround me. I know that I fill a post, which has been but rarely occupied in the annals of our history. I know that when it has been filled, it has been filled by the most eminent of the past and present day. I am duly impressed with the magnificence of this scene. I know the strength, and remaining influence of the accused: and, above all, I am perfectly acquainted with the ability and great legal acquirements of those who are counsel for him, and therefore arrayed against us.—My lords, I know that, added to the common attainments which so extensive a knowledge and practice in their profession must have given them, they have peculiar experience in the sort of trial upon which we are now proceeding. For it so happens that they have both been engaged upon a trial of this nature:*

* The Impeachment of Warren Hastings.

one has acted in support of, and the other against, a prosecution by impeachment. But, my lords, I will confess to you, that I am far from being appalled by that which I have stated; and if there were any thing of native vigor or energy in my mind, these are the circumstances which would call it forth.

My lords, I feel some gratification (not unmixed with the strongest emotions of anxiety and alarm, but neither unjust nor ungenerous, I trust) in the selection which has been made. I feel the weight of the cause which I have undertaken as it respects the public and the accused. But, my lords, when I look back to the day, the memorable day, on which the seeds of this trial were sown, I own I am proud that this hour is arrived; and more especially as we, the Commons, have an opportunity of knowing that by a singular felicity, when it was found the charges which had been urged against the noble viscount must be brought to an issue; this is the court before which, and your bar is the place where, the dearest friends and connexions of the noble defendant, by preference, chose that he should be tried.—My lords, I exult in the splendor and publicity of the justice of my country. Nay, I think there is great cause to rejoice in the strength of the noble viscount, and in the powers of those who defend him; because, as it must be a most painful task for any just and generous mind, to plead against a weak, undefended, and defenceless wretch; and a just and generous tongue would falter in the execution of such an office; seeing what we now see before us, it becomes our duty to urge home every charge we feel to be true; for we know that no mistake of ours can go uncorrected, and we know that your lordships will allow, and that the learned counsel will take, every fair advantage for the noble defendant.

But, my lords, I trust, that whatever ardor I may feel to bring to an issue honourable to the Commons of the United Kingdom, that charge which they have exhibited, I shall not be betrayed into any intemperance of expression. My lords, truth delights in the language of temperance; and she makes her most forcible appeal in the accents of moderation: and I may be believed when I say, that I am as anxious to avoid the infliction of unnecessary wounds upon the noble defendant himself, much more upon those who are most near and dear to him, as I am eager to obtain a legal conviction upon that which I know to be moral guilt.

Neither, my lords, will I sin in the opposite extreme. I will not be betrayed, by an affectation of candor, into a dereliction of duty.—I will speak only for that I love—I will speak for justice. If the party accused have done so, as we charge, his fault is double; for he came in upon reformation, and having discovered the abuses of others. This I would say unto you if I were to die this hour, faults by mistaking—God forbid! that you should be harsh in censuring them; but errors that are wilful, spare them not.

My lords, the preamble to the articles of the Commons commences with a proposition so self-evident, that I need not dwell upon it. It commences by telling you, that the office of treasurer of the navy is one of great trust and importance; in the due execution of which the subjects of this realm are peculiarly interested.—I need not dwell upon that with your lordships. That all the great offices of this country should be duly and justly administered, and that all the great officers filling those situations should be men of high honor, is a thing so evident, that I need not say one word about it: excepting this, that if there be any office under the Crown which requires more peculiarly a just and upright administration, it is that of treasurer of the navy: because it is an office, as has been reported to the House of Commons, which requires no pains or trouble whatever in the execution of it.

Neither, my lords, upon the ancient constitution of the office will it be necessary for me to detain you long. Your lordships are all well acquainted with the origin and progress of it. That it was founded in the latter end of the century before the last; that a certain stipend was allowed to the person who executed it; that there was a fixed salary originally granted, in lieu of all fees and gratuities; that in the course of the administration of the office, large sums of public money passed through the hands of the person who was treasurer of the navy, as a banker, and not as an accountant; that by degrees use was made, by the persons exercising the office of treasurer, of the money that passed through their hands; and although it was never legal so to use it, yet that, down to a certain period, uninterrupted custom had rendered it irreproachable in those who exercised that office to take advantage of their situation, and to make profit of the public money.

My lords, at the close of the American war, when the expences of the country had risen to a great height, when it was necessary to adopt plans of economy and reform, and when there existed in the House of Commons spirits determined to inquire into the true situation of the country, a commission was instituted by act of parliament, to ascertain what had been the mode of expending the public money; what balances it would be right to call for, and what prospective enactments would be necessary for the due administration of the public treasure. These commissioners (one* of whom is now a manager for the Commons) executed the trust reposed in them with diligence and ability. They made a variety of reports; and, among others, a special report on the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy. Among other things, they stated the balances that had remained in the hands of the ex-treasurers of the navy; and advised that regulations should be made to prevent such accumulations in future; as well as to remove the temptations from succeeding treasurers, to do that which they complained their predecessors had done. In consequence of this advice of the commissioners, certain resolutions were entered into by the House of Commons, with which it is necessary that I should trouble your lordships at length.

On the 18th of June, 1782, it was resolved, in a committee of the whole House, "That it was the opinion of that committee, that certain regulations ought to be adopted for the purpose of lessening and keeping down the balances of public money which appear to have been usually in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, and that it would be beneficial to the public if the first and other clerks in the different branches belonging to the said office were paid by fixed and permanent salaries, in lieu of all fees, gratuities, or perquisites whatever." And it was further resolved, "That it was the opinion of that committee, that from thenceforward the paymaster-general of his majesty's land forces, and the treasurer of the navy for the time being, should not apply any sum or sums of money impressed to them, or either of them, to any purpose of advantage or interest to themselves, either directly or indirectly."

My lords, I say that a new era was then created in the office of treasurer of the navy; that, from the moment that resolution was passed in the House of Commons, the illegality of the proceedings which had been before permitted was recognized, and that the person who thereafter should derive either interest or advantage from the use of public money, either directly or indirectly, was impeachable at the bar of your lordships House.

My lords, Mr. Barré,—a man who will be always recollected in this country with respect,—held the office of treasurer of the navy at the time these resolutions were passed. In order to make them, if possible, more binding on Mr. Barré, immediately after they were passed, an increase of salary was granted, in lieu of all those allowed, but not legal, perquisites which other treasurers had enjoyed, and it was made 4,000*l.* a year. How did Mr. Barré interpret this resolution? He, never before, I believe, but certainly never afterwards, made the slightest profit or advantage of the public money.

Mr. Barré had the money belonging to his office invariably deposited in the Bank of England. But Mr. Barré even after those resolutions were passed, was not bound to deposit his money in the Bank of England; although he was bound not to derive any interest or advantage from it whatever.

Now, with regard to the custom of the office, previous to and at the time Mr. Barré first held it. Although the treasurers had, probably, almost from the earliest time, made use of the public money to their own benefit and advantage; still the usual place of deposit of the money issued for the service of the navy was the Bank of England. I have not found a single instance, where any treasurer of the navy, has lent to any private individual any part of the public money; except that of the noble defendant within the bar; not even those who were treasurers of the navy before the resolutions of the House of Commons were passed.

My lords, when Mr. Barré quitted the office of treasurer of the navy, the noble defendant, who had some years before begun the course of his public life, and had been attached to lord North during his administration, down to the very close of it; connected himself with that prodigy of talents and eloquence, whose sun was just then beginning to rise, which has now prematurely set, carrying with him the admiration of many, the regret of multitudes, the universal acknowledgement from all, that as to personal political purity, he was untainted. Under the auspices of Mr. Pitt, the noble defendant succeeded Mr. Barré in the office of treasurer of the navy; and he was bound, if any thing could have bound him, by the same obligation which bound Mr. Barré, to the correct and just administration of his office.

My lords, the noble defendant, at the time he came into the office, appointed Mr. Douglas his paymaster.—A gentleman who had exercised the same office under several treasurers of the navy, for a succession of almost eighteen years, with a very short interruption under Mr. Barré. It may be material here to observe, that if the representations and interest of the defendant could have succeeded with Mr. Barré, or if he had had any claim upon him whatever, we know that the defendant had so good an opinion, at so early a time, of Mr. Douglas, that he would have taken pains to recommend him to Mr. Barré as his paymaster.

My lords, we charge, in the first article of the impeachment, that the noble defendant, during the time that Mr. Douglas was his paymaster, and previous to an act of parliament, to which I shall soon have occasion to call the attention of your lordships, did, in breach of his duty, possess himself of a certain sum of public money. My lords, I beg your lordships here to consider the situation in which the Commons have stood, with regard to the articles they have exhibited to your lordships.—At the time they were exhibited, the committee appointed to prepare those articles, were not in possession of great part of the evidence which I shall now have the honor to open to your lordships.—We drew the charges as it were in the dark; but framed them in such a manner as that the evidence might be applied to some of the articles, or rather some parts of the charge, which we have adduced against the noble defendant. With regard to the evidence also, I beg your lordships to consider the difficulties we have had to encounter.—That the lapse of time from the date of the crimes which we charge upon the noble defendant, in the first article, is no less than twenty-four years; that many of the actors in these scenes have long since slept in their graves; that much of the written evidence, which we ought to have been able to collect, has been purposely destroyed or put out of the way; that much has been accidentally lost, and that we are driven to living witnesses, who were his accomplices, in order to establish before your lordships the guilt of the person whom we accuse. But our difficulties are I trust, surmounted: and that we shall be able to lead your lordships, in the outset, indeed by a circuitous path, by small steps, but every one of which shall bear you; afterwards by a more plain and open road, to an eminence, from whence you shall see, with one glance of the eye, all the transactions of the noble defendant during the course of eighteen years: and the result shall be, to establish in your minds an irresistible conviction of his guilt.

My lords, if we have conquered our difficulties, we cannot however conquer our feelings; and it is a most painful task which I am now about to undertake. For my lords, your lordships perhaps may know,—if not, we know, and we shall prove, that in the course of the last spring, the defendant did, in a moment of forgetfulness, write a letter, addressed to the commissioners of naval inquiry; which letter was, by motion, laid upon the table of the House of Commons; which letter does in substance contain a denial that, during the paymastership of Mr. Douglas, he made either interest or advantage of the public money. The noble defendant is a man of sense and education; he is elevated, by the favor of his majesty, to a situation in which he passes sentence, in this House, as a judge, even in cases of life and death, upon his honor: yet, my lords, that noble lord, in a moment of forgetfulness, has said, that he never did that, which we undertake to prove he did. He has said it, and subscribed his name to the assertion, and added, that he was ready to confirm it by the solemn sanction of an oath.

My lords, is it not then a painful duty that I have to execute? and could any thing but a sense of duty overcome the feelings with which I must be actuated at this moment?

My lords, I charge that the noble defendant took this money, and used it for his own advantage. Your lordships know that I am now adverting to the first article, which states that lord Melville had possession of a certain sum of 10,000*l*. Now I refer your lordships to the tenth article; for it is necessary that we should take those two articles together. That 10,000*l*. as your lordships will find hereafter, being involved in the 27,000*l*. which is charged in the tenth article, as I shall explain to your lordships presently.

First, however, upon the first article itself, —How are the Commons prepared to prove that article? and what is the evidence that is to be adduced to you in support of it?—Why, my lords, no less than a confession which I heard made by the defendant himself in the House of Commons; where he avowed that he had taken 10,000*l.* of the public money.—He at the same time asserted that he had not used it to any purposes of private profit or advantage: but he also told the House of Commons, that he was determined never to reveal to any human being what the application of that 10,000*l.* was. These expressions, uttered in the face of the House of Commons, may now, perhaps, be to be repeated in the face of your lordships and his country—that, I say, was an impeachable offence:—neither he, nor any man breathing, has a right to set himself above the law. There is no law which could authorize the payment of that money. He tells you he did it illegally; he tells you he did it for your benefit; and yet he will not tell you to whom, or for what service he paid it.

I was apprehensive till within a very short time of the moment in which I am addressing your lordships, that we should be obliged to go into a very elaborate and detailed proof relative to this 10,000*l.*; but I am happy to inform you, that a circumstance has come to my knowledge within a very few hours, which I trust will cut short our proceedings. My lords, while we who are the managers, have been toiling and labouring in search of proof, all hands engaged, working out our course, and scarcely sure that we had weathered the cape; the learned counsel, who, as may well be imagined, can sail nearer the wind than we can, had got a shorter cut to the haven to which we wished to go.—My lords, I will take advantage of their chart.—They have made a discovery; and that, which to prove we thought would take a considerable time, will now come within a few short words.—My lords, we know that, within these two or three days, the receipt of a person for a sum of 10,000*l.* which was paid by the noble defendant to that person, was in the possession of his counsel.—Is this the 10,000*l.* that he acknowledged? if it is, I hope that now, at least, he is not actuated by those motives for concealment which he professed last year; and that neither public duty, private honour, nor personal convenience, will interfere with his exposing to you the paper which contains the whole transaction.

My lords, as to public duty; the time is long passed. There might have been motives for concealment: but public duty cannot be brought as a plea, why the noble lord should not now tell you the truth. Besides, who is it that demands the explanation?—Why, the public: and if he has done a duty towards that public, let it be known. He may then be acquitted of the charge, and there be an end of the matter. As to private honour; I strongly suspect that the name to be found to this receipt, is that of one * who has been long since dead; who was engaged in large mercantile transactions in this country, and whose affairs were such as ultimately to be exposed to a commission of bankruptcy. Private honour therefore cannot interfere to prevent the revelation. And as to personal convenience; it will be most convenient that his counsel should be able to produce to you a paper, which, if it carries upon the face of it a justification of the conduct of their client, will be the means of his acquittal on this charge. Therefore, neither public duty, private honour, nor personal convenience, can interfere with its production; but justice requires it should be produced.

My lords, we not only charge that the noble lord was possessed of this sum of 10,000*l.*, but we charge also that it continued in his possession after another change had taken place in the navy pay-office, and contrary to the provisions of an act of parliament. We know, not only that he confessed it in the House of Commons, which confession I heard,—not only that he made an undisguised confession of it there, but that he confessed it to a person whom I must now name for the first time to your lordships, Mr. Alexander Trotter. We know, that soon after he had appointed Mr. Trotter paymaster of the navy, he confessed to him that he at that time had this sum in his possession. It will be proved, then, by his own confession before the House of Commons, and by his confession to his own agent. But, my lords, notwithstanding we can prove the first article upon the defendant by the means I have suggested, still his assertion is unfounded: for we shall further prove, that he never was possessed of any one sum of 10,000*l.* which he could have applied to public purposes; or at least, if he was, that this is not the sum of which he so acknowledged himself to have been possessed. But that this sum, so acknowledged by him to Mr. Trotter, in the year 1786, and so acknowledged in the House of Commons in 1805, was compounded of fractional parts of other sums to a large amount, not one farthing of which ever was, or could have been, applied to any public service. We shall also show, that the only 10,000*l.* he ever did take out of the office at any one time, was a sum which he could not possibly apply to any public purpose; nay, that at the time he took it, he was not a servant of the public; and had no more pretext for taking possession of the money then, than he would have now, for taking any of the balances belonging to the navy pay-office in the Bank, and applying them to electioneering purposes in Scotland, or elsewhere.

I must now beg your lordships' attention to a detail of this matter, which in some circumstances is very minute; which I hope I shall be able to make clear; which is capable of clearness, if I am but able to show to your lordships that which I see in my own mind.

On the 19th of August, 1782, lord Melville, then Mr. Dundas, was, for the first time, appointed treasurer of the navy. On the next day, the 20th of August, the sum of 1,000*l.* was paid by Mr. Douglas into a banking-house, with which the noble lord had then, and has still, an account, on his behalf.

Now, my lords, who was Mr. Douglas? for it is necessary we should show explicitly by proof who he was. We shall show he was paymaster of the navy, appointed under proper authority by Mr. Dundas, but otherwise unconnected with him in private agency or any other way: and that every act he did at the time, and afterwards, as paymaster of the navy, had the sanction of the noble defendant. I do not believe that the 1,000*l.* so paid on the 20th of August, 1782, was any part of the public money, but upon the first establishment of the connexion between the parties, a payment of 1,000*l.* was made. Early, however, in November of the same year (1782), a payment of a different description was made into the banking-house of Messieurs Drummond, on behalf of the noble defendant. It is necessary I should state to your lordships, that in the then mode of conducting the office of treasurer of the navy, the paymaster of the navy was in the habit (after the representations had been made to the treasury upon which the warrants for money were granted upon the Exchequer), of going to the Exchequer, together with a Bank clerk (for the Bank was then the usual place of deposit for this money), and having presented his warrant, the sum of money ordered to be paid to the treasurer of the navy was delivered to him, in such way as he chose to take it. He might have it all written to his credit in his Bank-book, if he pleased; and carried to the account of the treasurer of the navy: or he might put some in the Bank-book, and take some away in Bank-notes or cash, and place it where he thought fit.

It so happened, that on the 6th of November, 1782, Mr. Douglas had a payment to receive at the Exchequer, to the amount of forty-five thousand pounds. Mr. Douglas chose to have 40,000*l.* written into his bank-book, and to take 5,000*l.* away in bank-notes. Now such a transaction had often taken place before. Former paymasters of the navy, and Mr. Douglas also in the execution of that office under other treasurers of the navy, had frequently taken sums of money in bank-notes, and had the balance written into their books: but as far as we have been able to trace it, all the sums so subtracted from the aggregate sum imprested to the treasurer of the navy were uniformly sums of three thousand pounds each, which were set apart to pay Exchequer fees. This 5,000*l.* which Mr. Douglas so took from the Exchequer and put into his pocket, was never carried into any public account whatever. It was carried to a place, according to the statement made by Mr. Douglas, which, as I shall have the honour of submitting to your lordships, was also a place of safe custody, one in which he had a right to deposit it. It was carried to the iron chest of the office.

Now, my lords, in the ancient constitution of this office, there was,—as, when there were large payments in specie and before paper circulation was common, it was necessary there should be; and there remained for a great number of years after a paper circulation was common,—a place of safe custody for the deposit of specie, which was this very iron chest. And in the memory of several persons in the navy pay-office who are still living, it was used to keep cash until an escort, or waggons, or whatever else might be necessary for its transport, could be provided to carry such money to the out-ports. But in the course of time, as payments in specie became more rare, the iron chest of the office was diverted from its original purpose, and destined latterly more to the safe custody of particular papers and books, and more especially of the floating securities held by the treasurers of the navy for their own profit and emolument, than any other purpose. But, however, being a public chest, and being, as the noble lord has stated in his evidence before the naval commissioners, a part of the constitution of the office, it was perfectly proper and legal that these notes should be there deposited. For you will find there were five notes of 1,000*l.* each. Mr. Douglas also properly, in the execution of his office, opened a public account with this iron chest. That public account contains the whole history of the transactions of Mr. Douglas, as between the iron chest and his principal, to the time of his quitting the navy pay office in 1783.

My lords, the 10,000*l.* for which the noble defendant is in possession of the receipt, was entered in that chest account, and the draft for the money was drawn payable to a person by the name of Jellicoe, whom I must hereafter have the pain of introducing to your lordships.—My lords, one of these five bank-notes for 1,000*l.* found its way immediately into the hands of the treasurer of the navy, and was paid by him to his private account at Messieurs Drummonds. Not only so, but at the time the 1,000*l.* was paid in, he took 400*l.* away; 600*l.* only remained at Drummonds, the balance was paid to him in small notes and cash for his own private use. I have in my hand the identical note for 1,000*l.*

My lords, perhaps the noble defendant may say, Mr. Drummond's was a place where I had a right to deposit public money—"You had a right to deposit public money there, but not to deposit it there for your own interest and advantage?" How do I show that it was placed there for his interest and advantage. By showing that he took certain specific parcels of it in small notes and gold, and carried it away in his pocket; by showing that whenever he overdrew his account with Drummonds (as happens to most men at some times with their bankers), he was charged with interest upon such over-payments. This happened in November, 1782.—In December of the same year, another sum was subtracted by Mr. Douglas in the same way, and other three notes of 1,000*l.* each, were also carried to the account of the iron chest. It so happens also, that one of these 1,000*l.* notes so paid into the iron chest by Mr. Douglas, went to discharge a private debt of lord Melville's; for it was paid to the house of Moffat and Company, in discharge of a private draft, drawn by Mr. James Newbigging, of Edinburgh, upon lord Melville, then Lord Advocate of Scotland.

My lords, if we show these things, which we can as clearly as that the sun shines, we can only lament the forgetfulness of the noble lord, at the time he wrote his letter of March 1805, to the commissioners of naval inquiry. But further, between the month of August, 1782, and the 10th of April, 1783, subtractions were made by Mr. Douglas, in the manner in which I have stated these two subtractions to have been made, and notes or cash were carried to the iron chest to the amount of 16,000*l.*; only 3,000*l.* of which ever found their way into any official book, or were paid for any official purpose whatever. We shall show your lordships, the two sums of 1,000*l.* each, so identified: and that 13,000*l.* out of 16,000*l.* entered in the chest account kept by Mr. Douglas, and in his own hand-writing, was paid to the noble lord.—The remaining 3,000*l.* was paid to Mr. Jellicoe for official purposes. But, my lords, how fortunate it is that this discovery, which I stated in the earlier part of my address to you, has been made, and that we shall be able to see this paper; for I am sure if one part of these papers is in existence, all the rest must be; and we have given notice to the defendant to produce them. They must be in his possession, and I trust will be produced before you. How simple and easy the transaction will then appear, which otherwise I should have been obliged by long deductions and inferences to have brought before your lordships. Mr. Douglas in his account states, that he took receipts from the noble lord, for every sum he paid him.

Having so received this sum of 13,000*l.* lord Melville quitted the office of treasurer of the navy. Another political revolution took place, other persons succeeded to power, and the noble lord no longer continued in the situation he had then held but for a few months. But when he went out of office, he was debtor to the public, as the Commons are prepared to prove, in the sum of 13,000*l.* Being out of office, what did he do? Why, my lords, after he was out of office (and I beg your lordships attention to this), after he was out of office (for lord Bayning succeeded lord Melville on the 10th of April, 1783, his patent bears date on that day, and the patent of the successor is a revocation of the patent of his predecessor); on the 14th of April, four days after he went out of office, Mr. Douglas drew to the order of Mr. Jellicoe for the sum of 10,000*l.* of which 10,000*l.* the noble defendant possessed himself. The application of which 10,000*l.* I will presently show to your lordships.

I have heard the noble defendant say, that during the time he held the office of treasurer of the navy, he held other confidential situations in government, which made it necessary for him to disburse money so secretly, with so much care and circumspection, that he would not tell even his colleagues what he had done with it. But your lordships will recollect that during his first treasurership he formed no part of the administration: he was simply treasurer of the navy, without any responsibility as to the government of the country. Now an individual so unauthorized, if he had been treasurer of the navy, but who before he did this unauthorized act had ceased to be treasurer of the navy, takes this ten thousand pounds into his own pocket; and then he boldly tells you, he was the servant of the public, and this was for the service of the public, to which public he will never reveal it. To whom, after having so possessed himself of it, did he pay this ten thousand pounds? what became of it? Why, at that time there existed in the city of London, a house of high mercantile reputation, under the firm of Mure and Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson had, some years before, had great connexions with government, in contracts and otherwise; and was extremely well known, I believe, both publicly, in mercantile concerns, and also privately to the defendant within your bar.

This Mr. Atkinson, however, be it noted, (that we may not leave any one thing out which may be supposed to bear upon the case);—this Mr. Atkinson, long before the loan of this ten thousand pounds by lord Melville, had ceased to be a government contractor, or to have any connexion with government at all.—I know, this is not of importance to the substantial part of the case, but I beg to state it by the by. This gentleman was accommodated with the sum of ten thousand pounds by the ex-treasurer of the navy.—Now, was the house of Mure and Co. a place for the safe deposit of money? Was it for safe custody that the ex-treasurer of the navy paid it into Mr. Atkinson's house? Or, were the circumstances of that house such, as to make the loan of ten thousand pounds an extremely convenient thing to them? We can show that the circumstances of that house were such, at that time, as to make the loan of ten thousand pounds of the most essential importance to them: and, if we prove that, I think we show the reason for which that 10,000*l.* was advanced: which was, to accommodate Mr. Atkinson, and if that accommodation can be proved, can the defendant say that he indirectly received no advantage from advancing to a friend with whom he was connected, the sum of 10,000*l.* to extricate him from mercantile difficulties?

My lords, we have an account of Mr. Atkinson's. The lord advocate of Scotland (as lord Melville was at that time) is credited in that account for the sum of 10,000*l.* That, however, makes but one item in the account between lord Melville and that house.—There are twenty-nine entries, of which we shall be able, I believe, to substantiate twenty-one, by having the original papers upon which the drafts were drawn, or the receipts given;—and out of those twenty-one, eight have the hand-writing and signature of Henry Dundas. Added to this the noble lord is in possession, at least his counsel were a very short time ago, of the receipt given for this 10,000*l.* Now, what else happened after Mr. Dundas was out of office, in the course of the summer of 1783? Why, in the course of that summer, difficulties occurred for the payment of the bills which became due upon his ex-treasurership. Having become debtor, by the addition of this 10,000*l.* to the amount of 23,000*l.* so large a subtraction from public money made it difficult to conduct the affairs of the ex-treasurership: and those difficulties were relieved by the defendant in his private capacity. In the first place, a payment was made in reduction of this 23,000*l.* of 1,000*l.* by a person of the name of Gray; who is also dead and gone, and whose papers are also many of them either lost or destroyed. But Gray was connected in money transactions with Mr. Dundas: he was in the habit of advancing small sums in the course of business to Mr. Dundas; and at the time he died, we know that lord Melville was his private debtor: which private debt was afterwards duly discharged.

When I am talking so much of private debts, and private transactions, I do beg your lordships as a court, and individually; and even if I could, I would ask the noble defendant himself, to believe, that nothing in the whole course of this business is so painful to me, as the knowledge I have been under the necessity (together with my brother managers) of obtaining of his private affairs. First of all, they are matters in which no man wishes to meddle, or ought to meddle, without special necessity. In the next place, it is painful to state them publicly, as I am obliged to do. And, lastly, they are so mixed with his public concerns, as sometimes to lead one into much perplexity. And therefore, when I mention the private affairs of the defendant, I beg of your lordships and him to pardon me, for I never mean to do it but in the strict execution of my duty.

This Mr. Gray was a private agent to lord Melville. I have, under the hand-writing of the noble defendant, a letter addressed to his paymaster, Mr. Douglas (dated in 1785, indeed), but which will establish the connexion in money transactions between him and Mr. Gray: who, though an officer in the navy pay-office, was nevertheless no sub-accountant, had no dealings whatever with public money; between whom and the treasurer there could be no transactions with public money. In the year 1785, Mr. Dundas wrote to Mr. Douglas, to inform him that, if he wanted any money in a particular way, which Douglas had mentioned to him, "upon applying to Mr. Gray he will supply you to the extent of 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*" Signed Henry Dundas. Which establishes the agency of Mr. Gray for Mr. Dundas.

But, my lords, to resume. In June, 1783, Mr. Gray made a payment into lord Melville's ex-treasurership account at the Bank of 1,000*l.* which 1,000*l.* came from no public source, for all the public sources are open to our inspection; he had no credit upon any public source, and therefore it could come from no source but a private one. This payment reduced lord Melville's debt to 22,000*l.*: but the difficulties were not relieved: for in the month of July 1783, a victualling bill was presented by a man of the name of Toulmin, and there was but 3,000*l.* in the cashier's hands wherewith to discharge it. In that emergency what was done? Why recourse was had to Mr. Atkinson for the sum of 7,000*l.* Atkinson examined the account at the Bank, and finding that there was there 1,000*l.* besides the 3,000*l.* in the cashier's hands, he took advantage of the 1,000*l.* and paid into the ex-treasurership account at the Bank the sum of 6,000*l.* That went so far in liquidation of the debt. By subsequent payments Atkinson reduced lord Melville's debt to 7,600*l.*; and at 7,600*l.* it stood until lord Melville, for the second time, became treasurer of the navy, in January 1784.

Another memorable political revolution had taken place; and the treasurer of the navy was again in his seat debtor to the public 7,600*l.* New difficulties occurred in the management of the ex-treasurership; and the ex-treasurer was obliged to look about him for assistance, he had indeed a friend just come into office, to whom he might apply. Henry Dundas was there, and surely the old Henry Dundas might borrow of the new. It was indeed like raising money upon his own flesh and blood; but with whom could he take liberties, if not with himself? Those liberties he did take, and he made unauthorized transfers to the amount of 6,000*l.* from his second treasurership account to his first.

It is here necessary to inform your lordships, that according to the custom of the office, transfers were sometimes made by authority from the account of the treasurer in office to the ex-treasurer. But the transfers of which I speak, were unauthorized; for which no legal authority can be produced from the navy board, whence all legal authorities to make such transfers must issue. After these transactions lord Melville owed 1,600*l.* only to his first treasurership, and 6,000*l.* to his second. What did he then do? He took the produce of two drafts of 2,000*l.* each, upon his second treasurership into his own possession, and converted the money to his own use.

The second of these drafts was drawn on the 25th of May 1785. A day most memorable in the life of the noble defendant; because it was on that very day that he so took the public money, that he Henry Dundas was ordered by the House of Commons to carry a bill to the Lords, of which he had been the mover, "For the better regulation of the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy."

—On that very day he took 2,000*l.* of the public money, and paid it into his account at Drummond's; which account was then overdrawn to the amount of 2,500*l.* Thus lord Melville again became debtor to the public in the sum of 11,600*l.*—We have, exclusive of the bank-notes which I before stated to your lordships, these two bank-notes each for a thousand pounds; and I may as well mention here, that we have the ten notes for 1,000*l.* each, which were taken from the Bank, and paid immediately into the hands of Smith, Wright, and Payne, on account of Mr. Atkinson, as well as the notes which went to the Bank from Mr. Atkinson, in discharge of that payment.

Then comes a payment which, if there existed any doubt upon the matter, would put it beyond all dispute, for we will show to your lordships, that, in discharge of a part of this debt of 11,600*l.* a payment was made of a quarter of his own salary into his public account, in reduction of his debt to the public; we will prove this payment by an incontestable witness. This again reduced the debt to the sum of 10,600*l.*

In this situation the account stood at the death of Mr. Douglas.—Mr. Douglas died in December 1785. Here, my lords, I beg leave to state to your lordships, that all the public accounts at the Bank, all the public accounts at the office, and every other account collated, compared, and taken in every different way in which they can be stated; all give the result confirming the evidence which I have opened to you. That the office books and Bank books which cannot lie, all prove to demonstration that such was the precise deficiency. If I have been able to carry your lordships through the labyrinth in which I have been so long engaged, and to show you that which I see, I think you now perceive that this 10,600*l.* was no specific, single sum, taken for any service whatever, either public or private, but the balance composed of fractions of different sums, taken by the noble defendant, at different times, and, as I have shown you by exhibiting either the payments or repayments, each was taken for the private purpose, advantage or interest of the defendant.—But, my lords, how did the noble defendant act when Mr. Douglas died? When this deficiency was known both to him, and to those who succeeded Mr. Douglas; did he call upon the executors of Mr. Douglas to make it good? Did he, after examining the different accounts, and finding such deficiency in the public money, call upon those executors to pay that money, and charge him with having had it? No such thing. No. The only balance called for from the executors of Mr. Douglas, was for exchequer fees, which always form a distinct fund. He gave to Mr. Douglas's son, who will be produced before the Court, a receipt for those exchequer fees. The general balance was in the Bank when it was delivered over to Mr. Douglas's successor: who found it deficient, and upon that deficiency being stated to the defendant, the defendant said, "that deficiency is mine, so much I owe to the public." If then he acknowledged the terminating balance of this account (which was so composed as I have stated to your lordships) I say, he acknowledged the whole of it; and it is impossible that he can show to your lordships he made any public use of the money.—My lords, was it in tenderness to the memory of Mr. Douglas, that the noble defendant acknowledged the sum of 10,600*l.*? No. Mr. Douglas's memory required no such tenderness.—Mr. Douglas's character is without stain. I can call a variety of witnesses, some from your lordships' own body, to show, that he was an accurate, honest and conscientious servant of the public, a faithful servant to those who immediately employed him. I have the testimony of the noble lord in his early opinion of him; I have it in the recommendation he gave of him to lord Bayning, in a matter of civility which passed between him and lord Bayning.—Lord Bayning on going into the office, asked what arrangement could be made agreeable to Mr. Dundas as to the servants of the pay office, who had faithfully discharged their duty? Mr. Dundas's answer was: "You have done the only thing I could have desired, by appointing Mr. Douglas your paymaster."

The defendant no doubt has in his possession all the papers and accounts of Mr. Douglas. Let them be produced, and then we shall see whether the noble lord can cast any imputation on his memory. We know he cannot. To all this, my lords, we shall add the evidence of Mr. Trotter; and the evidence of those who heard lord Melville make that extraordinary and impeachable declaration in the House of Commons, that he was determined to keep the affairs of the public from the knowledge of the public themselves. And thus we shall have completely proved the first and tenth articles. Perhaps in a detail so extensive, and so intricate, there may be some links of the chain which I have not taken up; but if I have touched all that exist, there is such a chain forged by the noble defendant for himself, and with such a shackle at the end of it, as he will be utterly unable to break.

My lords, we now come to the second division, in point of time, of the charges exhibited against lord Melville, I mean that which took place after Mr. Trotter was appointed paymaster of the navy. But I must take your lordships back, for the sake of perspicuity, to that new epoch which had been created in the Navy pay-office, by the passing of an act of parliament, which obtained the royal assent, I believe in the month of June, 1785, "For the better regulation of the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy."

My lords, when I am speaking of the noble defendant, and of those persons connected with him, upon whom it is my duty severely to animadvert; I wish to say every thing that can go to the illustration of their good deeds in the office which they executed, the one as superior, and the other as subordinate: and so far from imputing any blame to them, for that which did not deserve blame; to give them all the credit, and all the praise which is their due during the time they continued so connected together: And therefore it is with satisfaction I say, that during the time Mr. Dundas was treasurer of the navy, several most beneficial regulations took place in that office. That several acts of parliament were passed for the protection and defence of the unprotected and defenceless: I mean the widows and orphans of the brave seamen of this country, and for the allotment of wages to the wives and families of those who were fighting its battles. Above all, that enactments were made through the instrumentality of the defendant, which have saved a number of lives from public execution. The act of parliament to which I here particularly allude, makes that crime almost impossible, which was theretofore so common, namely, the forgery of seamen's wills, and other instruments to obtain their pay. For that, and other acts which I have enumerated, and others which I may perhaps have forgotten, undoubtedly the noble lord demands the thanks of his country, and the gratitude of that meritorious class of men.* And I believe lord Melville will allow, that Mr. Trotter gave him material assistance in the detail of all those plans.

My lords, Mr. Trotter is a person who will be frequently mentioned hereafter. His name has been much in the public mouth, and much to the discomfort and dissatisfaction of those who are nearly connected with him; and as I shall have occasion to speak much of his misdeeds, I think it right here to state, that he is a person, who, in early life, conducted himself with the greatest possible propriety: that except in the transactions of the Navy pay-office, I know nothing, nor, I believe, does any man know any thing to his disadvantage; that he was employed by the treasurer who succeeded lord Melville; that having been afterwards dismissed, he was recalled to his employment by a succeeding treasurer, and continued in it up to the very moment of the Resolutions of the House of Commons on the 8th of April, 1805. Beyond that, I have heard lord Melville, even after the greater part of these transactions were made known, and after the degradation to which Mr. Trotter's conduct, coupled with his own, had subjected him, honourably, generously, and manfully declare, that Mr. Trotter, notwithstanding the cloud which hung over him, was a meritorious man, and one who deserved to be trusted. My lords, farther, if there can be any thing to add—and in such a case nothing ought to be omitted—a man more beloved by his relations, and those connected with him, as far as I have had an opportunity of judging, I do not know. One of the strongest testimonies in favour of any man. My lords, Mr. Trotter is to give you most material information upon the transactions of the defendant; whose transactions are so intimately connected with his own, that I have heard lord Melville say, there is no human being can tell you any thing of them but Mr. Trotter and himself. In consequence of such a general impression, your lordships concurred with the other branches of the legislature in indemnifying Mr. Trotter from all criminal prosecution on account of his own misdeeds;* that he might be rendered a witness competent to speak upon this trial. And it is a very fortunate circumstance for Mr. Trotter, that every thing he will say to your lordships will be confirmed by undeniable testimony. By documents which still exist; and that in no one

The proceedings against lord Melville occasioned also the enactment of the stat. 46 Geo. 3rd, c. 37, by which it is declared, that a witness cannot by law, refuse to answer a question relevant to the matter in issue, the answering of which has no tendency to accuse himself, or to expose him to penalty or forfeiture, of any nature whatsoever, by reason only, or on the sole ground, that the answering of such question may establish, or tend to establish, that he owes a debt, or is otherwise subject to a civil suit, either at the instance of his majesty, or of any other person or persons. For a history of these statutes the reader is referred to 5 Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, 719, 728, 751, 767, 792, 798, 812, 821, 825, 828; 6 Hans. Parl. Deb. 159, 166, 169, 179, 222, 234, 244, 342, 360, 362, 401, 421, 450, 483, 486, 502, 524, 752, 768, 899, 950. statement I have heard him make, is he not borne out by some corroborating witness of credibility, or some book which cannot impose upon you.

My lords, having said thus much, I have to add, that an act of parliament passed in the year 1785, "for the better Regulation of the Office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy." We should have simply put in this act, and stated to your lordships the conduct of the defendant, without making a single comment upon the act itself. But, my lords, to my utter astonishment, I heard the noble defendant say—and my ears still tingle with the sound—that he was yet to learn in what particular he had violated the spirit or the letter of that act of parliament. Good God! my lords, is not that act plain? If that act of parliament be not plain—if he who runs cannot read it, you may as well burn and destroy all your statutes. There is not one which will not admit of a double interpretation, that may not be evaded by a quibble. Magna Charta itself may be misconstrued—the Habeas Corpus act—the act of Succession to the Crown of these kingdoms—the Bill of Rights—may admit of a double interpretation. Nay, my lords, I had almost said that the law, delivered in all the magnificence of Heaven, and written with the finger of God himself on the table of stone—"Thou shalt not steal"—might be explained away. I say, this act is plain; but dare I ask the noble defendant, who was the parent of this act; who nourished and brought it to maturity; whose child it was; which had the sanction of the great name of his departed friend (whose powerful voice was raised to instruct the House of Commons, that he, Mr. Dundas, was the man of all others to carry into execution plans of reform; pointing him out to the selection of the House of Commons to prepare that bill; having prepared it, as he did, knowing its very embryo, and carrying it through all its stages)—dare I ask the noble defendant, whether he meant, at the time he penned that act, to frame the letter with a view to evade the spirit? I dare not ask the question. But if, unhappily for the cause of justice, and his country, the noble lord had sunk into the grave before the arrival of this day,—if his memory had been piously enrolled amongst the number of those and a successor of his, detected in the practices now charged upon him, had dared so to interpret the act of parliament; surely your lordships, in the spirit of those counsellors of Spain, who, after the demise of their chief in cases of perplexity, would exclaim, "Let us consult the genius of Philip the 2nd;" in such a case would have said, "Let us consult the genius of lord Melville. Let us see how he would have interpreted this act, the letter of which you dare to say you have not violated; and against the spirit of which you dare to say you have not offended." But if we could go farther, and according to the wild but sublime superstitions of that country in which the noble lord was born, and as is sung in the lay of the last and most melodious of her minstrels—

"That mighty words, and spells have power, To call up sprites in planetary hour."*

What incantations should we not have used! to what charms should we not have resorted, in order to have conjured up the ghost of the departed sage! and if happily from the result of our orgies there had appeared before us a form of comely manliness, somewhat impaired indeed, but rendered more venerable by age, with every symptom of remaining vigour, every mark of sound understanding; how eagerly should we have addressed him—"Tell us what was the spirit of thy law?" His answer must have been—"Reform—reform, by the most humane and efficacious means, by withdrawing all temptation to offend."—Should we not with equal eagerness have followed up our inquiry by saying—"Did not the letter correspond with the spirit of thy statute?" and with what indignation should we have received an answer such as this?—"Alas, in these regions there is no disguise:—at the moment I framed the act I was sinning against its principle; and I took care so to construct the letter, that although I continued in the constant violation of its spirit, if you had detected me, I defy you to have proved any infraction of its letter." We must have consigned his memory to that reproach it would have so justly deserved. We should have resorted to the statute and said—"Thine own self only hast thou deceived. In thine own chains art thou bound; thy reputation cannot escape from the load of ignominy thou hast brought upon thyself."—My lords, read the statute and see what it says. Is there any double interpretation to be put upon it? Can the learned counsel torture it to their purpose? We have amongst us the managers for the Commons, men of the greatest learning and most distinguished talents. Let them come to the argument with the learned counsel, if it be necessary. But simple and unlearned as I am, I throw down the gauntlet, and defy them. They can put but one interpretation upon this statute, which is, that lord Melville, from the time of its being passed, was bound to place the public money at the Bank, and no where else. That he could not withdraw it from the Bank, for one moment, except for navy services, without having broken, not only the spirit, but the letter of his own act of parliament. My lords, what did he do? He suffered his paymaster to withdraw the money from the Bank, and place it at a private banker's for his own private advantage. That which he did by his paymaster, he did himself. He was bound to see that the servant he employed acted according to his public duty. But we go on, and charge, not only that he connived at his paymaster's making profit of the public money, but that he did so himself; and with that we shall close. But, my lords, let us look a little at this act of parliament, upon what it is founded, and what it says. It sets out by telling you, that the commissioners of public accounts had recommended so and so. Then the legislature meant to act upon that which the commissioners of accounts had recommended. They did so most effectually; by saying, first of all, that all the money should be paid into the Bank: and with regard to the money so paid in, the treasurer of his majesty's navy should be only a public accountant; and no longer a public banker: that no money should ever come into the hands of the treasurer of the navy at all: that it should be drawn from the Bank for navy services only, and under certain forms of drafts therein prescribed. The third section of that act of parliament says—"Be it further enacted, that from and after the first day of July, 1785, no money for the service of the navy shall be issued from his majesty's Exchequer to the treasurer of the navy, or shall be placed"—mind, my lords, "or shall be placed, or directed to be placed, in his hands or possession"; but the same shall be issued and directed to be paid to the governor and company of the Bank of England, and to be placed to accounts according to the purposes for which it is craved and issued." My lords, this section of the act was complied with from July 1785. From that date, the navy money has been entirely paid into the Bank of England from the Exchequer.

Now, I beg your lordships' attention to one circumstance with regard to the public money, and the manner in which it is again issued by the treasurer or his paymaster to his sub-accountants. Not one farthing ever stops with the treasurer, or his paymaster; but it is issued to the sub-accountants in order to its being paid to the various persons who furnish those things which are requisite for the use of the navy, and for the pay and so forth of the officers and seamen. Assignments are, for the most part, made by the navy board upon the particular funds in the Bank appropriated to each particular head of service: of which assignments there is a list daily sent to the Navy pay-office; and so much money may be drawn by the treasurer of the navy, or his deputy, under certain forms and regulations prescribed by the act, for the use of the particular branch upon which such assignments are made.

It may be here necessary to state to your lordships, that there are three distinct branches under which payments are made for navy services: the Pay branch, the Victualling branch, and the Navy branch. Those are the three great heads of payment. It so happens, that assignments are made upon every farthing issued for the use of the navy and victualling branches; assignments are also made upon a part of the fund appropriated to the pay branch, but not upon the whole of it.

My lords, it is the duty of the treasurer, under the forms prescribed by the act, to crave money from the Treasury; which money is then paid by order of the Treasury from the Exchequer into the Bank: whence the treasurer cannot legally remove it, either by himself or his deputy, unless there be a navy service to which it is immediately applicable. The binding words are these: "Provided always that the monies to be issued unto the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, shall not be paid out of the Bank, unless for navy services." Now, mind, my lords, the next word, which is most important. "And in pursuance of drafts to be drawn on the governor and company of the Bank of England," so that it is not a draft drawn in any particular form which would entitle the treasurer, or his deputy, to take a sum of money out of the Bank. No, it is only the knowledge of a navy service which immediately demands it. Then, in giving the draft, he fulfils the law. But if he gives the draft without having a service to execute, the law is broken. In the present case it has been broken, and highly broken: it has been violated and grossly violated.

My lords, I have heard it said by the noble defendant himself, that there is a difference between the assigned and unassigned balances. As if, after the passing of the act, he had the complete control over such assigned balances as were unclaimed. But would it not be the most preposterous thing in the world to maintain, that if there is an assigned, unclaimed balance, to the amount of 100,000*l.* which the treasurer, or his paymaster, by his experience knows will not be called for to its full extent, by giving a proper form of draft, he has a right to keep the difference in his own pocket? I maintain that every farthing drawn beyond what experience shows to be necessary, is drawn in breach and violation of the act of parliament.

But, my lords, what did the noble defendant do? how did he instruct his paymaster? he acknowledges having given permission to his paymaster to draw money from the Bank to be placed at his private banker's. Did he at the same time tell him, "Take care never to go beyond the assignments; for if you do we shall violate the law. But if you keep within them, we are safe?" Such instructions he never gave to his paymaster. Did he tell his paymaster, "there are two descriptions of balances at the Bank, the one of which is altogether assigned upon, the other not. Now mind, you do not draw for the purpose of placing money at your banker's upon that which is not assigned upon, but only upon that which is?" Did he know what the average amount of those unclaimed assignments was; and what boon he gave to his paymaster when he gave him this permission? Your lordships will perhaps be surprised to hear that the unclaimed assignments ordinarily amount to the sum of 140,000*l.* So that the treasurer was giving to his paymaster (reckoning the profit upon that sum at 5 per cent) 7,000*l.* a year, for the execution of an office for which the public allow only 500*l.* But I maintain there is no difference between assigned and unassigned money. They are equally the property of the public till claimed, and the act of parliament says, they both shall remain in the Bank till drawn out for navy services.

I presume your lordships would not allow that a paymaster had drawn out money for a navy service, if he drew out 8,000*l.* to purchase India stock in his own name, and that of Henry Dundas. I do not suppose that if a paymaster drew out a million of money, and put it into the hands of his private banker, when the assignments did not amount to above a fifth part of that sum, your lordships will say, that was for a navy service. And yet these things have occurred, and these things the noble defendant, I think, could not but know. Yet still he would shelter himself under the distinction of assigned and unassigned money. I think it is scarcely necessary to dwell any longer upon it. But if the plain wording of the statute, if the intention of parliament admitted of a doubt; if the legal exactness of the noble lord, who was bred in habits that would induce him to pay particular attention to the construction and wording of such an act, had left any uncertainty upon the subject, the learned counsel would not, I think, dare to avail themselves of it, and if they did, I think they would be brought to shame. I see my learned friend* smiling at my simplicity, so may he smile upon an honourable acquittal of his client at the conclusion of this trial. I can assure him that I shall rejoice in common with every good man in finding that I have been deceived; but those smiles, I fear, will hereafter come through tears, δακρυων γελασαςος.

My lords, I say, in defiance of the learned counsel's apparent, I am sure not intentional, contempt of my reasoning, I have the authority of parliament itself on my side: that parliament has considered that which it has enacted: that, if you want an interpreter, you have one. What occurred last year? In the year 1805, as is perfectly well known, it came to light that a certain sum of 40,000*l.* had been applied by the noble defendant with the knowledge and consent of one of his colleagues for a public service not naval: its application was made a subject of parliamentary investigation. No defence was set up by any body, arising out of the legality of the proceeding. Nobody said, "they acted according to law."

* Mr. Plumer.

No. It was said, "they broke the law for the public good; they are meritorious servants of the public, and deserve your thanks." One of them was open, candid, and ingenuous; he frankly avowed his deed. Not so the other. He could not help its being known: but what did he say? He said, "If Mr. Pitt had not told you this, I would not." "Now, if Mr. Pitt had not told you that this 40,000*l.* had been employed for the use of Boyd and Benfield,* or you had not obtained the information through Mr. Long, you would not have known it; and then," he added, "what would you have thought of me, for having an additional sum of 40,000*l.* of the public money in my hands?" Why, I should not have thought much worse of you than I do now; but I should have thought that in proportion as the sum concealed was large, the responsibility of the person having so employed and concealed it was large also: that if information were requisite upon a sum of 10,000*l.* it was still more requisite upon one of 40,000*l.*; but if these unassigned balances were monies over which he had a control, no information could be demanded, and no indemnity was necessary. He had as much right to place it in the hands of Boyd and Benfield, as he had to permit Mr. Trotter to place it in the hands of Messieurs Coutts. And it can be shown, the assigned balance unclaimed always exceeded 100,000*l.* If his reasoning were correct, he had no occasion whatever for an act of indemnity. But an act of indemnity was passed for him, his colleague in office, and all concerned in that transaction. What does that act of indemnity say? It says that the application of this 40,000*l.* "was not conformable to law." Now if that statute were not in existence the thing would be as clear and manifest as the sun at noon day. But if there were a cloud or shade over it, that act has dispelled it. We have only to call upon the legislature for the interpretation of its own act; and if we are so dull, and ignorant, and stupid, as not to be able to decide what the Regulation act means, we have another act of parliament for our guide.†

My lords, if I have not succeeded in establishing my position in the minds of your lordships, I am sure those who come after me will be able to do it; but I flatter myself, that, in the apprehension of every person not wilfully blind, it is established, that no money can be legally drawn from the Bank of England, under the provisions of this act, except for immediate application to some navy service.

My lords, having this act before him, what did the noble defendant do? Why, in an examination taken upon oath from that noble person, before the commissioners of naval inquiry, he confesses,—and not only confesses, but takes credit to himself for what he has done,—that circumstances induced him to give permission to his paymaster to place money at Messieurs Coutts's for purposes of official convenience, and also for the advantage and benefit of that paymaster. The question and answer are these: "Did you authorize the paymaster, in or about the year 1786, to draw the money applicable to naval services from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker?" The answer of lord Melville is: "I cannot precisely fix the time, but I am certain that I did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank for public purposes in his private banker's hands, during the period it was not demanded to the purposes for which it was drawn."

Now, my lords, there are two or three words, which raise the distinction between assigned and unassigned balances. How did Mr. Trotter conduct himself under this permission from the noble defendant? In the second article, we charge, that with the connivance of lord Melville, Mr. Trotter took large sums of money from the Bank, and lodged them in the hands of a private banker. Assigned or unassigned, was matter of no consideration with him; navy, pay, or victualling, he took money indiscriminately from each of those heads, and placed it at Messieurs Coutts's. He drew it out from Messieurs Coutts's in the same manner without the smallest regard whatever to navy service. All this he will state to your lordships.—Did he do this to any considerable amount? We can show your lordships every month, from the beginning of these transactions down to the month in which he quitted the Navy pay-office, to what amount. I will just now only state to your lordships, that he began with 10,000*l.*, then went on to 20,000*l.*, then, in 1795, to 101,000*l.*; after that he dealt with so large a sum as 490,000*l.*, and, at the time lord Melville went out of office, the last balance in his hands amounted to 290,000*l.* Did lord Melville ever make any inquiry how he was using the public money? No; it never once struck him, it seems, that what he had permitted was improper; nor did it occur to him to inquire to what extent Mr. Trotter did it. And yet it was a matter of great importance to him to know how matters stood; because not only his fortune, but his character was at stake. Still he made no inquiry. Did any thing bring it to his notice? I shall show by-and-by, that many things must have brought it to his notice, and that it is impossible he should not have known at different times the sums Mr. Trotter had out.

My lords, we further charge, that the public money was exposed to great risk of loss, in being placed wholly at the disposal of Mr. Trotter. It was nominally at Messieurs Coutts's, for the purpose of carrying on the business of the office; yet I shall show that it was any where, almost, but at Messieurs Coutts's; and I shall show instances wherein great loss was actually risked. That at one time Mr. Trotter, having bought a large quantity of navy bills, they fell to so great a discount, that he would not sell them; but applied for assistance to a gentleman of the name of Sprot, who lent him a considerable sum to supply the deficiency. There the public money was not only exposed to loss, but there was a temporary loss upon it; and Mr. Trotter, supposing he had not had other resources, and had been obliged to sell his navy bills, would not have been able to make good the deficiency to the public.—By the assistance of Sprot he escaped unhurt, and the loss was retrieved. We charge, that the public money was withdrawn from the control of the treasurer of the navy. Whilst the money was in the Bank of England, it was always under his control. The revocation of the power of attorney, granted to his paymaster, immediately put it under his control. If Mr. Trotter died, or absconded, or failed; all the money in the Bank of England, or in the hands of the sub-accountants, vested immediately in the treasurer of the navy. But when Mr. Trotter had put it into the hands of a private banker, it was under his control, and that of nobody else. Ask Mr. Antrobus, or any other banker; they could not possibly have answered any draft for this money, except that of Mr. Trotter, or his executor, or assignee. He might have carried the money where he pleased: lord Melville could not have prevented his doing so: and therefore by giving this unlimited confidence to Mr. Trotter, he abandoned the custody of the public money.

My lords, the public money was still further exposed to risk of loss, and put at a still greater distance from the control of the proper officer: for that trust which lord Melville had delegated to Mr. Trotter, Mr. Trotter delegated to others; with whom he left blank drafts, signed, to be filled up for the sum wanted in his absence. One or two instances can be produced, I believe, wherein that second person beyond the treasurer of the navy, put those blanks into the hand of a third person: so that there was no end of the extent to which he had given Mr. Trotter power to draw,—of the extent to which he had abandoned his duty; there was no end of the violations both of the spirit and letter of the act of parliament. Proofs of what we have charged are abundant.

My lords, there was a curious sort of defence produced by the noble lord before the naval commissioners. I will read it from his examination, which we shall produce in evidence to your lordships. The question asked by the naval commissioners is this: "What circumstance induced you to give such permission to the paymaster?"—"An opinion to which I still adhere, that if the whole monies necessarily drawn from the Bank, in pursuance of orders from the competent boards, were lodged in the hands of a respectable banker, under the control of the paymaster of the navy, that it would add more facility to the conduct of the business of the office in the multitude of small payments to be made, then if the money were deposited according to the constitution of the office, in an iron chest. I likewise had it in contemplation, that in the receipt of these various small payments, made to such a variety of persons, they would be less liable to be imposed upon by that mode of transacting the business, than if they were each to receive drafts for such small sums upon the Bank, at such a distance from the office, after its removal to Somerset-Place."

Now, my lords, where a thing is acknowledged, and a motive assigned for it, which can be proved not to be the true one, the suspicion must be strong that the real motive is a bad one. Your lordships would imagine, from reading that part of the evidence of the noble defendant, that it really was necessary to have money at a private banker's; and that there were some mysterious payments which could be more easily effected through Messrs. Coutts, than through the Bank of England; that sailors were sent to the Bank of England for 9s. 10d., and such trifling sums; whereas, in the conduct of the office then, and in the conduct of the office now, never could any such thing take place. Your lordships would imagine, from that mode of defence, that the paymaster had half-guineas, and shillings and sixpences, always going through his hands; but not one word of that is true. The paymaster never pays a groat. Mr. Trotter himself never made a payment from the time he went into office, in 1786, till the time he was dismissed from it, in 1805. Your lordships would imagine, that drafts for very small sums were given, and that it was easier to get those drafts changed at Coutts's, than at the Bank. No such thing: for in all the three hundred and thirty-two drafts drawn by Mr. Trotter on the house of Messieurs Coutts for public money, there are only three for a smaller sum than one thousand pounds.

Then, my lords, as to the distance from the Navy pay-office to the Bank. Your lordships would imagine, these drafts were going all the day; that the Navy pay-office continued paying night and day, and that the vicinity of Mr. Coutts's shop, therefore, made it convenient. No such thing, my lords: the Navy pay-office shuts three hours before the Bank clerks think of closing their books. Then that assertion perishes under the feet of those who make it. But it may be asked, would not however some difficulty of some sort have been felt in the conduct of the Navy pay-office without the intervention of a private banker? None whatever; for after lord Melville went out of office, Mr. Trotter continued paymaster to his successor lord Harrowby. Mr. Bragge, now by the name of Bathurst, a member of the House of Commons, succeeded lord Harrowby; and Mr. Trotter was paymaster to him also. At the expiration of a certain period, Mr. Bragge ordered Mr. Trotter to take the money out of the hands of his private banker, and to place it all in the Bank of England. Was there any embarrassment in consequence of this order? No; the Navy pay office was conducted with the same ease as it had been at the time the money passed through Mr. Coutts's house. But what was the difference in the conduct of it? After Mr. Bragge had, at the suggestion of a meritorious person by the name of Fennel (who, as I have been informed), called Mr. Bragge's attention to the act of parliament, and showed him how grossly it was violated), obliged Mr. Trotter to discontinue the practice, did he find any difficulty in conducting the office? None at all. But how did he vary his conduct? He varied it thus: If a list of assignments was brought to him by the sub-accountants on the Monday morning, for instance, saying, "Here are claims which may be made on the treasurer of the navy for 100,000*l.*, and we have each of us a balance in hand of 10,000*l.* left from Saturday night." From the experience he had in the office, he would answer: "You will not want more than thirty or forty thousand to-day; and if you should, I shall be here all day, so that there is no necessity to draw for a larger sum at present." What did he do with the balance? he left it in the Bank till it was really wanted: if the navy service did not want it, he did not draw for it. But when the treasurer was allowed to place the money in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, his own interest wanted it; and therefore he drew at once for the whole assignment or a great deal more, and there is the distinction between the two modes of conduct.

Your lordships will probably suppose, that great balances were always left in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, to answer the demands of the treasurer of the navy. No such thing; for you will find on inquiry, that when there was a deficiency of 490,000*l.* there was but 16,000*l.* of it at Messieurs Coutts's; and that at many times, when the deficient balances were very large, Mr. Trotter had very small sums at Messieurs Coutts's; at others, that his account was overdrawn. Therefore, the placing of the public money at Messieurs Coutts's could be for no other purpose than that of private profit and emolument.

My lords, the treasurer of the navy has said, that he suffered Mr. Trotter to do this, for the purpose of private emolument. Lord Melville, in his examination before the naval commissioners, being asked, "Did you give permission to the paymaster to withdraw the money from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker, with a view to his deriving any advantage or emolument therefrom?"—gives this answer: "If it is meant to ask me, whether I ever gave any direct authority to the paymaster to use the money in the manner above-mentioned; I should certainly answer, No: but I have no hesitation in saying, that I believed and understood he did, and never prohibited him from doing so: and I believe it was so understood by others, at different times, when the establishment of the Navy pay office was under consideration; when certainly no competent provision was made for the person exercising that trust of great extent and responsibility."

Now, my lords, was it so understood, or could it be so understood by any human being? Much less could it be so understood by the noble lord, who brought in the act, who appointed Mr. Trotter his paymaster, and who in a memorial which he submitted to his majesty, and which was made the foundation of an order of council, named the salaries which the different officers of the Navy pay office ought to have. If the salary was insufficient, why did not the noble lord propose an increase of it? He had access to the royal ear at that time, and during a great number of years. Any thing of his recommendation, either to his colleagues, or to his majesty, would have met with its due weight. And if the paymaster of the navy was not sufficiently remunerated for his trouble, it was in lord Melville's power, with a nod, to have determined what that remuneration should be. The establishment of the Navy pay office afterwards became the subject of inquiry before a committee of the House of Commons; and there it was declared, that no fees or gratuities whatever were received by the persons holding situations in the Navy pay office. It is, I think, unnecessary for me to trouble your lordships further upon this part of the impeachment. We charge, in these articles, as an offence committed by lord Melville, that he permitted Mr. Trotter to do these things; that he connived at his doing them for some indirect and improper purpose.

Now, my lords, we come to the last division of this accusation against the noble lord, which would the most materially implicate his reputation, if the fatal letter which he wrote to the naval commissioners, in the month of March 1805, did not give the pre-eminence of guilt to the charge contained in the first and tenth articles. For, my lords, we now charge upon lord Melville, that he did directly participate in the profits made by Mr. Trotter. We shall specify the mode, and we shall prove the items of the accounts, in which it will be seen, that lord Melville participated in those profits.

My lords, there is one article which, I believe, I forgot; the article which charges that the public money went into the hands of Mr. Sprot and others. Lord Melville having given to Mr. Trotter the power to remove it from the Bank, it was carried into various channels, and Mr. Trotter was permitted to put it into the hands of Mr. Sprot, or any other person whatever, just as he thought proper.

But, my lords, to return. There comes, in the front of the next class of articles, a second sum of 10,000*l.* The fifth article charges, that lord Melville took the further sum of 10,000*l.* for his own use. My lords, I heard him say, and he was heard by many others to say, that 40,000*l.* was two-thirds of the whole sum he ever subtracted from navy services: for that 40,000*l.* he has received an indemnity. And, with respect to the other two sums of 10,000*l.* each, he stated, that he never would reveal the application of them. I have only to say here, that he confessed it. We have his confession in the face of the whole House of Commons. Let him show your lordships, if he can, for what purpose this was applied: and, if he cannot show it, I say, for his very concealment, you must convict him.

My lords, the proof of this article will rest entirely upon the assertion of lord Melville; and out of the difficulty created by that assertion his counsel must extricate him how they can.

My lords, it is now necessary to inform you, in order to lead you to those transactions in which lord Melville was personally concerned as a participator, that Mr. Trotter proceeded very cautiously in the early part of his career: that, before he employed any private banker, as Mr. Coutts,—before he dealt with Mr. Sprot,—before he dealt with Mr. Lind,—before he dealt with divers persons, through whose means and intervention he made profit of the public money,—he employed a person in the Navy pay office, of the name of Jellicoe, to transact business, and employ certain comparatively small sums for him. Mr. Jellicoe has been heretofore frequently mentioned out of doors, and in the House of Commons. Mr. Jellicoe's deeds are not now before your lordships, and nothing respecting the connexion between the noble lord and Mr. Jellicoe is before you. But it is proper to say, with respect to Mr. Jellicoe, who died a public defaulter, that otherwise a man of more strict integrity, according to every account that has been given of him, never existed. Unfortunately for him, he had dealings with the public money. Those dealings led him into embarrassments, and those embarrassments shortened his days. He died of a broken heart in consequence of not being able to make good the public deficiencies, occasioned by the appropriation of certain sums, which he fondly imagined he should be able to repay, and that the use of them would produce wealth and happiness.

My lords, if all prosecutions of this sort are instituted for the sake of public example, as we profess that this prosecution is, and not with a view to the persecution or harassing of any private individual;—for all punishment of every sort ought to be inflicted for the sake of public example, and not for the purpose of vengeance on the unfortunate delinquent;—it must be the anxious desire of every good heart, if it were possible, to separate the crime from the criminal, to come at the deed without pressing upon him who perpetrated it. It is the morals of the country we wish to reform; it is the repetition of bad practices that we wish to prevent: not that he who has committed the crime should be crushed. Here, therefore, I could wish to speak, so that my voice should pervade every corner of the country, should reach every person who has the custody of public money, that I might warn him against the temptation to which he might otherwise yield. I will caution every public accountant against the use of the public money entrusted to his charge, as a fond parent would caution a child against the fascination of the machinery of a mill: do not go near it; above all, do not touch it; for if only the hem of your garment should be caught, you will inevitably be crushed. Meddle not with public money; take care that it passes purely through your hands; for the use of it, instead of leading the road, as you may falsely hope and expect, to fame, to fortune, to comfort, and to happiness, will lead you to destruction. Look at Mr. Jellicoe, a good member of society, brought to an untimely grave! Look at Mr. Trotter! Can all the money he has made, compensate the pang he must endure, when brought to give his testimony against the noble defendant, his patron in early life, to whom he must have, as many have, an ardent attachment? Above all, look at the noble lord himself now upon trial for having connived at the use of public money, and participated in that use. Look at the situation to which he is reduced! Look at him compelled to relinquish one of the highest offices of the state: his name erased from the list of the privy council! and, as you would avoid pain and ignominy, nay, as you would avoid death itself, do not by any temptation be led to meddle with the treasure committed to your care.

My lords, we charge, that the noble defendant did use the public money, after the transactions with Mr. Jellicoe had ceased, and when the employment of Mr. Coutts's house began. We charge, first, that Mr. Trotter made advances to him; that we shall prove, by a variety of documents, and by the evidence of Mr. Trotter; whose evidence shall be confirmed to you by the evidence of books. Mr. Trotter made those advances, without interest, to lord Melville; which fact affords a substantial ground of belief, that lord Melville must have known that the advances were made out of public money. That is the first step. We then come to transactions in which there is a difficulty, as it is pretended, to ascertain, whether the monies were Mr. Trotter's, or were not.

I here again beg your lordships to advert to the situation in which we have stood. We have had before us accounts kept in a state of perplexity, for the purpose of deceit; and which, I heard lord Melville say, were so intricate, that whoever attempted to unravel them, would find himself more and more lost in the labyrinth. By labour we have succeeded in rendering them as clear as day.

With one glance you shall see through the whole mass of them, till we bring them to the conclusion,—and which lord Melville by his acts acknowledged,—that he had participated in profits derived from the public money.

Mr. Trotter had no less than four accounts open with Messieurs Coutts. Lord Melville had no less than nine cash accounts kept with different persons, comprehending three public bankers. Through the whole mass of these thirteen accounts we have been obliged to travel, with great labour; for which we claim no merit, because it was our business, and we undertook it.

My lords, we charge that Mr. Trotter made advances to lord Melville out of his funds at Messieurs Coutts's. Mr. Trotter will tell you that he did so, and we shall also prove it by a comparison of the several accounts. That he kept an account current with lord Melville; and further, that, for the purpose of preventing these things being brought to light, when a rumour began to prevail that they might be the subject of inquiry, the books and papers which would have furnished the most complete evidence, were, by agreement, destroyed: which fact we shall prove by the instrument itself.

My lords, Mr. Trotter kept an account current with lord Melville: that account current was kept in a book; that account current was copied out of that book once in every twelve months, and was delivered to lord Melville, together with another account, to be mentioned presently. We shall show your lordships, that lord Melville, after inspecting that account, signed duplicates of it; one part he kept for himself, and the other was delivered back, as is usual, to his agent, Mr. Trotter. This book also contained various accounts with other persons. But, it is destroyed and that for the purpose of concealment. Lord Melville tells us, that his vouchers are destroyed. They also are destroyed for the purpose of concealment. Mr. Trotter tells no untruth, in saying, that he kept his account with lord Melville in a book. We know, and can prove it from other sources. For it happened some few years ago, that this book was lost by Mr. Trotter, and found by a person now living; who showed it to other persons, also now living, before it was restored to Mr. Trotter. The agreement, in consequence of which the destruction of these books and papers took place, purports to be a release, and contains a clause never before heard of in any instrument of a like nature.

This clause states, that lord Melville and Mr. Trotter “have, either mutually delivered up to each other, or resolved and agreed mutually to cancel and destroy, all the vouchers or other memorandums and writings that at any time heretofore may have existed, passed, or been interchanged between them relative to the said accounts, and the different items and articles of which the said accounts are composed or consist.”

My lords, there are some forms in law which would appear to a person who is totally ignorant of legal practice, to imply a great deal, but which are mere matters of course, and mean nothing. But we have endeavoured, by the examination of divers competent witnesses, to see whether any thing of this sort was ever inserted in any deed of the kind, in either part of the United Kingdom; but no precedent can be found. At what time was this release executed? * At a most critical juncture.—At the very time when the commissioners of naval inquiry were about to investigate the affairs of the Navy pay-office; at the very moment when they called for the balances of the treasurer of the navy. In the interval, between the call for those balances and the return to the precept, was this release constructed. It was sent down by the post to Scotland, where it was executed by lord Melville, and it was afterwards executed by Mr. Trotter in London.

I would now beg your lordships to look at the acknowledgment therein made by lord Melville. Mr. Trotter states himself, in the release, to be debtor to lord Melville, to the amount of 1,400*l.* I think, but no matter the sum. Could lord Melville, unless he had Mr. Trotter's account before him, have said whether this statement was true or false? or will he say, "I am so careless a man, that I never looked at the papers when settling the account: I did not look to see whether the balance was fourteen hundred or fourteen thousand pounds?" No man, particularly lord Melville, in the situation in which he stood with regard to Mr. Trotter, can possibly set up such a defence; for he had entrusted him with the expenditure of a hundred and thirty millions of money. Very large private dealings had taken place between them, and at last the balance is reduced to 1,400*l.* Shall he be allowed to say, that he acknowledged this balance without looking at any account?—without having the figures before him? But if he should set up such a defence, I will read another part of his own release against him: "Whereas for several years past there have been sundry accounts, reckonings, and money transactions, depending between us," (that is, Mr. Trotter and lord Melville), "the accounts of which," (I beg your lordships' particular attention to this paragraph), "have lately been examined, adjusted, and agreed between us, and upon such examination, settlement, and adjustment"—thus lately made; it could not then have been a casual burning of papers, in consequence of a man being overloaded with them; but he gravely asserts that he has examined all the papers. Must not your lordships presume, that those papers and books, so examined, were before him? "And upon such examination, settlement, and adjustment, there remained a balance due from the said Alexander Trotter to the aforesaid lord viscount Melville of 1,380*l.* 11*s.* 1½*d.* sterling money" (very minute, your lordships will observe), "with which final examination, statement, and adjustment, both parties declare themselves perfectly satisfied, and do hereby approve of and ratify the same." Then it goes on to state, that in consequence of the examination and adjustment of those vouchers so before them, they had either mutually delivered up the same, or had resolved and agreed mutually to cancel and destroy any thing which might remain in their possession. Can any thing be more plain, in language, to prove that they had these accounts before them? They do not state that they have destroyed; but they resolve that they will cancel and destroy. The instrument itself then proves, that part of the charge alleged against lord Melville; namely, that the books, documents, and papers, were destroyed, in consequence of a release; and the inference is undeniable, that they were destroyed for the purpose of concealment.

We will now proceed to the other parts of the charge.

There are three distinct modes, in which we charge lord Melville to have participated in the public money. He participated, first of all, in a transaction on which no interest was charged by Mr. Trotter to him: he participated, secondly, in a transaction in which interest was charged by Mr. Trotter to him; he participated, in a third transaction, where no interest was charged by Mr. Trotter to him. They stand in that order in the articles; but, for the purpose of explaining the transactions to your lordships more perspicuously, I beg to alter, not to invert, the order of them; and to take the middle charge first, and then the other two together.

If your lordships will have the goodness to refer to the eighth article; you will find it there charged, that lord Melville obtained from Mr. Trotter the advance of a sum of 22,000*l.* or some other large sum of money; for which it has been alleged, by lord Melville, that he was to pay interest; and we further charge, a destruction of papers, &c. to conceal this account also.

My lords, the history of the transaction is this. Mr. Trotter was in the habit of occasional, but not, I believe, frequent intercourse with lord Melville. I do not think they had many interviews upon business, either public or private: and I might here observe, that instead of apologizing to your lordships for being able to produce so little evidence, in a case, where, as I stated in the early part of my address, there were so many difficulties; wherein so much passed by signs and nods; by asking for things in particular ways; I am rather astonished how we have been able to produce so much. At one of those interviews, lord Melville, then holding several great offices of state, and being one of the most efficient members of an administration which advised his majesty for many years, and president of the board of control, said to Mr. Trotter, that he had a great opinion of the value of East-India stock: that he thought it very probable East-India stock would rise; and he followed up the conversation by saying, he should be extremely happy were he able to possess himself of some India stock. Upon which Mr. Trotter, who appears very readily to have understood lord Melville, said, I can suggest to your lordship means, by which, if you please, you may possess yourself of a quantity of India stock, which will be advantageous to you, and not detrimental to any body. How is that? Why, my lord, there are large public balances always lying in my hands, and, if your lordship pleases, I will lay them out in the purchase of India stock for you. Lord Melville was highly indignant at this proposal. "What! purchase India stock for me with public money? No: no more of that, I pray you, Mr. Trotter."

My lords, I am now come to a point to which I referred in another part of my speech, when I said, it was impossible the transactions of Mr. Trotter with the public money, should not have come under lord Melville's notice! Was not this a moment for lord Melville to say, Why, what balances of public money have you then in your hands? You appear to me to be going on too fast: let me see what you are about. No, not one word did he say to Mr. Trotter about what he was doing with the public money; but at once said he would have no such thing done for himself, and Mr. Trotter retired rather abashed, and ashamed of what he had proposed. He however reflected, that it was a pity lord Melville should be disappointed in the arrangements he wished to make; and he went to him again, and told him that, although he would not permit this to be done out of the public money, he thought he had a relation who would advance money to his lordship for the purchase of some India stock, and that the stock itself might be made the security for the repayment of the money. Lord Melville agreed to this; and said, 'Let it be done;' without asking a question as to whom he employed; who was this relation: but he said, Let it be done; and it was done.

Mr. Trotter soon after informed lord Melville, that a purchase of India stock had been made: and then he added to it; and then he added again to it; and so by degrees the purchases amounted to 13,500*l.* stock. To show that these purchases were made, and that they were made by the direction of Mr. Trotter, and paid for by him, we can call Mr. Antrobus, Mr. Lind, and a variety of witnesses, and we can produce the books of the East-India company.

Lord Melville constantly paid interest to Mr. Trotter for this money. But who was Mr. Trotter's friend in this transaction? Why, Mr. Trotter went to a gentleman, who is now dead, by the name of Lind; a relation with whom he had large money transactions; and asked Mr. Lind to lend him money to purchase India stock on behalf of lord Melville. Mr. Lind said he would think of it; but at length he could not do it. Then what did Mr. Trotter do? He lent Mr. Lind the public money, for him to lend to lord Melville, to purchase the stock. But lord Melville never signed a scrap of paper. Mr. Trotter never told him who it was that had lent the money; he never suggested the name of the person who put such unlimited confidence in him, as to let him have the money to lend to lord Melville without security. The stock was first in Mr. Lind's name, then in Mr. Antrobus's name, then in Mr. Trotter's name, then in Mr. Coutts's name. But in whatever name it was, the dividends were constantly carried to the credit of lord Melville's account with Mr. Trotter: and Mr. Trotter paid the public money to Mr. Lind, for the purpose of Mr. Lind's purchasing this India stock for lord Melville's use.

My lords; some time after this, India stock rose considerably. The dividend was increased to ten guineas per cent., and at the expiration of his treasurership, he borrowed money upon it: for, it was not sold when he wound up his account, and from the rise occasioned by the increase of dividend, lord Melville profited considerably.

My lords, here I leave this transaction of India stock for the present; but I shall return to it, and at the conclusion of the account fix the knowledge of the whole history of the affair upon lord Melville.

I must not, however, here omit one circumstance concerning this parcel of stock which alone would give your lordships a just suspicion that he must have known at the time, that it was purchased with public money. The whole cost of the stock was 23,000*l.* The debt for the capital with which it was purchased, was soon reduced to 20,000*l.* either by a payment of 3,000*l.* made by lord Melville into the hands of Mr. Trotter; or by the carrying of 3,000*l.* to the debit of the account current raised between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter. Then if lord Melville in discharge of that 3,000*l.* paid bank notes, or other effects, into the hands of Mr. Trotter, for which he claimed no discharge, it is obvious lord Melville must at the time have known that it was Mr. Trotter, and none but Mr. Trotter, who had advanced the whole or any part of this money: and no receipt was taken by lord Melville in discharge of that 3,000*l.*

But, to leave it there for the present, I shall carry your lordships on to the charge in which we say he took 23,000*l.* or thereabouts, without interest: and this is the most direct charge, if there can be any selection, of any that is made against lord Melville for participating in the profit made of public money. Lord Melville, at the time he appointed Mr. Trotter his paymaster, acknowledged to him, that he was indebted to the public in the sum of 10,600*l*. The balances in all the books correspond in fixing this sum. This 10,600*l*. formed the first item of an account, which was opened by Mr. Trotter after he came into the office, entitled, by way of distinction, and by the order of lord Melville. The Chest Account; which was carried down to the month of May 1800.

Now, my lords, let your recollection go back for a moment to the original opening of the first article of the impeachment. The 10,000*l*. which lord Melville declared was never taken for the purpose of his emolument, you will now find remained in his pocket from January 1786, to May 1800, without interest. Did he then make no profit of it?—The chest account was increased by various payments made on account of lord Melville. A transcript of it was delivered annually to lord Melville, together with the transcript of the account current. Lord Melville signed and exchanged the duplicates of this account likewise, and he knew that the chest account was unmixed public money, as Mr. Trotter will tell you.

Then, how is he to be extricated from that difficulty?—Was it paid for public purposes? No such thing:—it was public money, used for his own private emolument. How did lord Melville ask for advances of money on this chest account? He asked in an undisguised, open manner, in the same way he asked for the 40,000*l*. for which he has received an indemnity. He said, I want so much money, and Mr. Trotter immediately sent it, without asking any further questions; and he delivered the account comprehending all the advances to lord Melville at the end of the year. He must also have known, that the account current was an account with the public, though there was a shadow between them in that; but in this, there was neither substance nor shadow. This account was likewise increased to the amount of 22,000*l*. or 23,000*l*. But there was a particular sum of money which passed from the one to the other of these accounts, which connects the two, so as alone to substantiate the whole of our charge, and to make it impossible he should not have known it was all public money.

Your lordships recollect, that in the year 1797, a national loan was obtained by the subscriptions of a number of eminent individuals, as well as respectable merchants and other persons, called, The Loyalty Loan:* to which, I heard lord Melville say, it was generally understood, that all persons in high situations of government ought to subscribe. He put down his name for 10,000*l*. which sum he candidly acknowledged was not in his possession; and therefore he was to obtain it from other sources. The noble defendant has said, that he believed the early payments upon his subscription to this loan were made from Scotland. But not a shilling of it came from thence. Every payment was made by Mr. Trotter, and every payment out of the public money.

Mr. Trotter first of all carried this 10,000*l*. to the account current; but in consequence of lord Melville not repaying any part of the money, as had been expected by Mr. Trotter, he began to be alarmed: and he transferred the charge from the account current to the chest account. He told lord Melville he had done so; and he received his lordship's approbation for having done it: he (Trotter) telling him that he had done it, because he did not dare to stand responsible for the addition of so large a sum. Can there be any thing more conclusive than this? Here lord Melville knew, not from inference, but from direct information from the accounts in black and white laid before him, that the purchase had been made with public money.

My lords, that this chest account also did exist, I can show, notwithstanding the book in which it was contained is destroyed. I can prove its existence by living witnesses, who saw the book in which it was written. Mr. Trotter's story will be confirmed; and your lordships may believe him in this, as well as in every other part of his testimony.

My lords, if we do not make out this article which charges the chest account; and if it be not proved to be a continuation of the chest account, which was originally opened by Mr. Douglas, for the purpose of entering the sums, which were advanced for the private use of lord Melville; I think there never was any thing established in a court of justice.

I now come to the more particular history of that which Mr. Trotter called the account current, between himself and lord Melville. The account current is that in which lord Melville was generally debited and credited for his payments to, and receipts from Mr. Trotter.

My lords, when Mr. Trotter was first made paymaster of the navy, he was not in the Navy pay office.—He had been out of the office for something more than a year, I believe: and during that time he had attempted to set up in business as a navy agent, in which he did not succeed. Before that, he had been in the Navy pay office for several years, at a salary of 50*l*. a year, at first; and afterwards, not exceeding 100*l*.—I will prove that, till he was made paymaster, his private fortune was nothing. The legacies afterwards left to him by his friends and relations were very trifling. One of them, an elder brother, who died a short time before his advancement, had left him about 2,000*l*. and that was all Mr. Trotter had in the world.—Lord Melville perfectly well knew this; yet as soon as he had appointed him paymaster, he made him his private agent; and within four months he began to borrow money of him without interest.—Now, can any man believe that lord Melville could be so ignorant of the common affairs of life, as not to know that Mr. Trotter could not possibly furnish such advances from his own funds? That no man, without some particular reason, could lend him money without interest? And must he not have known the particular reason here to have been, that the lender had the advantage of using the public money? But, beyond that, Mr. Trotter will tell your lordships, that he has, at different times, expressed his gratitude to lord Melville for the situation in which he had placed him. And that gratitude was expressed, not for the salary of 500*l.* a year, but for the other advantages attending his situation.

My lords, upon fully examining these perplexed accounts, on casting and re-casting, on considering and re-considering, and turning them over in our minds, in every way, we find that certain sums were not only paid, as lord Melville has said, from the mixed and undistinguished funds of Mr. Trotter, but that, at particular times, for instance, in September 1792, when Mr. Trotter had not any money at his banker's, he paid in a draft on the Bank for 8,000*l.* and with that he purchased 4,000*l.* East India stock; one half for himself, and the other half for lord Melville (this, independent of the larger transactions of 13,500*l.* in the same stock). Lord Melville will perhaps say he did not know of this; but could he be so blind as to find this stock purchased with the advance of money from other persons without interest, and not suspect that the money was obtained in a way different from that in which other people obtained their money? He must not only have suspected it, but have known it.

But, my lords, to go back to the origin of this account—How did it begin?—With the loan of a certain sum upon security. I have heard lord Melville say, that Mr. Trotter had given no account of the securities he had in his hands. From this, during the course of eighteen years, one might have expected to have found a long list of securities: what do they amount to? One single solitary bond given in 1787 for 4,000*l.*, which was cancelled and destroyed many years ago; and which, whilst existing, carried evidence upon its face, that it was given for public money, for it did not bear interest; and Mr. Trotter's reason for not charging interest was, that he thought it was a proper compliment to the treasurer of the navy.—Good God! my lords; could a man be so complimented without knowing that the man who paid him the compliment was practising fraud somewhere?—Shall a man come to me and say, I will lend you four thousand pounds, when I know he is not worth four thousand pence?—Shall he be living in a style which out of his legitimate income, I know he cannot afford? Shall he actually lend me 4,000*l.* without interest, and must I not know that he must have obtained it fraudulently?

Is it then true, that lord Melville did not participate in the public money? Says lord Melville, It was Mr. Trotter did this, and I had no hand in it.—Does the evidence upon the fact correspond with that assertion? We shall prove that this 4,000*l.* was taken out of a pure, unmixed fund of public money, in which Mr. Trotter had not one farthing of his own.—It was taken from the unmixed fund of Exchequer fees, which was all public money. This account current contained also originally the advance for the Loyalty loan; and it contained various sums of money, amounting in the whole, as we charge, to the sum of 22,000*l.* or thereabouts.

I shall presently have occasion to call the attention (and I think it must excite the admiration) of your lordships, to the surprising memory of these two persons. When all their accounts were gone, memory served them both, so as to be correct in their separate statements to a fraction.

Lord Melville has endeavoured to show, that Mr. Trotter received large sums on account of his salary, on account of monies sent from Scotland, and others, of which he has given no account. But Mr. Trotter carried all the monies he received to the account of lord Melville; and after all, he remained debtor to Mr. Trotter, in the sum of twenty-two thousand pounds, or thereabouts, on the account current. But were there any large sums regularly paid into the hands of Mr. Trotter for lord Melville? We can show your lordships, by negative evidence, that there were not, excepting only his salary as treasurer of the navy. This was originally kept in a separate account; and there was also a separate account kept for the Melville Castle Indiaman; but it having been found to be inconvenient to keep so many accounts, they were reduced to two; and to the account current every farthing of the salary of lord Melville was carried.

But lord Melville held other high offices in the state.—He was secretary of state; for that he received no emolument during the time he was treasurer of the navy.—He was president of the board of control; for that he did, a part of the time, receive a stipend. Who was his agent for the receipt of that? Not Mr. Trotter, but Mr. Meheux. Who received the fees arising from his office of secretary of state? Mr. Pollock.—Who received his salary as keeper of the signet? Mr. Warrender.—Who received his salary as keeper of the privy seal? Mr. Dundas, the writer to the signet.—Did they account to Mr. Trotter for what they received? No.—Did these sums ever come into his account? No. Only some accidental occasional payments sent up from Scotland. The regular payments from his private estates, were received by Mr. Robert Trotter, or Mr. Dundas.—Mr. Alexander Trotter never received any of them; they never passed into his accounts at all. He was credited for every thing that did come; but the money arising from the various sources I have stated in fact never came into his account current: and at the conclusion of it lord Melville was indebted to Mr. Trotter or to the public in that account, 22,000*l*.

Now, my lords, we are coming rapidly to the conclusion of this scene, and a most interesting conclusion it formed.—Lord Melville has declared he liked the office of treasurer of the navy, much better than the office of secretary of state. For the purpose of some political arrangement however, before Mr. Pitt went out of office, he resigned the treasurer-ship of the navy, and was succeeded by lord Harrowby. It then became necessary for Mr. Trotter to make up his deficiencies, which amounted at that time to 220,000*l*.

I would not consume your lordships' time in details more minute than are absolutely necessary; but perhaps it may be as well to say, that large sums were paid through the account current to particular persons, on lord Melville's account. Messieurs Mansfield, Ramsey and company of Edinburgh, received 5,000*l*., sent through Mr. Robert Trotter of Edinburgh. With this 5,000*l*. a heritable bond, or landed security, was redeemed, by which means lord Melville got rid of the payment of five per cent. upon that advance; having obtained the loan for its discharge, without interest. Another sum, which it is not now material to specify, was paid through Mr. Robert Trotter to sir William Forbes, by which lord Melville redeemed securities at interest also, with money for which he paid no interest, and gave no security whatever.

To return to what I was stating, as to the conclusion of the transaction—There being a difference between the Bank balance and the official balance of 220,000*l*., Mr. Trotter stated it to lord Melville. Give me leave here to remark to your lordships, that Mr. Trotter had, at the end of the year 1799, paid into the Bank, on the 31st of December, all the sums of money due to the public, which had been taken out for his own private use, but he did not pay up the sum which might have been, at the time, in the possession of lord Melville.

It was proved, before the commissioners of naval inquiry, that on the 31st of December, 1790, Mr. Trotter had made up the whole of the deficient balance at the Bank; and if he had taken the same precaution every year, which he might easily have done, by the sort of machinery used then, such as giving drafts to the sub-accountants, which were not to be presented till the morrow, or perhaps some days after their date; or if he had obtained a sum of money from Coutts's, to be repaid the next day; if by such expedients he had annually made good his accounts, it is most likely these discoveries would never have been made; but having done it once, he did not think himself bound to make good lord Melville's deficiencies every year; and it will be proved, that from 1790 down to 1799, every deficiency at the Bank, on the 31st of December, in each year, was the deficiency occasioned by the money advanced by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville, for part of which he knew he was debtor to the public immediately, and for the rest of which, Mr. Trotter stood between him and the public.

This being the state of the case, in March, 1800, Mr. Trotter told lord Melville, that on his going out of office, it was necessary all deficiencies should be made good; and he laid before him an accurate statement in writing, drawn out by his clerks, and examined by himself, showing lord Melville what he was to furnish, and what he (Trotter) was to make up. The chest account, and the account current, were both placed before him. That part of the deficiency which lord Melville was to make good, comprehended the debt due upon the account current, as well as upon the chest account: and this statement must have brought to his knowledge the fact, that the advances upon both accounts were from public money. Lord Melville's share of the deficiency amounted at that time, altogether, to the sum of 71,000*l*. What means did lord Melville take to make up this sum? First of all, the stock that had been bought for lord Melville's use, and the dividends upon which had been carried to his credit, were all sold, except a parcel of favourite stock; which was the 13,500*l*. East India stock, purchased with money lent to him at interest by some person then unknown, but now proved to have been Mr. Trotter. He could not but be known now, because the India stock was retained, and money borrowed upon it. It was supposed to be pledged to some other person for the money with which it had been purchased: but it could not carry double; it could not carry Trotter and his friend too. That would be rather too hard. But there was only one person upon it, and that was Mr. Trotter. Upon the suggestion of Mr. Trotter, and with the assistance of a near and dear relation of the noble lord's, who added his security, Mr. Sprot advanced 56,000*l*. to lord Melville, partly on the security of that very East India stock which Mr. Trotter, as it is supposed, had borrowed money to purchase.

My lords, is it possible that no conversation should have taken place at this juncture? Must not lord Melville have signified to Mr. Trotter his intention of keeping this stock? which must have produced an explanation. Mr. Sprot was not a man so loose in his money dealing, as not to look well to his securities. He took possession of this stock, and upon the security of it he advanced his money, which, as he will tell you, was out rather longer than he could have wished. Lord Melville himself gave him possession of it, and with the advances he made good a part of his deficiencies at the Bank.

The estimated produce of the stock, at the price of the day, amounting to about 32,700*l*., was paid by Mr. Trotter on lord Melville's account in this manner: 20,000*l*. he took to himself, to repay the balance due to him on the advance made for the original purchase, and paid it into the act of parliament account at the Bank, in discharge of his own deficiency. The excess, viz. 12,743*l.* was paid in discharge of a part of lord Melville's deficiency, so that lord Melville obtained the benefit of the difference between 23,000*l.*, which the stock originally cost, and the 32,700*l.* for which it was sold.

It appears, however, that with the produce of this, and other stock, that was sold to the amount of nineteen thousand pounds and upwards, lord Melville had not money enough; he was under the necessity of applying to Messrs. Coutts, and they lent him, in the regular course of business, upon good security, 13,000*l.* This sum of 13,000*l.* he paid immediately into his public account at the Bank. We know the clerk who paid it, and we have the bank-notes with which it was paid; we know the money was drawn by a draft, signed with lord Melville's own hand. Let me ask; if he was not indebted to the public, why did he pay this money out of his private pocket? He could not intend to make a present to the public of the 13,000*l.* nor of the 32,000*l.* nor of the 19,000*l.*

Still the account was not clear. In addition to all that had been done, he made the public pay itself. After having put all these sums together, they did not make up the balance. In this emergency, he went back to a gentleman, to whom he had lent money some years before; the treasurer of 1782. He said, I served you a good turn in 1784. You shall serve me a good turn now; you shall help me to make up the remaining balance, amounting to 5,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* I pray your lordships to attend to the specific sum. The money was in the Bank of England, its proper place; in the account of the ex-treasurer of the navy, from which it could not be so removed without a violation of law. He took it out of his ex-treasurership account, and paid it into the account of his second treasurership. Why, what a farce and mockery is this! "I have made up all my accounts; I am not debtor to the public in a single shilling; and I have never used any of the public money for any other than public purposes."

My lords, with respect to the balance of the ex-treasurership, it has been asserted that lord Melville did not know where to pay it. Where did the great lord Chatham place the balances remaining in his hands at the time he went out of office? He placed them in the Bank, that no imputation might rest upon him. Where were lord Melville's balances as ex-treasurer of the navy? At the Bank; whence he took them and placed them in his own pocket; making them a part of that screen, whereby he contrived to make that appear square, just, and right; which was neither square, just, nor right; but unjust, wrong, and crooked throughout.

My lords, we have brought these transactions to a point, beyond which it is almost impossible for circumstances to go, if I have not egregiously failed in my statement to your lordships. We are now upon the eminence where I engaged to place you. You must now see all the transactions of those eighteen years. How the stream of corruption, of smaller dimensions in the beginning, swelled in its progress to a much greater volume; till the whole was returned to the gulf whence its origin was derived. The termination of his dealings alone would convict the noble defendant of the crimes and misdemeanors we allege against him. We shall farther prove to your lordships, that these acts were notorious; and that they were known to be improper and illegal during the whole time they were carried on. That they were brought to the notice of lord Melville; that some of those persons who were criminally engaged in the transactions, and are now indemnified, knew the illegality and impropriety of such conduct, but none dared to accuse. We could prove to your lordships, by a memorable instance, that the Bank knew such things were done. A conversation took place between the noble defendant and one of his colleagues, in which the matter was mentioned to him; but he contrived to put it aside, and the inquiry was not prosecuted.

At the time Mr. Trotter lent him the first 4,000*l.* without interest, it must have come under his consideration. At the time of the purchase of the East-India stock, it must again have been forcibly impressed upon his mind, by the remarkable conversation which then took place; and, at the conclusion of the whole it was again so manifest, that if he had before believed Mr. Trotter possessed the philosopher's stone, and could conjure up as much money as he pleased, he must then at least have discovered that the secret was in the treasurer's cash account at the Bank. My lords, Mr. Coutts knew this to be improper, and so stated it to Mr. Trotter. Mr. Wilson, who acted for Mr. Trotter in his absence, but never made any use of the public money for himself, knew it to be improper, and (to use his own forcible expression), always acted in trembling. But this answer may be given. What? if these things were notorious during so many years, and were not taken notice of, is there not a great degree of persecution in charging lord Melville criminally at this distance of time? My lords, we deny that the charges have been exhibited in any but the true spirit of justice. We claim credit from your lordships for so much in the name of the Commons of the United Kingdom. We contend that the Commons are just and honourable prosecutors of the noble defendant. They cannot act in the spirit of persecution; and not only they cannot act in that spirit, but even those of their members who have had the conduct of this business, cannot have acted in the spirit of persecution either. Persecution is an odious and disgusting compound of malevolence and power.

Has our conduct betrayed any thing like malevolence? If it has, our conduct has done injustice to our feelings. We have no malevolent feelings whatever; and I trust and hope we are free from such imputation by the acknowledgment of the noble defendant himself. As to power! Was the hand of power stretched forth to crush a weak and unfortunate individual, who might be obnoxious to the court, or no favourite with the people? No, my lords: the noble defendant, at the time he was first attacked, was a man in great power, holding one of the highest offices in the state; assisted and protected as long as it was possible by one of the most able men, and the most powerful minister that has almost ever existed in this country. He had friends innumerable, and many friends he still possesses, even among your lordships. It was the voice of justice that spoke, or that voice could not have prevailed. But the very notoriety of the transactions, shows how powerful he was, and how impossible to institute the prosecution at an earlier time. Many knew, but nobody dared to tell. Why? Because he was all powerful in the vessel of the state; from the keelson to the top gallant mast head he was every where. His influence was felt in all quarters. When he issued forth from his habitation in Somerset-place, could he go to the east, and not see proofs of his power? If he turned to the west, he was in the seat of his power also. Did not his patronage extend from the sources of the Ganges to the Orkneys? Was there a ship sailed which was not fraught with tokens of his sway? Was there an exciseman made, or a viceroy appointed, that he was not consulted?—If these things were so, my lords, can we be surprised that inquiries were not sooner instituted? The knowledge of these transactions was extended to a large description of persons; but to the House of Commons as such, they were unknown, or known only to some of its members in a particular manner. It required some extraordinary circumstances in the political world to make it possible to bring the noble defendant to trial, and, as I hope, to justice. It required, first of all, a person to set things in motion. Happily such a person existed. The predecessor of the noble lord in the Admiralty. He whose fame was cradled under the blazing batteries of Quebec; he, the conqueror off Cape St. Vincent; he who, with a salutary disregard to precedence, selected the immortal Nelson, and sent him to the battle of the Nile; thereby preparing him for the everlasting day of Trafalgar, his sweet and glorious death; he who at this moment is carrying the British flag triumphant before the blockaded ports of the enemy; or if he has again ventured forth, is even now inflicting upon him fresh vengeance; adding to our security, and his own great renown. He it was who, in the interval between the more perilous duties of his profession, being appointed to the administration of our navy, set a splendid example to power: * he did that which many have been too justly reproached with neglecting. Whilst in the exercise of power, he endeavoured to deprive it of that factitious and depraved addition of influence arising from abuse; he set on foot inquiries. Those inquiries were followed by legislative provisions; those legislative provisions appointed men to investigate abuses in the naval department, who, to their immortal honour, will be remembered in the annals of their country, the naval commissioners.† To them the praise, to them the merit of the investigation. To them all the honour for the good which must result from this prosecution. To us only the secondary praise and the grateful reflection of having done our duty.

My lords, we shall also have to prove that lord Melville made great profit of the public money. But we shall have in answer to that, that lord Melville is not rich, and that if a man had taken all this money, he must be a rich man. My lords, the acquisition of money and riches are perfectly distinct. That lord Melville is a slave to the passion of avarice in its most sordid form, that he likes money for its own sake, was never imputed to him by me or any man.

But if a man loves money for its own sake, he may perhaps be less dangerous than if he loves it for any other cause; and if he loves money as the means of acquiring any other thing, he must part with money, to obtain it. Avarice, in its naked form, is so disgusting, that “to be shunned, it needs but to be seen.” As the pander of other passions, she is less hideous, but far more mischievous. She is as truly herself, when disguised under the fascinating mask of pleasure and hospitality, as when sitting amidst her filthy hoards. But she assumes her most formidable shape, when she becomes the tool of power. To what

* On May 14, 1806, the following resolution was passed by the House of Commons: “That it appears to this House, that the conduct of the Earl of St. Vincent, in his late naval administration, has added an additional lustre to his exalted character, and is entitled to the approbation of this House.” See also the case of the Hedgeses, antè, vol. 28. p. 1315.

† On May 2, 1805, the House of Commons passed a vote of thanks to the commissioners of naval inquiry in the following resolution: “That the commissioners appointed by an act of the 43rd year of his majesty’s reign, to inquire and examine into any irregularities, frauds, or abuses, which are and have been practised by persons employed in the several naval departments therein mentioned, have, as far as appears from the reports which they have hitherto made, exerted themselves with great diligence, ability, and fortitude; and that their conduct in the execution of the arduous duties entrusted to them, entitles them to the warmest approbation and encouragement of this House.”

enormities have not men, in all ages, been driven, to obtain money as the means of power? And if this ill-gotten money was employed by the noble defendant for the purpose of obtaining political influence in Scotland or elsewhere, the consequences of his rapacity are more to be guarded against than would have been the bare accumulation of wealth.

I shall trouble your lordships with but very few more words; but general impressions have been sometimes created, with regard to particular men, which make it almost impossible for those who have lived in habits with them to believe, that they should have done the thing of which they have been accused, even if the most incontestible evidence is brought against them. Many may say, lord Melville is of a spirit so frank and generous, we know so well the good qualities of his heart, that notwithstanding the evidence before our eyes, it is impossible we should believe he has done things so reprehensible. Your lordships, I doubt not would spurn at a general defence of that sort. But we are all liable to the influence of our partialities and passions: and if this were the first instance in which a peer of parliament had been so charged, even I and my honourable friends behind me, might hesitate, and say, let us consider whether what we have proved can be true. Are the things before our eyes possible?—Alas! my lords, we can refer you to the page of history. Look back, and unfortunately you will see how many splendid personages have appeared at your bar, impeached for the same sort of offence which we charge upon the noble lord. Several instances have occurred. But there is one whose name is great among mankind, who, in the agony of his soul before his peers, confessed that he had been guilty of peculation:—that man was lord Bacon. Of whom, without detracting from any who has lived in times past or present, it may be said in whose writings wisdom dwell;—upon whose lips she hung; who knew every avenue to the human heart, and has pointed out to each its appropriate guard; of whom it was said by the marquis d'Effiat, with an almost pardonable hyperbole, that he resembled the angels; so that when he stood and shook the plumes of his immortal genius, that heavenly fragrance so filled the circuit wide of the intellectual world, he might well have been mistaken for one of the celestial band. Even he, by this degrading passion, was thrown to the earth, and the basest among the sons of men might say, "Art thou, too, become like one of us?"—If then, lord Bacon did so, may not lord Melville have done so? My lords, hat he has done so, we aver, and we will prove it irresistibly to his conviction.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, April 30, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall in the same order as on Tuesday last.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the Lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we shall now proceed to adduce the evidence in support of the articles exhibited against lord viscount Melville; and the learned manager near me will take charge of that part of the case.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the first evidence which the managers propose adducing to your lordships is intended to establish the introductory matter contained in the preamble of the articles of impeachment. For this purpose we first refer your lordships to the act of the 20th of the present king, chapter 54, appointing commissioners to examine the public accounts of the kingdom. I apprehend it will not be necessary to give your lordships the trouble of hearing that act read. I only notice it as a matter of form, and shall proceed to offer to your lordships the reports made by those commissioners. I at present mean to trouble your lordships with only the third and the eighth of them, and I shall call upon Mr. Whittam (who is an officer of the House of Commons, in whose possession those reports are) to produce them.

Then George Whittam, esq. came to the bar, when the clerk administered the oath as follows:

The evidence that you shall give upon the Impeachment of Henry viscount Melville shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God, and the contents of this book.

Mr. Giles.—Are you clerk of the Journals of the House of Commons?

Mr. Whittam.—I am.

Mr. Giles.—Have you in your custody the reports of the commissioners appointed to examine the public accounts of the kingdom?

Mr. Whittam.—I have.

Mr. Giles.—Will you produce the third and eighth reports of the commissioners?

Mr. Whittam.—This is the third report, and this is the eighth [producing them].

[The witness was directed to withdraw].

Lord Chancellor.—Do you read the whole, or only a part?

Mr. Giles.—We wish only for a part; if the learned counsel for the defendant call for any other part we have no objection to its being read.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am not apprized what part of the third report the honourable managers wish to select in support of the prosecution.—That third report appears to me an extremely material one—I am not at present prepared to point out the specific passages I think material.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the managers have no objection to the whole report being entered as read, and that will give the learned counsel the advantage of the whole.

Lord Chancellor.—Do the counsel for lord Melville consent to that course being adopted? if not, the whole must be read.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am afraid the passages we rely upon must be read at some time or other, and, perhaps, it will not signify at what time that is done.

Mr. Whitbread.—It will perhaps save much time if the whole is read at once.

Then the third report of the commissioners of public accounts was read, and is as follows:

“To the honourable the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled.

“The third report of the commissioners appointed to examine, take, and state, the public accounts of the kingdom.

“Having finished our examinations of all those public accountants that came to our knowledge in the first class, as far as relates to the balances of public money in their hands, we, in the next place, directed our attention to those accountants who receive public money out of the Exchequer, by way of imprest, and upon account.

“The certificate of the accounts depending in the office of the auditors of the imprest, transmitted to us pursuant to our precept, furnished us with a list of these accountants: as much of this certificate as relates to the subject matter of this present report, is inserted in the Appendix. We took them into our consideration in the order in which they stand upon that certificate; a rule we pursue in regard to all lists of accountants, unless there is some special reason for departing from it.

“The set of accountants therein first mentioned, are the treasurers of the navy; and of these, the names that stand first are the executors of Anthony viscount Falkland, whose final account is dated the 4th of April 1689, and from whom a balance of twenty-seven thousand six hundred and eleven pounds six shillings and five-pence farthing, is declared to be then due. We did not mis-spend our time in a pursuit where there was so little probability of benefit to the public: a debt that has subsisted for near a century, may be presumed desperate. Passing over therefore this article, we issued our precepts to earl Temple, as representative of the late George Grenville, esquire; to lord viscount Barrington, lord viscount Howe, and to sir Gilbert Elliot, baronet, as representative of the late sir Gilbert Elliot, for an account of the public money in their hands, custody, or power, as late treasurers of the navy. The returns made to our precepts are set forth in the Appendix; from which it appears that the balances of public money remaining in their respective hands, upon the days therein mentioned, amounted together to the sum of seventy-six thousand seven hundred ninety-three pounds eighteen shillings and one penny farthing.

“That we might learn for what reasons, services, or purposes, these sums are permitted to remain in the hands of treasurers of the navy, so long after they are out of office, we examined several of the offices in this department, namely, George Swaffield, esquire, cashier of the victualling; Andrew Douglas, esquire, paymaster; Mr. Adam Jellicoe, chief clerk to the paymaster; and Mr. Francis Cook, ledger writer. By them we are supplied with the following information:

“The office of the treasurer of the navy is divided into three branches, the paymaster's, the cashier's, and the victualling branch. All the money he receives is for the navy services, and placed under, or carried over to one of these branches; the money in each branch is subdivided, arranged, and kept under various different heads of services; the whole balance, at the time he leaves the office, continues to be liable, whether it be in his hands or in the hands of his representatives in case of his death, to the same services for which its several parts were originally destined; and the commissioners of the Navy, Victualling, and Sick and Hurt offices, each in their several departments, continue to assign bills upon him for payment, until they have reduced his balance to such a sum as, in their opinions, will not be more than sufficient to answer purposes for which it has been usual to leave money with him, until his final account is passed. These purposes are, first, to carry on the recalls upon those ships books which were open in his treasurership, and the payment of the half-pay list and bounties to chaplains. The ships books are usually kept open for recalls for seven or eight years after the expiration of the treasurership, in order to give those seamen who, by being either turned over to other ships, or employed in other places, could not attend at the time their ship was paid, an opportunity of receiving their wages when it is in their power to apply for them. The only fund applicable to this service is the money in the pay branch, placed under the head of “to pay ships and carry on recalls:” this service is at an end when the ships books are made up. They are made up as they come in course in order of time; and after the last is closed, the half-pay lists are also closed, and the payment of the bounty to chaplains ceases.

“The other purpose is to pay the fees and expenses of carrying on, making up and passing his accounts. Upon passing every annual account, fees are paid to the auditors of the imprest, out of the money in his hands, under the head of “To pay Exchequer fees, and other contingent expenses of the Pay-office;” but upon passing his final account, there is a gratuity also paid in the following manner:—The officers and clerks who transact the business of the treasurer in office, carry on also at the same time, and finally make up the accounts of the treasurers out of office; for which extra work they have no salary or recompence whatever, until the final account is ready to be passed, at which time it has been usual for them, by petition to the lords of the Treasury, to obtain a reasonable allowance for their trouble, which has been paid them by virtue of a Treasury warrant, out of any money remaining in the hands of that treasurer, under whatever heads of service it may be placed. This gratuity, together with the fees of passing the annual accounts, and for the quietus, it is imagined, will exhaust the whole balance now remaining in the hands of lord Temple.

“All the ships books which were paid by Mr. Grenville, lord Barrington, and lord Howe, are made up, and consequently the balances which the three boards have left in the hands of these treasurers must be for the purpose of paying the fees and expenses of carrying on, making up, and passing their accounts. Of sir Gilbert Elliot's ship books, five hundred and six are still open for recalls; and payments, if applied for, are made upon them once a week; and therefore, whatever sums stand upon his account, in his paymaster's branch, under the heads of wages, half-pay, and bounties to chaplains, are still applicable to those services; and the residue of the money permitted to remain with him, is for the purpose of paying the fees and expenses of carrying on, making up, and passing his accounts.

“How soon then will these several sums be wanted for this purpose? the accounts of the treasurers of the navy are made up and passed as they come in course in order of time; the officers must finish one year before they begin upon another; and a subsequent treasurer's account is never finished till his predecessor's is finally closed. The state in which their accounts are, in the office of the auditors of the imprest, is this:—The last which is declared, is Mr. Grenville's account for the year 1758: of all the subsequent accounts, only some sections of their respective navy and victualling ledgers are delivered into this office; which parts of a treasurer's accounts are usually sent thither as speedily as they can be made up after the year expires.

“From an account of the balances remaining in the hands of these treasurers, at the times they respectively ceased to be treasurers; and an account of the times when their last ships books were made up; and a state of Mr. Grenville's balances, and of the balances of lord Barrington, lord Howe, and sir Gilbert Elliot, every year since they severally went out of office, all transmitted to us from the Pay office of the navy, pursuant to our requisitions, we find that Mr. Grenville resigned this office in 1762, and his last ship's book was made up in 1771; that lord Barrington resigned this office in 1765, and his last ship's book was made up in 1775; that lord Howe resigned this office in 1770, and his last ship's book was made up in 1778; and that sir Gilbert Elliot died in 1777: hence it appears, that for near nineteen years there has been in the hands of Mr. Grenville, or of his representatives, and for fifteen years in the hands of lord Barrington, and for ten years in the hands of lord Howe, and for three years in the hands of the representatives of sir Gilbert Elliot, considerable sums of public money (exclusive of the sums on the heads of wages, half pay, and bounty to chaplains), destined to purposes which (except the passing three years of Mr. Grenville's accounts) have not yet existed, and which, if we may judge from the progress hitherto made in passing these accounts, are not likely soon to exist.

“Where public money is appointed for a service or purpose to arise at a future time, we are of opinion, the public alone ought to have the custody and use of that money, in the mean time, and until the service or purpose calls for its application.

“When the fees and the gratuity become payable, we see no reason why the treasurer in office should not pay them, in like manner as the treasurers out of office pay them now.

“We did not form our opinion upon these balances without first hearing the late treasurers themselves, or the representatives of those who are dead; and therefore we examined earl Temple, lord viscount Barrington, lord viscount Howe, and sir Gilbert Elliot, baronet; not one of whom made any objection to paying their balances into the Exchequer, upon condition, some of receiving their quietus, others of being made secure in such payments. We do therefore conceive, that the balances of public money, now remaining in the hands of earl Temple, as representative of the late George Grenville, esquire, and in the hands of lord viscount Barrington, and of lord viscount Howe, and of sir Gilbert Elliot, baronet, as representative of sir Gilbert Elliot, late treasurers of the navy, ought to be paid into the Exchequer, for the public service, leaving in the hands of sir Gilbert Elliot the sums in his account placed under the heads of wages, half pay, and bounties to chaplains, to carry on the services to which the same are applicable; that such payments should be without prejudice, and a proper security and indemnification be given to each of them against any loss or detriment that may accrue to them in consequence of such payments.

“The right honourable Welbore Ellis, the present treasurer of the navy, returned to our requisition, a balance in his hands upon the 31st of August last, of three hundred forty-eight thousand nine hundred forty-one pounds eleven shillings and nine-pence. The act directs us to examine into all balances in the hands of public accountants, for the purpose of considering what sum may be taken out of their hands to be applied to the public service. It is obvious, we could not examine the balance in the hands of the treasurer in office with this view; it could not be in our power to say, that any part of it ought to be paid back into the Exchequer, because, in an office of so constant and large an expenditure, this sum must probably be exhausted, even while it was under our consideration; but it was competent to us, and we thought it our duty, to examine whether this was a larger sum than the current business of the office required should at that time be entrusted to the treasurer of the navy. A comparison between the quantum of the sum, and the demands upon it, would enable us to form some judgment upon this point; with this view we examined the present treasurer himself, Timothy Brett, esquire, commissioner of the navy and comptroller of the treasurer's accounts, John Slade, esquire, commissioner of the victualling, and John Bell, esquire, commissioner of the sick and hurt; from whom we collect the following information.

"All the money received by the treasurer, for the services of the navy, is either issued to him out of the Exchequer, or paid to him by sundry persons, in pursuance of the directions of the navy, victualling, or sick and hurt boards. The money from the Exchequer is issued to him, and arranged in his accounts under various heads of services; these heads are kept distinct; and he cannot place or transfer a sum issued to him under one head, to any other head of service. All bills assigned upon him for payment by these boards, specify the correspondent head of service out of which that bill is to be paid, and he must not pay it out of money placed under any other head of service than that so specified on the bill.

"When money is wanted, the application for it never originally moves from the treasurer, except in the single instance of money to pay fees, and other contingent expenses; this he craves of himself, when that fund is nearly exhausted: in all other cases, the board, in whose department it is, by letter, desire him to present a memorial to the lords of the Treasury, specifying the sum wanted, and for what particular service; the memorial pursues the letter, and the issue is directed from the Exchequer in the terms of the memorial. The treasurer immediately certifies to the navy board the whole sum he receives, and to the other boards, so much of that sum as concerns them; he also transmits to the navy board an account of all his receipts and payments in the cashier's and victualling branch every fortnight, and in the pay branch every month; by these means they have an exact knowledge of the state of his balance under each head of service. Each of these boards enter in their books all the assignments they make upon him for payment; of which they transmit to him a list; hence they know what the actual demands upon him amount to; and from their experience in the course of the navy business, they can form some conjecture relative to the probable approaching demands that may be made upon him in the various branches of the service. By such knowledge and conjecture these boards are guided in their directions to the treasurer, as to the time when, the quantum of the sum, and the service for which every application for a supply is to be made to the Treasury.

"At the end of every month the navy board transmit to the Treasury a certificate, containing an exact state of all the receipts and payments made by the treasurer during that month, as they appear from their books; hence the lords of the Treasury have full knowledge of the state of his balance every month: this certificate for the month of August last we procured from the Navy office, on which the balance in the hands of the treasurer appears to be two hundred sixty thousand seven hundred sixteen pounds one shilling and eight-pence farthing.

"Being made acquainted thus far with the course of business in this office, our next step was to resolve this balance of three hundred forty-eight thousand nine hundred forty-one pounds eleven shillings and nine-pence into its constituent parts, and compare the quantum of each part, as far as we could, with the actual and probable demands of service upon it on the 31st of August, the date of his return.

"The first circumstance that engaged our attention, was a difference between the treasurer's balance and the navy balance, upon the same day, the 31st of August, the former exceeding the latter by the sum of eighty-eight thousand two hundred twenty-five pounds ten shillings and three-farthings; this difference lies in the cashier's and victualling branches, and arises from the following cause:—when the three boards assign bills upon the treasurer for payment, they immediately give him credit for those bills, in his account kept at their offices; but the treasurer does not himself take credit for any bills in his own account till he actually pays them. The persons who receive these bills do not always immediately present them to the treasurer for payment, but frequently keep them in their possession for a considerable time. The treasurer's balance must, therefore, exceed the navy balance, as much as the sum of the bills assigned upon him for payment exceeds the sum of the bills actually paid by him. We conceive this excess is not money for which the treasurer is accountable to the public, but belongs to the proprietors of those bills, and remains in his hands, at their risk, until they apply to him for payment. This sum, therefore, we think, should be deducted from his balance.

"We, in the next place, observed that several sums in each branch were not actually in the hands of the treasurer, but of his officers and clerks, either carrying on services in London, or at the distant ports, whither these sums were directed to be sent by the navy board, to carry on the services at those ports: it may reasonably be presumed that the boards would not have directed into the hands of the officers, nor the treasurer have entrusted them with, larger sums than were wanted; and therefore these sums too, may be deducted from the treasurer's balance; which will reduce the public money actually in his hands to the sum of one hundred twenty-eight thousand eighty-three pounds sixteen shillings and ten pence farthing, as appears by the state inserted in the Appendix. The constituent parts of this balance, under their several heads of service, consisting of a variety of articles, are stated in the navy certificate; some of them carry the appearance of having been applied for sooner than the services seem to have required; but, upon examination, we find that the boards do not direct an application for a supply to any fund, until they know that fund is nearly, or likely soon to be exhausted. The Treasury are sometimes prevented from granting the issue until many days after it is craved; and therefore the boards are careful to apply early enough, to guard against the hazard of a demand upon an exhausted fund. To search into the actual and probable demands, at that time, upon each of these sums, was hardly practicable; one circumstance alone might enable us to judge with sufficient accuracy, whether the sum total was too large or not; that is, in what time this balance was in fact paid away by the treasurer. It appears from his accounts for the month of August, that this whole balance, and much more, was received by him during that month; and by his accounts for the month of September, transmitted to us pursuant to our requisition, it appears, that not only the balance remaining on the 31st of August, but a much larger sum, was in fact paid away by him during the succeeding month. Considering, therefore, this sum by itself, independent of, and unconnected with, his other receipts and payments, prior and subsequent to the date of this balance, we have no grounds to say that this individual sum, received in one month, and paid away in the next, was more than the service required should be in the hands of the treasurer of the navy upon the 31st of August last.

"But it was necessary to extend our inquiry still farther. What is the amount of the sum that has been continually in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, and has that sum been more than the current services required? To come at this knowledge, we obtained from the Navy office an account of the total sums received and paid by the treasurer of the navy for every month, from the first of January 1779 to the 31st of August last, with the total of the balances remaining in his hands at the end of each month, as they appear in the monthly certificates to the Treasury.

"As the public money should pass without delay from the pocket of the subject into the Exchequer, so it ought not to issue out of the Exchequer, either before it is wanted, or in larger sums than the service for which it is issued requires. By this last account, a very large sum has been constantly in his hands, during the period therein mentioned, exclusive of the amount of bills assigned upon him, but not presented to him for payment. The principal cause of the magnitude of this balance is, the practice in this office, of not applying money issued under one head, towards satisfying a demand upon any other head of service; the consequence of which is, when the money upon the account of any head of service is nearly exhausted, a supply must be procured for that service, how abundant soever the sums upon other heads of accounts, or the sum total of his cash, may be. Were all the sums he receives to constitute and be considered as one common general cash, and be applied indiscriminately to every service, a much less sum than the lowest of the balances in the account last-mentioned would, in our opinion, suffice to carry on the current services of the navy, even various and extensive as they now are. It would create no confusion in the accounts; for the receipts and payments under each head of service might still be kept distinct; and though the payments might frequently exceed the receipts on some heads of accounts, yet the treasurer would not be without sufficient cash, and the next issue from the Exchequer would restore the balances. What the sum necessary for carrying on the service should be, must depend upon circumstances; it will be different at different times, and must be left principally to the discretion of those commissioners from whom the direction for supplies moves, who, being conversant in the business can best determine. But, to enable the lords of the Treasury likewise to judge of the propriety of, and be a check and control upon, the requisition, we are of opinion, that, besides the certificate sent every month from the navy board, an account of the sum total of the balance in the hands of the treasurer of the navy should be inserted in every application for a supply to the Treasury.

"We have not been inattentive to defects we have observed in this office during the course of our inquiries; defects which concern the officer, the office, and the public.

"The treasurer finds his business does not end with his office; his accounts are still open: he goes on, receiving and paying, until he feels himself, his family, and his fortune, subject to all the evils of long public accounts far in arrear, and the difficulties of rendering an account increasing daily: he continues responsible for millions, without an expectation of obtaining his final discharge during his life.

"The office is perplexed with the multiplicity of these accounts.—There are four distinct accounts of four treasurers of the navy, at this time open at the Pay office, and business is carried on upon every one of them at the same time, by the same officers, when the current business of the present treasurer alone would find employment enough for them all.

“There have been issued to three of these treasurers, for the navy services, upwards of thirty-three millions, the accounts of which are not passed; exclusive of above twenty-five millions to the late Mr. Grenville, whose final account is not yet settled; and of sixteen millions to the present treasurer, none of whose accounts could as yet be settled.

“The navy accounts in July last, when the imprest certificate was transmitted to us, were in arrear in the office of the auditor of the imprest twenty-two years. This delay is occasioned by the accounts of the subsequent years not being made up at the Pay office of the navy, where there is a want of officers and clerks for this department. A sufficient number of persons, intelligent in this branch, should forthwith be provided by the proper authority, with adequate salaries, for the sole purpose of proceeding upon, bringing forward, and making up these accounts, with as much dispatch as the nature of the business will admit.

“By this delay in making up the accounts, the public loses the use, at least, of considerable sums of their own money; not that the principal itself has always been safe. A defaulter of above twenty-seven thousand pounds stands at the head of the list of treasurers of the navy upon the imprest certificate.

“We inquired why a treasurer, under the present constitution of the office, might not, upon his resignation, immediately pay over his balance to the successor, or into the Exchequer, and all the subsequent transactions of office be carried on by the treasurer for the time being. Two reasons were assigned for the necessity of keeping open his accounts, though out of office.

1st. “That sufficient time may be given to his sub-accountants to clear their imprests.

“The sub-accountants are certainly very numerous; and as, according to the present mode of passing these accounts, they must all be set insuper upon the final account, was that account to be made up soon after the expiration of the treasurership, it would be very voluminous and troublesome to the office. But, since the treasurer in office does not clear the imprests of some of his predecessors, and can clear the imprests of all, and the three boards can, at their pleasure, call upon the sub-accountants to clear their imprests, we do not think this reason conclusive.

2nd. “That the payment of his ships books may be completed.

“A ship's book is the voucher for the treasurer who pays it: two cannot pay upon the same book; it would create confusion, as the payments of the one could not, without great trouble and difficulty, be distinguished from those of the other; it could not therefore be made a voucher for two treasurers. To enable a treasurer in office to carry on the payment of a ship's book, open in the time of his predecessor, the names of all the seamen not paid must be abstracted, and entered in a new book; a work of great labour and length of time, where the books are so numerous; and during all that time no payment of wages could be made to the seamen unpaid upon those books.

“Upon the examination of a ship's book, there appears a foundation for this objection, which opens a door for a possible mischief, worthy consideration. It is in the power of a treasurer of the navy, retiring in disgust, to refuse carrying on any more payments, and by that means to put a stop, for eight months or more, to the payment of all the seamen on the numerous volumes of ships books open at the several ports in his treasurership. Mr. Grenville left open above thirteen hundred. This evil does not rest in speculation: we have an instance of it in evidence. The office that does not guard against the possibility of such an evil, is fundamentally defective.

“These defects should be speedily corrected. To alter the constitution of the office: to abolish the subordinate treasury; to render a treasurer the mere accountant, and to vary the mode of accounting, carry with them a strong appearance of an effectual remedy: but were we, in the present state of our inquiries, to come to decisions of such moment, we should be premature, perhaps rash. It is easier to see the defects than to supply the regulation. The pay of the navy is an important object, and any alteration in the mode should be well weighed before it is adopted; it should be traced through all its effects, and perfectly ascertained to be as feasible in practice as it is specious in theory. To disturb, to confound, or to delay (effects not unfrequent, when novelty of form is introduced, and new principles applied to an old office) might be attended with very serious consequences.

“The defects, to which we have alluded, presented themselves in the course of an examination made, in obedience to the act, for a more limited purpose. Coming, however, before us, they are, in our opinion, too important to be passed over in silence: we thought it our duty to point them out, that, should they be deemed a proper subject for the exercise of the wisdom of the legislature, the solid advantages which would result to the public from their correction might not be delayed. Had we protracted this report until we were possessed of materials for a well-grounded opinion upon these points, we must have disobeyed the act, that enjoins us to report, in the first place, upon the balances in the hands of accountants in this session of parliament, to the end that the public money, long ago issued, and still remaining in their hands, may with all convenient speed be restored to the possession of the public.

Mr. Giles.—The managers are desirous that your lordships should order the Appendix to be entered as read, and they will proceed to read the Journal of the House of Commons, to prove that this report was presented to the House of Commons on the 7th of March 1781.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, the evidence that is now offered to your lordships, of the date at which that report was presented to the House of Commons (and which fact your lordships, I understand, called for the Journals of the House of Commons to authenticate), is a printed book.

Lord Chancellor.—Where are the original Journals?

Mr. Plumer.—I take the liberty of suggesting that I have no objection to this being read, for the purpose of saving time, if the originals are sent for, and will afterwards be produced;—but the honourable managers seem to conceive themselves at liberty to produce this as proper original and substantive evidence of itself; that is to say, that a printed copy is evidence of the original, the original being in their possession and capable of being produced.—It is not the best evidence; it is a copy; the original is in existence, and can be produced, and therefore I am quite at a loss to conceive why the honourable managers, after what I have suggested in private, should be anxious that this secondary evidence, in the absence of the principal and original evidence, should be introduced on the present occasion.—I hope your lordships will excuse me, and not suppose I am suggesting this for the purpose of taking up your lordships time; but I conceive that it is my duty to attend to every stage of a cause of this importance, before this august tribunal, where every step will form a precedent in future, by which the proceedings of every court are to be regulated, which may affect the fortune and character, and lives of every subject who may hereafter have the misfortune to stand in judgment; I hope your lordships will think I do not trespass upon your time in submitting an objection to the competency of this evidence.

Mr. Adam.—Your lordships will favour me with a very few words in addition to what has been stated by my learned friend—it is not our wish to delay the proceedings; because we stated that we were willing to allow the entry from this book, according to a phrase used in Westminster-hall, de bene esse, till the original was brought; but we learned that it was to be contended, that this book was good legal evidence—now that is what we, either as concerned for the noble person, whose case is now under your lordships consideration, or as a precedent for future times, cannot admit.

My lords, your lordships know, in the first place that this is not the best evidence that the nature of the thing will admit of; it is not the original, but a transcript of that Journal furnished by printing. In the next place, it is not an examined transcript; but even that would not do.—And, lastly, your lordships know perfectly well, that in another course of proceeding, which is extremely familiar to your lordships, which is of a similar nature, this species of evidence is never admitted; but that when a case of peerage is under your lordships consideration, in a committee of privileges, your lordships to determine on a right of peerage, require, that the original Journals of your own House should be produced in evidence. Now, if your lordships are not content to take a transcript of the Journals of your own House, as evidence, in the matter of a mere civil right and title of honour, I am sure your lordships will not think we act with an improper discretion in pressing your lordships to have the original Journal here; or, at least, that if this is to be read now (to which we make no objection), the original Journal should be brought, in order that the printed copy may be compared with the original afterwards, that we may find whether there is any variation between the best evidence, that the nature of the thing will admit of, and the secondary evidence.

Mr. Solicitor General.—My lords, the managers for the House of Commons have certainly not come prepared to argue before your lordships, a question which it did not enter into their imagination would be made at your lordships' bar; but, my lords, we conceive it to be a rule of evidence, founded and established, and settled upon one of the most solemn and important occasions, namely, the trial of a nobleman for his life, charged with the crime of high treason, that the printed Journals of the Houses of Lords and Commons, were evidence of the proceedings of those Houses. Upon the trial of my lord George Gordon, that question was decided by the court of King's-bench, and it has been acted upon, as we conceive, on all subsequent occasions. Certainly, my lords, it is a matter of very little importance whether your lordships are to receive the printed Journals in evidence, or we are to send to the House of Commons for the original Journals; but it occurs to us, that it does not become the managers for the House of Commons to give up a point that has been so fixed and settled, and after great consideration, and upon so important an occasion as that which I have mentioned to your lordships; we conceive therefore that the evidence we have offered to your lordships, is sufficient evidence for the purpose for which we produce it.

Lord Chancellor.—Can the managers for the House of Commons state that the printed Journals of the House of Lords, or of the House of Commons, were objected to by the prisoner's counsel, on the trial of lord George Gordon, and that, nevertheless, the court of King's-bench decided that they might be read in evidence? because I do not recollect the circumstance, and I think it could not have been so determined.

Mr. Solicitor General.—If any of your lordships conceive that any doubt whatever can be entertained upon this point, we are so anxious that no delay should take place upon this trial, that, rather than take up your lordships' time with having the question argued and decided by your lordships, we will send for the original Journals, protesting, however, that we are not bound so to do.

Lord Chancellor.—I certainly have always considered the course in the courts of law to be, that original public documents need not be produced, which are not only not removable at the call of individuals, but which, from their nature, might be necessary as evidence in different places at the same time; but in those cases you must have one of two things, either you must have an office copy, where there is any particular authority given for taking such office copies, or an examined copy, sworn to at the trial by the witness producing it;* and the printed Journal, if the party so producing it had examined it with the original, would be as good evidence as the original Journal itself; but unless your copy be so examined, you must produce the original Journal.

Mr. Plumer.—That was precisely the point in the case referred to.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, I do not know whether your lordships have observed that we wish not to trouble your lordships with reading the Appendix to the third Report; but that we are anxious it should be entered as read, the counsel for the defendant consenting to that course.

Mr. Plumer.—I shall certainly have occasion to refer your lordships to one part of the Appendix. I do not wish to trouble your lordships with hearing it read; but in the report, which has been read, it is stated, that certain persons, ex-treasurers, and representatives of ex-treasurers, were examined; their examination is referred to by this report; part of that examination appears to me to be material: I do not wish to trouble your lordships to hear it read now; but I shall humbly request, if it is consistent with the forms of your lordships' proceedings, that that Appendix should appear upon your lordships' minutes.

A Lord.—My lords, every feeling that I have as to the present proceedings, as they affect the public and the noble individual now at your lordships' bar, would induce me to give my consent, if I dare to do it, to such a measure, as the entering certain proceedings, not read, as if they were read; but we are now forming the highest tribunal in this kingdom; the example of this tribunal will be looked to by those who may hereafter succeed to our duty upon solemn occasions of this kind, and that example will be looked to also.

Lord Chancellor.—If there is any doubt upon this, I believe your lordships must adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament; but I confess it does not appear to me to be necessary.

A Lord.—I wish simply to call your lordships attention to this—I think it is quite objectionable in principle, in a criminal proceeding, to have any thing entered as read, which is not read.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the managers for the Commons wish to be instructed in your lordships' pleasure, whether the Appendix shall be now read.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, the only part of the Appendix, which, on the part of the defendant, I desire should be read in evidence, consists, as I have already stated to your lordships, of the examinations of the ex-treasurers, or their representatives; they are very short, and form a very small part of the Appendix. I have pointed that out to the clerk—they are distinct and unconnected with any other part of the Appendix.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the managers for the House of Commons have no objection to the proceeding now proposed by the counsel for the defendant, provided it is understood that they may at any future time, if it be found necessary, read any other part of the Appendix.

Then several papers in the Appendix were read, and are as follow:

Appendix, No. 16.

The Examination of the Right Honourable Earl Temple, taken upon oath, the 2nd of November, 1780.

His lordship saith, That the sum of twelve thousand three hundred and sixty pounds three shillings and four-pence three-farthings, mentioned in the return made by him to the board on the 13th of October last, is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the whole balance remaining in his hands, as personal representative of the right honourable George Grenville, as late treasurer of the navy.

Jones v. Randal, Cowp. 17.

That he knows of no other public services to which the sum in his hands is applicable, except the services for which it was granted, and the fees of passing the accounts.

That it would be his most earnest wish, to be allowed to pay it into the Exchequer, upon two months notice, and having his quietus.

Appendix, No. 17.

The Examination of the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Barrington, taken upon oath, the 7th of November, 1780.

His lordship saith, that the sum of thirteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-three pounds seven shillings and one penny three farthings, mentioned in the return made by him to this Board upon the 21st September last, is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the whole balance then remaining in his hands, as late treasurer of the navy.

That he knows of no other public service to which this sum is applicable in his hands, except the services for which it was granted, and the fees of passing his accounts.

That he has no objection to pay the balance into the Exchequer, when he can do it consistent with his own safety, as an accountant to the public.

Appendix, No. 18.

The Examination of the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Howe, taken upon oath, the 9th of November, 1780.

His lordship saith, that the sum of twenty-three thousand one hundred and six pounds eleven shillings and five-pence three farthings, mentioned in the return made by him to this Board upon the 10th of August last, is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the whole balance then remaining in his hands, as late treasurer of the navy.

That the above balance is solely applicable to the services specified in the said return.

That he is ready to pay the above balance into the Exchequer when so required.

Appendix, No. 19.

The Examination of Sir Gilbert Elliot, Baronet, taken upon oath, 3rd of November, 1780.

This examinant saith, that the sum of twenty-seven thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds sixteen shillings and one penny, mentioned in the return made by his direction to this Board on the 16th of October last, is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the whole balance of public money then remaining in his hands, as the personal representative of the right hon. Sir Gilbert Elliot, as late treasurer of the navy.

That he knows of no other public services to which this sum is applicable in his hands, except the services for which it was granted, and the fees of passing his accounts.

That he has no objection to pay the balance into the Exchequer upon having his quietus.

Mr. Giles.—The next allegation in the preamble which the managers propose to prove is, that the reports of the commissioners were taken into consideration by the House of Commons, and certain resolutions agreed upon on the 19th of June, 1782. I now propose to read these resolutions from the printed Journals, which I suppose will not be objected to, as the originals are here.

Then an entry in the Journals of the House of Commons was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that some regulations ought to be adopted for the purpose of lessening and keeping down the balances of public money, which appear to have usually been in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, and that it would be beneficial to the public, if the first and other clerks in the different branches belonging to the said office, were paid by fixed and permanent salaries, in lieu of all fees, gratuities, and other perquisites whatsoever.

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that from henceforward the paymaster general of his majesty's land forces, and the treasurer of the navy for the time being, shall not apply any sum or sums of money imprested to them, or either of them, for any purpose of advantage or interest to themselves, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Giles.—The sixth report of the commissioners was presented to the House of Commons before this resolution was come to, but the clerk did not bring it with him when he brought the others; and I will therefore, with your lordships leave, proceed to other evidence. The next allegation in the preamble is, that his majesty, by warrant bearing date the 22nd of June, 1782, was pleased to augment the income of the right hon. Isaac Barré, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, and to add thereto the sum of two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds. I shall now offer to your lordships evidence of that warrant, and I propose to prove it, by an entry made of it at the Treasury.

Then William Mitford, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What situation do you hold at the Treasury?

Mr. Mitford.—Chief clerk in the Treasury.

Mr. Giles.—What book have you brought with you?

Mr. Mitford.—A book belonging to the Treasury, in which the king's warrants are entered.

Mr. Giles.—Do you find a warrant to increase the salary of the right hon. Isaac Barré, treasurer of the navy, dated the 22nd of June, 1782?

Mr. Mitford.—It is in the book I hold in my hand.

Mr. Giles.—I propose the witness should read the entry of the warrant in the book.

Mr. Plumer.—With great submission, as the evidence now stands, I conceive this is not the proper evidence to substantiate the allegation contained in the preamble, which states, that his majesty, by warrant under his royal sign manual, dated the 22nd day of June, 1782, augmented the income of the right hon. Isaac Barré; the point is to be proved by the warrant of that date in the usual way; instead of producing the warrant, they have brought a book. The regular and correct evidence is, the warrant itself. I do not at present know what this book is, or that it can authenticate that warrant, unless it is preceded by some evidence that will make any copy of that warrant, or any secondary evidence, admissible.

Lord Chancellor.—Is it an entry before the warrant is made or after?

Mr. Mitford.—An entry from his majesty's warrant, after the signature by his majesty and three lords of the Treasury.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that a regular book kept in the office, in which every warrant, after it has received the royal signature, is so entered?

Mr. Mitford.—Not absolutely every warrant, but it is a general book for the entry of warrants.

Lord Chancellor.—By whom is the warrant that has so received the royal signature brought to your office to be so entered?

Mr. Mitford.—By the first lord of the Treasury, who procures the signature of his majesty.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—The managers wish to call Frederick Booth, esq. to prove the loss of the original.

Then Frederick Booth, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you one of the executors of the right hon. Isaac Barré?

Mr. Booth.—I was one of the executors named in the will; lord Amherst, sir Evan Nepean, and myself, were the three executors under Mr. Barré's will. The will was not proved by the executors; it was renounced, I believe, in favour of the marchioness Townshend, the residuary legatee; and these papers were therefore, I believe, delivered by lord Amherst and sir Evan Nepean to the marchioness Townshend.

Mr. Giles.—Have you examined Mr. Barré's papers?

Mr. Booth.—Upon my receiving notice to produce the patent and the warrant, I wrote to lady Townshend, knowing that the papers were with her, to request I might have them sent. Those papers her ladyship had, have been sent to me; I have searched them, and I cannot find either the one or the other.

Then Frederick Booth, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Did you act as executor yourself?

Mr. Booth.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you possess yourself of the papers of the deceased, or do any act in the character of executor before the probate of the will was renounced?

Mr. Booth.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Then you know nothing at all of any of the papers of Mr. Barré since his death?

Mr. Booth.—I know only of those papers that were sent to me upon my application to the marchioness Townshend, she then being at Raynham; a box of papers (I believe all his papers) came to me for the purpose of examination, in order to produce the warrant.

Mr. Plumer.—What knowledge have you that the box of papers sent to you were, in fact, part of the papers of the late Mr. Barré, except by hearsay, and from the marchioness Townshend?

Mr. Booth.—By having gone through these papers soon after the marchioness Townshend had the probate granted to her, which was obtained by the marchioness before she went to Norfolk.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you collect that these were the papers of colonel Barré, from the information of the marchioness Townshend?

Mr. Booth.—Yes; and knowing these papers to be the papers, or part of them, that I went through soon after administration was granted to lady Townshend.

Mr. Giles.—From whom did you receive these papers when you first saw them?

Mr. Booth.—They were in the possession of lady Townshend.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the managers for the Commons were not apprized that the papers were in the possession of lady Townshend; if the counsel for the defendant think fit to object to reading the entry of the warrant in the book from the Treasury, and your lordships are of opinion that that entry cannot be read, it will be necessary, certainly, for the managers to take measures to bring lady Townshend, as a witness, before your lordships.

Lord Chancellor.—Unless the objection is waived, I am of opinion, you cannot read that entry from the book. Let Mr. Mitford be called again.

Then William Mitford, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Are you acquainted with the hand-writing of the clerk who made the entry in the Treasury book?

Mr. Mitford.—I am not.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any part of the entries in that book made by yourself?

Mr. Mitford.—They were not.

Mr. Giles.—Where should the original warrant be regularly deposited?

Mr. Mitford.—I presume at the Auditor's office, before whom the account is passed; but I only speak from the probable course of business.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, we will now call the clerk of the Auditor's office to prove that the original warrant is not in that office.

Then Bernard Cobbe, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are you a clerk in the Auditor's office?

Mr. Cobbe.—No.

Mr. Giles.—In what situation are you?

Mr. Cobbe.—I hold the situation of one of the inspectors general of accounts.

Mr. Giles.—Have you made any search in the office for a warrant granting to Mr. Barré an increase of salary, when he was treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Cobbe.—The warrant is not to be found in the Auditor's office.

Mr. Giles.—Is the Auditor's office the place in which such warrant ought regularly to be?

Mr. Cobbe.—No; the warrant is brought for entry, and taken away to be entered at other offices; the patent and warrant were brought to the Auditor's office for entry; while it was entering it was fetched away, and the entry of the warrant is not complete; when the accounts came to be audited, we obtained a copy of the entry from the books in the Navy office.

Mr. Plumer.—But if that entry had been complete, would the warrant have been left there?

Mr. Cobbe.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—It has now been shown that the warrant is not to be found either in the Exchequer, or the Auditor's office; and it has been shown, by Mr. Booth, that the warrant was not amongst those papers which were put into his hands; further we must go, undoubtedly.

Mr. Giles.—If it is insisted upon we certainly cannot propose to read this entry without producing lady Townshend; we thought the papers had been in the possession of Mr. Booth.

Mr. Plumer.—I hope that will not be supposed to be the ground of our objection on the part of the defendant. If lady Townshend were here, and had authenticated these papers, not only to be the papers of colonel Barré, but to be all the papers of colonel Barre, and it was not among those papers, my objection would hold precisely the same then as it will now; because I conceive, with great deference, that the legal custody, the natural custody of a warrant is not the private custody of the individual, or the representative of an individual who is to be benefited by that warrant. The warrant is deposited in a public office; it is the authority to that public office to pay the individual the salary he is entitled to receive; and therefore, if they had negatived the existence of any trace of a warrant, among any of the papers left by colonel Barré, by all the proper evidence, the objection I take would still remain to the secondary evidence the managers offer to produce.

Mr. Whitbread.—The managers would be sorry your lordships' time should be occupied by calling persons from all the public offices, by which it would at last appear, there is no office where there was a legal deposit for these warrants; it will be proved that these warrants are always in the custody of persons in whose favour they are granted; and that a person having such a warrant is not bound to deposit it in any other custody whatever.

Lord Chancellor.—The counsel for lord Melville say, that their objection is not obviated by this evidence; but, until the whole evidence is produced, it is impossible to give a decision upon the point.

Mr. Whitbread.—With your lordships leave we will postpone this until a further witness shall be called; and after that, I trust your lordships will be satisfied.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know who the person was that took away the warrant whilst it was in the office for entry?

Mr. Cobbe.—I do not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—As the counsel for the defendant think fit to insist upon their objection, the managers for the Commons, with your lordships' permission, to save time, postpone the proof of this allegation till they are able to produce lady Townshend before your lordships.

The next allegation I propose to prove is, the appointment of lord Melville (then the right honourable Henry Dundas) to be treasurer of his majesty's navy, which I shall do by the production of his patent, bearing date the 19th of August, 1782. The patent is under the great seal, and I produce the original.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to say one word as to the course the honourable manager has suggested that he means to take respecting the last piece of evidence. I beg it may not be understood, that if we can privately be informed, that the box of papers in the custody of Mr. Booth, does, in point of fact, contain all the papers of the late colonel Barré, that we shall not be perfectly ready to admit that to be the fact, without giving lady Townshend the trouble of attending personally to prove it. But when that fact is established, your lordships will understand, that I do not conceive the managers then will be in a situation to offer the secondary evidence; yet, as far as that goes, if we can be assured, though not by legal evidence, but by private information, that the box contains all the papers of colonel Barré, we shall be content to let that point be considered as if it were proved by legal evidence.

Mr. Adam.—The course of proceeding with regard to the warrant, I take to be this; and if what I state should be acquiesced in by the managers, it would remove the difficulty, and relieve the managers from the embarrassment (which I am sure the noble person whom we defend must feel as much as any individual who exists), of being put to the necessity of calling a noble lady here, for the purpose of being examined in a preliminary question of this sort. Though it is a preliminary question, it is a question upon the admissibility of evidence of very great importance; but I think we may get rid of it without making any admission that would be unfit for us to make. I take it, that the course when a warrant for the payment of money is subscribed by his majesty, and countersigned by the lords of the Treasury, is this; that the warrant must be carried to the Treasury, to be entered, and carried to the other offices, where it may be necessary to do any thing in future times in respect of that warrant;—so in this case it was carried to the officer for passing the public accounts, and from thence it was carried away before the entry was complete; but that person has stated that it was carried to the Navy office, and from thence they had a complete entry, which explains the course of this warrant. It was not a warrant according to the ordinary form of payment, at the Exchequer; but was to be paid out of certain naval money, which resulted out of certain naval stores ordered to be sold, and out of other matters, and was therefore carried to the proper officer, in the Navy office, to be entered: and then, according to the common course, it must have come back to the party to whom the warrant was granted, and from his custody it must have gone to his executors.

Now we are ready to admit this upon the declaration of those who have examined these books, as my learned friend, Mr. Plumer has stated it—that it was not to be found among the papers of the late colonel Barré; and under that admission it is perfectly unnecessary to call lady Townshend to give evidence before your lordships; and it is equally clear, that the best evidence, which by the nature of the thing can be got, is the entry at the Navy office.

Mr. Whitbread.—I have been informed within these few minutes, that there is a noble personage in your lordships' body, lord Amherst, the son of the late lord Amherst, who was executor of colonel Barré, and who did look over these papers, and then gave them to lady Townshend; probably he will be able to inform your lordships whether this warrant was among the papers he looked over.—With regard to the copy in the Navy office, we have an officer of the Navy office here who can immediately produce that copy.

Lord Chancellor.—I should think the managers had better follow the course proposed by the counsel for lord Melville, namely, to trace the course of the warrant; it is proved by a witness to have been in the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships will observe, that the book we first offered in evidence to your lordships, contains a complete entry of the warrant; and that entry was necessarily made before the warrant was delivered out to the treasurer, which I submit is to the full as satisfactory evidence as the copy of the warrant entered at the Navy office. If it be desired that the copy of the Navy office should also be produced, the managers have no objection to send for that; but we propose to read the copy entered at the Treasury.

Lord Chancellor.—Do the counsel for lord Melville object to that?

Mr. Plumer.—I object to that.

Lord Chancellor.—What difference is there between that proposed to be read, and that which is entered at the Navy office?

Mr. Plumer.—They are not in a situation I conceive to read the entry in that book, because the best evidence would be that of the person proving he entered it from the original. The clerk they have called has produced a book, and how does that book prove itself? There is (from the absence of the person who made the entry) no evidence before your lordships upon oath that it is a correct entry. I therefore submit, that before they can get the length of representing that entry as containing a true copy of the original, they ought to call the clerk who made that entry, and who will say he compared it with the original, and that it is a true copy of the original.

Mr. Giles.—We produce that book as a record, kept at the Treasury, of the warrants that were issued; it is the book in which the warrants must necessarily be entered before they are delivered out, and it is brought by the clerk of the Treasury before your lordships. It is proved that the course is, for the warrant to be brought by the first lord of the Treasury, in order to be entered in that book as a book of record.

Lord Chancellor.—Call Mr. Mitford in again.

Then William Mitford, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Lord Chancellor.—Is it the regular course in the Treasury office to make entries in that book of all warrants before they are delivered out from the Treasury? Do you know what is the regular course in the office of the Treasury?

Mr. Mitford.—There is no fixed rule for that; it must be stamped before it is delivered, and of course there must be time for the entry. It is generally two or three days before the party calls for it; after it is complete it is delivered to him.

Lord Chancellor.—When the warrant is brought to the Treasury, whose duty is it to make those entries, one of which you have proved?

Mr. Mitford.—The clerk in whose department it falls.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know the signature of any of the lords of the Treasury to that entry?

Mr. Mitford.—There is no signature in this book; it is a mere entry by the clerk; it was done in the department of a gentleman of the name of Beldam, who is now dead, but it is not his writing, for I know his writing well.

Lord Chancellor.—Then you do not know that to be the hand-writing of any clerk in the office?

Mr. Mitford.—I do not.

Mr. Plumer.—I understand it is not the practice to enter all warrants in that book?

Mr. Mitford.—Not every one that the king signs, but it is the general king's Warrant Book.

Mr. Giles.—A more material question would have been, whether they ever enter any papers there as warrants which are not warrants?

Mr. Mitford.—Certainly not.

Mr. Giles.—If your lordships have any doubt upon this question, we do not press it.

A Lord.—When the warrant is brought in the ordinary course of business to the Treasury in order to be entered, what becomes of that warrant after the entry?

Mr. Mitford.—It is given to the party who requires it.

Mr. Giles.—To the party who brings it for entry?

Mr. Mitford.—No; not to the party who brings it for entry?

Mr. Giles.—Whom is the warrant delivered to after it is entered? What becomes of it?

Mr. Mitford.—It is delivered to the party himself, or to his agent.

A Lord.—Do you know in whose custody regularly this warrant ought to remain?

Mr. Mitford.—I should have thought it should have remained with the auditor before whom the party passes his account, but in that I understand I am deceived.

A Lord.—Is the original warrant ever in the custody of the party who is entitled to it, till the entry of it has been made by the clerk at the Treasury?

Mr. Mitford.—Certainly not.

A Lord.—Is the copy made at the instance of the party, or is it not the act of the persons who are interested to deliver over the warrants from his majesty to the party?

Mr. Mitford.—It is done in the course of office.

Lord Chancellor.—When a warrant is brought to the Treasury, is it the course of office for it to pass out of the Treasury again till that entry is made?

Mr. Mitford.—Certainly not.

A Lord.—Whether the form of the warrant be to authorise the treasurer of the navy to receive the sums of money comprehended in the warrant, or whether it be a direction to any officer to pay it?

Mr. Mitford.—It is not an authority for payment, but for the auditor of imprest to allow that sum in the accounts of the parties.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know whether any money was paid upon this warrant?

Mr. Giles.—I believe the managers will be able to prove that fact. Your lordships take it that the warrant is not stated by the last witness to be deposited at the Auditor's office until the treasurer goes to pass his account; till that time it remains in the custody of the treasurer of the navy, as I understand him.

Mr. Mitford.—I cannot presume to say in whose custody it is.

A Lord.—Whether the warrant must of necessity be entered at the Auditor's office, or left there for entry?

Mr. Mitford.—I believe, I before observed, that I was impressed with the idea, that it ought to be left at the Auditor's office.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—With your lordships permission, we will ask that question of Mr. Cobbe, who must be more familiar with the practice of that office, as he belongs to it.

Then Bernard Cobbe, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Is it necessary, when the treasurer of the navy comes to pass his account, that he should leave the warrant in the office?

Mr. Cobbe.—The entry of the warrant has always been considered as sufficient.

Mr. Giles.—In the general course, what becomes of the original warrant of which the entry is made?

Mr. Cobbe.—The party leaves the warrant to be entered, and calls and takes it away again; it does not remain with the office.

Mr. Giles.—If your lordships entertain any doubt of this, the Commons have no objection to produce to your lordships the entry that is made at the Navy office, if it will be more satisfactory to the counsel for the defendant; at the same time protesting that they are now entitled to read the entry in the book of the Treasury.

Lord Chancellor.—Where are the payments upon such a warrant as this made?

Mr. Cobbe.—At the office of the treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—Is it not your duty to make the entry in the books from the original warrant?

Mr. Cobbe.—It is the duty of the entering clerk, the clerk of enrollments for enrolling warrants, patents, and powers of attorney.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Harry Harmood, esquire, was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you paymaster to Mr. Barré when he was treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Harmood.—I was.

Mr. Giles.—Do you recollect Mr. Barré having any increase of salary during that time?

Mr. Harmood.—I do.

Mr. Giles.—Was that increase of salary paid from time to time to Mr. Barré?

Mr. Harmood.—It was, during the time I was his paymaster.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know under what authority that additional salary was paid?

Mr. Harmood.—It was by a sign manual, I apprehend; I cannot speak positively.

Lord Chancellor.—Do the counsel for the defendant admit that the original warrant cannot be found notwithstanding the search?

Mr. Plumer.—We are ready to admit that the original warrant is not to be found among the papers of the late colonel Barré. I am willing to admit (and we may take that as the datum to proceed upon) that they have satisfactorily negatived by proof the existence of the warrant among those papers. That is all that I at present admit.

A Lord.—What was the amount of the increase of salary which you paid to colonel Barré as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Harmood.—I believe it was 2,000*l.* additional per annum, making in the whole 4,000*l.*

A Lord.—From what office, and in what manner, was that additional salary paid?

Mr. Harmood.—It was paid from the office of the treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—By whom?

Mr. Harmood.—I do not exactly recollect by whom, whether it was in the cashier's branch or the navy branch, but it was paid at the office.

A Lord.—Under whose authority was that additional salary paid?

Mr. Harmood.—As I conceive, it was paid under a sign manual, or some warrant. There was an authority for paying it undoubtedly.

Lord Chancellor.—Is it the course of the office to return the warrants after they have made the entry?

Mr. Harmood.—I believe not, but I do not know.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Lord Chancellor.—Call in Mr. Mitford.

Then William Mitford, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Lord Chancellor.—We wish distinctly to understand whether, as far as you are acquainted with the course of the office, the warrant, when entered, is delivered back again to the party who brings it for entry.

Mr. Mitford.—It is never in possession of the party till after it is entered. Before it is entered in any other office, it is entered in the treasury book, and then given to the party or his agent.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Lord Chancellor.—Do lord Melville's counsel admit that due diligence has been used in searching the papers of Mr. Barré, and that this warrant has not been found?

Mr. Plumer.—I am willing to take that as an admitted fact.

Lord Chancellor.—But still you object to the entry in the Treasury book being read?

Mr. Plumer.—I feel it to be my duty to do so; and I am not at present satisfied as to that preliminary question, what finally becomes of the warrant after it is entered in the different offices. I wish, if your lordships please, to ask Mr. Harmood whether he can inform your lordships whether that warrant, after having been entered in the different offices, is in the custody of the individual who is to be benefited by it.

Then Harry Harmood, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know what becomes of the original warrant after it has received the proper and regular entry at all the different offices?

Mr. Harmood.—I really do not.

A Lord.—These payments of the 2,000*l.* a year additional salary, you state to have been made; do you consider these payments to have been made in consequence of some warrant and a voucher?

Mr. Harmood.—There must have been a voucher.

A Lord.—Do you mean the warrant itself, or the entry of the warrant?

Mr. Harwood.—The warrant itself.

A Lord.—Did you see it?

Mr. Harwood.—I do not recollect that I did.

A Lord.—Is it usual at the Navy office to preserve and file all the warrants under which payments are made at that office?

Mr. Harwood.—I really cannot answer that question.

A Lord.—In the course of business at the Navy-pay office, do they not regularly file the vouchers under which the payments are made?

Mr. Harwood.—I really cannot answer that question.

A Lord.—Are you acquainted with the mode of passing the accounts of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Harwood.—Perhaps not through every stage of it; it is twenty-four years since I was in that office, and then I was there but four months.

A Lord.—Are they examined first by the Navy board?

Mr. Harwood.—They go through some particular branch of the Navy-office, I believe.

A Lord.—And afterwards to the Auditor's office?

Mr. Harwood.—Yes, it there finishes.

A Lord.—Is not the warrant for the salary to the treasurer of the navy an authority to him to pay that sum of money?

Mr. Harwood.—I believe it is.

A Lord.—If so, is it not a voucher necessary for the passing his accounts?

Mr. Harwood.—I should think it is.

A Lord.—Under what vouchers or by what warrant did you receive your own salary?

Mr. Harwood.—By the appointment of the treasurer himself, under his appointment.

Mr. Whitbread.—Perhaps we shall be able to save the time of your lordships by putting in an original warrant of the same nature, which was granted to lord Melville, which I hold in my hand, and which would explain the nature of the warrant granted to Mr. Barré.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer, have you any other observation to make against the admissibility of this book?

Mr. Plumer.—Before I do that, may I be permitted, with all deference, to propose a question to this witness? Whether he ever saw this warrant in colonel Barré's possession?

Mr. Harwood.—I do not think I ever did.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it ever carried by you to any office in order to receive payment under it?

Mr. Harwood.—I think not.

Mr. Plumer.—If it had been in colonel Barré's possession, do you think you should have seen it?

Mr. Harwood.—I think it is most likely I should. I do not remember seeing the warrant.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Lord Chancellor.—If the counsel have any thing further to address to the Court, as to the admissibility of this book, as evidence, the Court are ready to hear them.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, in the first place, I submit that the managers have not yet given a clear and satisfactory account tracing where the original is: the result of the evidence given to your lordships is, that as it is not to be found among any of the papers of Mr. Barré, it never appears to have been, as far as we can learn, in his possession; because if it had been, the witness before your lordships would have seen it, managing, as he did, the concerns of Mr. Barré, and receiving money under it; and he takes upon him to say, he never did see it; and believes if it had been in Mr. Barré's possession, he should have seen it. Whatever inference arises in ordinary cases, that it would be in the custody of the individual, is negatived in the present case; and the probability is, that this warrant (whatever became of it) never reached the party who was to be benefited under it; and consequently searching for it among his papers goes no way at all towards tracing what is become of the original.

Then the next trace of this warrant is, that it has been carried to certain offices, for the purpose at least of being entered. The only offices in which they have hitherto proved any search to have been made respecting it, are the Treasury and the Auditor's office; but there is no proof whatever of any search made at any other office; and the warrant may be at this moment lying at some other office, in which, according to the regular and ordinary course of business, it should be entered. In the next place, supposing the original warrant not to be found at any one of the offices where it is entered, the next place of its deposit would be (or might be), in the office where payments are made under it. Of a search there, no evidence is given; but supposing they had gone the length of proving that in no one public office, after due search made, is the original warrant to be found, still I submit that they have not gone the length of entitling themselves to read the secondary evidence, because the secondary evidence produced is an entry made in the Treasury book; which entry itself is not authenticated, unless it be authenticated by its being in that book.

The honourable manager has stated that he has collected, that that book is in the nature of a record. Strictly and correctly, the learned and honourable manager could not state it to be in the nature of a record; that is to say, a public document, of such a nature, that whatever entries are in it, are therefore received without any evidence at all, as proper and correct evidence proving themselves. In this case, I contend with great submission, that the Court are to be informed, not merely that a warrant did in point of fact exist, under which payments were made, but also what were the terms of that warrant; because a great deal of argument is built upon the exact phrase—upon the terms of the warrant—upon every word contained in it. It is stated to contain an implied condition, in its creating an obligation, negating the right of the individual receiving that augmented pay to all the articles enumerated in the warrant.—The bare existence therefore, of an augmentation of salary by a warrant, does not at all authenticate the precise contents of the warrant in question. How are its contents to be proved by this entry, upon the ground of its being an authentic copy of the original?—How is the copy of the original to be proved?—By the man who made the copy and compared it with the original. Now of that you have no evidence whatever.

But it may be said, being an official book, that of itself supplies the evidence of its being an authentic copy. If that can be supplied, it must be only where there is a legal officer appointed by the law, for the purpose of making an authentic copy of the original. If the usual evidence to prove its authenticity can be in any case dispensed with, it must be where the law gives credence to the officer whose duty it is to make an entry of that description. But, in the present case, that is totally negated; because Mr. Mitford has told us in the first place, that this purports to be made by an individual, whose duty it was; but he has negated its being the hand-writing of that individual; and therefore this is an instrument upon which there is a considerable doubt thrown by the evidence given, respecting the hand-writing not being the hand-writing of the person whose duty it was to make an entry upon the subject. Your lordships therefore, have not the satisfaction of supplying the defect by any positive evidence of a witness who has compared the copy with the original, because it is negated to be the copy of the entry made by the officer whose duty it was to make it.—Your lordships therefore, if you receive this entry, are to receive an entry made by some unknown person—not the person authorised to make it—he is not produced—it is not proved to be a correct copy, and I submit that upon every principle this is not evidence.

Mr. Adam.—My lords, your lordships may be assured, that, in whatever I am about to offer to your consideration, I shall not repeat unnecessarily any part of what has been enforced so fully by my learned friend; but it occurs to me, referring to those arguments which he has stated, that there are certain other arguments which ought to decide your lordships upon this occasion, not to permit the entry of any Treasury book to be read. Before I state what appear to me to be those arguments, I wish to call the attention of your lordships House, most particularly, to the nature of the allegation proposed to be proved; and your lordships will find it is the allegation of facts contained in the preamble, relative to the situation in which colonel Barré stood with respect to this office; and therefore, if it is to have any effect at all, it probably is with a view to affect the conduct of one individual, now before your lordships, by the conduct of another. My lords, I take it that will make your lordships particularly cautious, even if the general rules of evidence did not do so, not to permit this to be read, unless it is clearly proved to be evidence fit to be admitted.

My lords, I content myself with the argument of my learned friend, with regard to the managers not having laid sufficient ground on the part of this impeachment, to entitle them to have secondary evidence received; but I contend that, if they have done so, this secondary evidence is not admissible; not only upon the grounds already stated to your lordships, but upon this ground. In consequence of questions that have been put by one of your lordships to one of the witnesses, Mr. Mitford; it appears, upon your lordships evidence, that the book in question is a copy, made from the warrant, upon the delivery of the first lord of the Treasury, after the signature of his majesty, and before it reaches the individual for whom it was meant. Then, my lords, this warrant, so copied in the Treasury book, is copied without any cognizance, or without any privity on the part of the individual—he is at that period of time totally unacquainted with it and no party to it, and, for any thing that is before your lordships in evidence, it may never have gone into his hands. Then to admit the Treasury book to be read before your lordships, is to admit the accounts of other parties, behind the back of the individual, as evidence. Now, how does it stand in the books? and how is it proved? It is proved by Mr. Mitford, that Mr. Beldam was the clerk, by whose authority warrants of this description ought to have been entered; and it is proved by Mr. Mitford, that the entry is not in his hand-writing. Then the proper officer of the Treasury has not made that entry. In addition to that, it is no way established, that Mr. Beldam, or any other clerk of the Treasury, is an officer known to the law, which would make his act, even if there were evidence of it, admissible. Upon the grounds stated by my friend, therefore, and upon the grounds I have now taken the liberty of stating, I do trust that your lordships will be of opinion, that, in a question of this sort, where the allegation to be proved is an allegation that respects a third party, not the individual whose case is under your lordships consideration, your lordships will consider, that neither in the present nor in any other stage of this case, can they make this book from the Treasury, evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—I think, at present, that this book, for the purpose for which it has been stated, is admissible evidence; non constat what it proves when it is received.

A Lord.—My lords, I feel so much doubt about it, that I could wish the managers should state the grounds upon which they conceive this to be evidence.

A Lord.—Before the Lords adjourn to the chamber of parliament, I should wish it might be submitted to the honourable managers, whether they feel the allegation, respecting this warrant to Mr. Barré, to be so material an allegation (if material it be at all), that they will now insist upon the proof of it; or whether they will not consider whether it be so material as to require proof at their hands: and if it does, whether they will not give proof that may be more satisfactory than the proof at present offered appears to be.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, it is certainly the wish of the managers for the Commons to save your lordships the inconvenience of removing to your own House: but, my lords, in the course of this discussion, a witness has brought the book from the Navy-office, in which this warrant is entered; and I understand that the initials of the witness who will produce the book are affixed to the copy of the warrant, as having examined it himself.

My lords, we wish certainly, if we can do it without much inconvenience, to show your lordships that, in consequence of the resolution of the House of Commons, his majesty was pleased, in order to carry that into execution, to grant an additional salary to the then treasurer of the navy, in lieu of all fees, profits, and emoluments; and therefore the learned counsel who addressed you last, is mistaken in the import of the allegation, for the allegation does not take the least notice of the conduct of Mr. Barré, nor can we by any possibility contrast the conduct of Mr. Barré upon that allegation with the conduct of lord Melville; but the averment is made for the mere purpose of showing, that his majesty, after the resolution of the House of Commons, did, in furtherance of that resolution, grant an additional salary to Mr. Barré. If your lordships, after I have called the witness, and offered the evidence just stated, should have any doubt about its admissibility, the managers feel it to be of so little importance to establish the allegation made in the preamble, that they will certainly waive it, and not give your lordships the trouble of retiring upon it.

With your lordships permission, I will therefore call Mr. Standert as a witness; at the same time, I beg it may be understood, that it is not to be considered, that the warrant is deposited at the Auditor's office; but that, according to the evidence you have hitherto received, the warrant ought to be in the custody of the person in whose favour it is granted. It does happen, that in the course of the proceedings of the treasurer of the navy, in order to have his account passed at the Auditor's office, he must have his warrant entered at the Auditor's office: but after it is entered it is returned of course to him; and by this time if this delay had not occurred, I should have satisfied your lordships that such is the case, by the best of all possible evidence, against the noble defendant, because I am about to produce a warrant granted to him under similar circumstances, and which was found in the custody of his paymaster.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:—

Mr. Giles.—What situation do you hold in the Navy-pay office?

Mr. Standert.—Chief clerk of the comptroller of the treasurer's accounts.

Mr. Giles.—What book is that?

Mr. Standert.—A book in which copies of all warrants are entered.

Mr. Giles.—Is there any copy of a warrant granted to Mr. Barré, when treasurer of the navy, to increase his salary?

Mr. Standert.—There is.

Mr. Giles.—Who made that copy, or who has attested it?

Mr. Standert.—I have attested it. I do not recollect who made the copy.

Mr. Giles.—What does that attestation of your's import?

Mr. Standert.—That it was examined with the original warrant upon the 22nd of October, 1782.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—It being admitted by the counsel for the noble defendant, that this warrant is not to be found among the papers of Mr. Barré, in whose custody I contend before your lordships it ought upon the evidence strictly to be; I now produce to your lordships an examined copy which I submit to be evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer, what do you say to this evidence?

Mr. Plumer.—If your lordships are of opinion, that they have satisfactorily accounted for the original, it does appear to me that this evidence goes a great deal further to prove it an authentic examined copy with the original, than any we had before; and therefore certainly I will not give your lordships any further trouble upon that evidence.

The following Extract was read from the book:

“GEORGE R.

“Whereas, by letters patent under the great seal of Great Britain, bearing date the 10th of April, 1782, We were graciously pleased to grant unto our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor Isaac Barré, esq., the office of Treasurer of our navy royal and ships, and receiver-general of all sums of money appointed, or from time to time to be appointed and payable for the support, maintenance, and reparation of our navy royal and ships, for emption and provisions appertaining to, and necessary for our said navy and ships, and for wages and salaries of officers, servants, and other persons whatsoever, belonging to our said navy and ships, or for any other matter or thing whatsoever, in any manner touching or concerning our navy royal or ships; and for the exercise and occupation of the said office, and for and in satisfaction of all wages and fees of three-pence of lawful money for every pound to be received and paid by the said Isaac Barré, by virtue of his said office, We were further graciously pleased to give and grant unto him, by the said letters patent, an annuity or yearly payment of two thousand pounds: and whereas it hath been represented unto us, that the said annuity or yearly payment, after deducting all charges, taxes, and expenses thereon, will not produce to the said Isaac Barré more than the sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds in each year, or thereabouts: and whereas, for divers good causes and considerations us hereunto moving, We are graciously pleased, that the income of the treasurer of our Navy should be augmented with an additional allowance of two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds, in order to make, together with the said sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds, the said income to amount in future to the sum of four thousand pounds: our will and pleasure therefore is, and we do hereby direct, authorize, and empower him, the said I. Barré, to take and apply out of such monies as are or shall come to his hands, or to the hands of his cashiers, arisen or to arise by the sale of old naval stores, the sum of two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds, which, together with the before-mentioned sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds, will make the said sum of four thousand pounds, which we are graciously pleased to grant to him, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments heretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of our navy, the same to commence and be computed from the day of the letters patent appointing him to the office of treasurer of our Navy, and to continue during his continuance in the said office of treasurer of our Navy, or until we shall signify our pleasure to the contrary by warrant or writing under our royal sign manual: and we do hereby authorize and command you the auditors of the imprests, and all other our officers and ministers whom it doth or may concern, to make and give full and plenary allowance and discharge thereof, and every part thereof, from time to time, in his account as treasurer of our Navy accordingly, and that without expecting any other or further order or direction from us in that behalf: and for your so doing this shall be your warrant.

“ Given at our court at St. James’s, this 22nd day of June 1782, in the 22nd year of our reign.

“ By his majesty’s command.

“ To the auditors of our      “ ROCKINGHAM.
Imprests now and for      “ ALTHORPE.
the time being.”      “ F. MONTAGUE.”

Mr. Giles.—The next document I propose to produce to your lordships, is a warrant under the king’s sign manual, granting an additional salary to lord Melville.—I take it that the sign manual will authorize me to read the warrant; but if your lordships think it necessary for me to give any further proof, I am prepared to do it. It was found with the patent, among the papers of Mr. Douglas, who was the paymaster to lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—I shall not give your lordships any trouble upon it.

The original warrant was read, and is as follows:

“ GEORGE R.

“ Whereas, by letters patent under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date the 19th day of August 1782, we were graciously pleased to give and grant unto our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor Henry Dundas, the office of Treasurer of our navy royal and ships, and Receiver-general of all sums of money appointed, or from time to time to be appointed and payable for the support, maintenance, and reparation of our navy royal and ships, for emption and provisions appertaining to and necessary for our said navy and ships, and for wages, salaries of officers, servants, and other persons whatsoever, belonging to our said navy or ships, or any other matter or thing whatsoever in any manner touching or concerning our navy royal or ships, and for the exercise and occupation of the said office, and for and in satisfaction of all wages and fees of three-pence of lawful money for every pound to be received and paid by the said Henry Dundas, by virtue of his said office, we were further graciously pleased to give and grant unto him, by the said letters patent, an annuity or yearly payment of 2,000*l.*: and whereas it hath been represented unto us, that the said annuity or yearly payment, after deducting all charges, taxes, and expenses thereon, will not produce to the said Henry Dundas more than the sum of 1,850*l.* in each year, or thereabouts: and whereas, for divers good causes and considerations us hereunto moving, We are graciously pleased, that the income of the treasurer of the Navy should be augmented with an additional allowance of 2,324*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* in order to make, together with the said sum of 1,850*l.* the said income to amount in future to the sum of 4,000*l.* Our will and pleasure therefore is, and we do hereby direct, authorize, and empower him the said Henry Dundas, to take and apply out of such monies as are in or shall come to his hands, or to the hands of his cashier, arisen or to arise by the sale of old naval stores, the sum of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings, and six-pence, which, together with the before-mentioned sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds, will make the said sum of four thousand pounds; which we are graciously pleased to grant him, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages and fees, and other profits and emoluments heretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of our navy; the same to commence and be computed from the day of the date of the letters patent appointing him to the office of treasurer of our navy, and to continue during his continuance in the said office of treasurer of our navy, or until we shall signify our pleasure to the contrary, by warrant or writing under our royal sign manual. And we do further direct, authorize, and empower him the said Henry Dundas, in case the said additional allowance of two thousand three hundred and twenty-four pounds six shillings and sixpence, together with the said several allowances before stated, shall not produce in each year the nett sum of four thousand pounds, to charge the deficiency, if there be any, in the annual amount of monies disbursed by him for fees of divers natures. And we do also hereby authorize and command you, the auditors of the Imprests, and all others our officers or ministers whom it doth or may concern, to make and give full plenary allowance and discharge thereof, and of every part thereof, from time to time accordingly in the account, and that without expecting any other or further order or direction from us in that behalf: and for so doing this shall be your warrant.

"Given at our court at St. James's, this 23rd day of October 1782, in the 22nd year of our reign.

"By his majesty's command.
